NYTimes Urges Japan To Apologize For WWII Sex Slaves. In an editorial, the New York Times (3/6, 1.16M) writes, "What part of 'Japanese Army sex slaves' does Japan's prime minister, Shinzo Abe, have so much trouble understanding and apologizing for?" Although the "underlying facts have long been beyond serious dispute," Abe "seems less concerned with repairing Japan's sullied international reputation than with appealing to a large right-wing faction within his Liberal Democratic Party that insists that the whole shameful episode was a case of healthy private enterprise." The Times says, "It is time for Japan's politicians -- starting with Mr. Abe -- to recognize that the first step toward overcoming a shameful past is acknowledging it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Privacy Board Clears U.S. Spy Programs (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer
AP, March 6, 2007

A White House privacy board is giving its stamp of approval to two of the Bush administration's controversial surveillance programs — electronic eavesdropping and financial tracking — and says they do not violate citizens' civil liberties.

Democrats newly in charge of Congress quickly criticized the findings, which they said were questionable given some of the board members' close ties with the Bush administration.

"Their current findings and any additional conclusions they reach will be taken with a grain of salt until they become fully independent," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee.

After operating mostly in secret for a year, the five-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Board is preparing to release its first report to Congress next week.

The report finds that both the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program and the Treasury Department's monitoring of international banking transactions have sufficient privacy protections, three board members told The Associated Press in telephone interviews.

Both programs have multiple layers of review before sensitive information is accessed, they said.

"We looked at the program, we visited NSA and met with the top people all the way down to those doing the hands-on work," said Carol Dinkins, a Houston lawyer and former Reagan administration assistant attorney general who chairs the board.

"The program is structured and implemented in a way that is properly protective and attentive to civil liberties," she said.

Some board members were troubled by the Homeland Security Department's error-ridden no-fly lists, which critics say use subjective or inconclusive data to flag suspect travelers.

One area the board will focus on in its report is the computerized anti-terrorism screening system recently announced by DHS and used for years without travelers' knowledge to assign risk assessments to millions of Americans who fly abroad.

"That's a place where there's a lot of opportunity for improvement," Dinkins said.

Lanny Davis, a former Clinton White House counsel and the lone Democrat on the panel, described the board's first report to Congress as modest. He said most of the work in the past year was spent being briefed on the administration's surveillance programs.

"We felt reassured regarding the checks-and-balance concerns," Davis said. He said that after several classified briefings, members were impressed by the multiple layers of review, which included audit trails to track whoever has access to the data.

Still, Davis said he anticipated the board will continue to monitor the program as needed. "It would be a mistake if that was the end of the review," he said.

The board's initial findings come as Congress is moving forward on measures to give the board more authority and make it more independent of the president. Created in late 2004, the panel was established as a compromise between Congress and the White House after a recommendation by the Sept. 11 commission.

Both conservative and liberal civil liberties groups have urged the members to aggressively review the eavesdropping program and have questioned whether board members would stand up to the president if he were flouting the law.

In recent weeks, the administration has agreed to let a secret but independent panel of judges oversee the program. But many lawmakers and civil libertarians have remained skeptical about its legality, and the Justice Department's inspector general is investigating whether the agency used any of the information improperly.

The warrantless program monitors phone calls and e-mails between the United States and other countries that are suspected to be linked to agents of al-Qaida. A federal judge in Detroit last August declared the program unconstitutional. Government attorneys have since asked a Cincinnati-based appeals court to dismiss the lawsuit, arguing the case is moot because the surveillance is now monitored by a secret court.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, called it absurd that the White House board effectively gave the eavesdropping program its stamp of approval even before the administration was forced to backtrack and submit it to court oversight.

"I have no confidence in the current board in its ability to provide meaningful evaluation of important programs such as the no-fly lists, based on its work on the domestic surveillance program," he said. "It is critical that Congress make the civil liberties board independent of the executive branch."

The board does not have subpoena power, and the White House can change its annual reports before they go to Congress. The members serve at the pleasure of Bush, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has final say over whether officials must comply with the board's recommendations.

Separate House and Senate measures would require that the entire board — not just the chairman and vice chairman — be confirmed by the Senate.

The House version would also remove the board from the executive office of the president but keep it within the executive branch and give it subpoena power. The Senate version would keep the board within the executive office and allow it to ask the attorney general to issue subpoenas, with notice to Congress required if a subpoena request was refused or modified.

The privacy board members declined to comment on the proposed legislation. But they have made it clear they believe the board works effectively in its current structure and that it could alienate the president if members took on a more openly adversarial role.

Bush appointed Dinkins, a Republican, to chair the board. A longtime friend of the Bush family, she was treasurer of Bush's first campaign for governor of Texas, and she is a longtime partner in the law firm of Vinson & Elkins, where Gonzales was once a partner.

The panel's other GOP members are vice chairman Alan Raul, a Washington attorney, and former U.S. Solicitor General Theodore Olson. Former Ambassador Francis Taylor is an independent.

Experts Want New Definition Of Torture (AP)

By William J. Kole, Associated Press Writer

Prisoners who endure poor or degrading treatment suffer much of the same long-term psychological distress as do captives who are tortured, suggests a study published Monday.

The study was based on interviews with victims of ill treatment and torture while imprisoned in the former Yugoslavia, and experts said the findings underscored the need for a broader definition of torture.

"What is the basis for the distinction between torture and other cruel and degrading treatment? Science should inform this debate," the study's lead author, Metin Basoglu of the Institute of Psychiatry at King's College in London, told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. The study was published in the Archives of General Psychiatry.

Steve H. Miles of the University of Minnesota's Center for Bioethics, who was not involved in the study, said the findings "show that the severity of long-lasting adverse mental effects is unrelated to whether the torture or degrading treatment is physical or psychological."

"The wrongness of these inflicted harms is compounded by the fact that most abused prisoners, including those in the present war on terror, are innocent or ignorant of terrorist activities," Miles said.

The Bush administration has said the U.S. uses legal interrogation techniques — not torture — to gain information that could head off terror attacks. It insists that the U.S. complies with the U.N. Convention Against Torture.

Yet Washington's definition of torture, as interpreted by the U.S. Justice Department after reports of American abuses at Guantanamo Bay and in Iraq and Afghanistan surfaced, is fairly narrow.

It excludes mental pain and suffering created by acts that do not cause severe physical pain, such as blindfolding, hooding, forced nudity, isolation and deprivation of sleep or light, the researchers said, citing a Dec. 30, 2004, Justice Department memo. The document also contends that for an act to be considered torture, there must be proof that it inflicts "prolonged mental harm."

"The implications of such a narrow definition of torture have raised serious concerns in the human rights community," said the study. "These findings suggest that physical pain per se is not the most important determinant of traumatic stress in survivors of torture."

The researchers said they found that aggressive interrogation techniques, humiliating treatment, verbal abuse, threats against a captive's family and being forced to watch an acquaintance being tortured produced much of the same long-term mental trauma as physical torture.

"Sham executions, witnessing torture of close ones, threats of rape, fondling of genitals and isolation were associated with at least as much if not more distress than some of the physical torture stressors," they wrote.

Such experiences were just as likely as physical torture to lead to depression or post-traumatic stress disorder, the study said.

"Ill treatment during captivity ... does not seem to be substantially different from physical torture in terms of the severity of mental suffering they cause," it concluded. "These procedures do amount to torture, thereby lending support to their prohibition by international law."

Shukrije Gashi, a pro-independence activist in Kosovo, was jailed by Yugoslav authorities in 1983 and spent nearly two years as a political prisoner. Strictly speaking, she wasn't tortured, but 2 1/2 decades later it still feels that way, she says.

Gashi was confined to a cramped, unventilated cell and fed small rations of often-rotten food. Allowed to shower just once a month, she endured frequent beatings and verbal abuse.

Today, she still trembles whenever she sees the police. Her ordeal, she says, is "a spiritual burden that stays with you forever."

Gashi copes by writing poetry and running a center for conflict management.

But 24 years later, she still can't erase the indelible memories of what she endured.

"The treatment in prison was horrific," she said. "I remain psychologically burdened. Memories of the violence follow me like a shadow."

US Has No Case For Redefining Torture: Study (AFP)

By Louise Daly

AFP, March 6, 2007

US government attempts to redefine torture are flawed, a new study argued Monday, as psychological torture can inflict the same kind of long term damage on victims as physical torture.

The investigators said their findings undermine moves by the US government to narrow its definition of torture in order to free interrogators to use certain psychological methods aimed at breaking a prisoner's resistance.

"The distinction between torture and degrading treatment is not only useless, but also dangerous," said Steven Miles, professor of bioethics at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, in an accompanying editorial in the journal of the Archives of General Psychiatry.

Researchers who evaluated the mental health of soldiers and civilians tortured during the 1990s Balkan wars found that victims of psychological abuse were just as likely to suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and depression as victims of classic physical torture methods.

The researchers also reported that the torture victims rated some techniques such as stress positions, isolation, sleep deprivation and blindfolding as distressing as most physical torture methods.

"Ill treatment during captivity, such as psychological manipulations, humiliating treatment, and forced stress positions, does not seem to be substantially different from physical torture in terms of the severity of mental suffering they cause," the study's authors wrote.

"Thus, these procedures do amount to torture, thereby lending support to their prohibition by international law," they wrote in the journal.

In 2003, lawyers for the US Justice Department and a Pentagon working group report on detainee interrogations made the case for a narrow definition of torture that excludes procedures such as blindfolding and hooding, forced nudity, isolation and other psychological manipulations.

The Justice Department memorandum argued that the scope of the term torture should be limited to those acts which could be shown to result in "prolonged mental harm," according to the study.

The development followed allegations of human rights abuses at US detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

However, the authors of this paper said that based on their analysis of the experiences of torture victims from the modern Balkans conflict, the US appears to be drawing a distinction without a difference.

They said their analysis of 279 Bosnian, Croatian and Serb torture survivors showed that the individuals who suffered psychological abuse had the same rates of depression, PTSD, and social and work-related problems as others who had endured beatings, burnings, sexual abuse and other forms of physical punishment at the hands of their captors.

They suggested that the trauma is the same, because regardless of the form of aggression, the effect is to create fear or anxiety in the detainee while at the same time removing any form of control from the person in order to create a state of total helplessness.

The study was written by Metin Basoglu, head of trauma studies at the Institute of Psychiatry, King's College, London, with help from colleagues at the department of psychiatry at the Clinical Hospital Zvezdara in Belgrade.

Guantanamo Detainees Ask Supreme Court To Guarantee Legal Rights (AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

AP, March 6, 2007

Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees held more than five years without charges asked the Supreme Court Monday to step in a third time to guarantee that they can challenge their confinement in U.S. courts.

The detainees want the justices to hear their case and issue a decision before the Court ends its term in early summer.

"Not only are these questions of paramount legal importance, but the extreme and worsening plight of the Guantanamo detainees make them questions of great humanitarian urgency as well," lawyers for the detainees wrote in court papers urging the justices to decide the case.

The Court has twice ruled that foreigners imprisoned at the U.S. naval base in Cuba can pursue their cases in American courts, rejecting Bush administration arguments.

The latest Supreme Court appeal follows a federal appeals court ruling last month that limited detainees' legal rights. The 2-1 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld a key provision of the Military Commissions Act, which President George W. Bush pushed through Congress last year to set up a Defense Department system to prosecute terrorism suspects. Now, detainees must prove to three-officer military panels that they don't pose a terror threat.

Separately, the justices said they would not grant quick review in the cases of two other Guantanamo detainees who have been designated by the Pentagon to face criminal charges in front of a military tribunal.

Salim Ahmed Hamdan of Yemen and Omar Khadr, a Canadian, wanted a high court ruling before their military trials take place, possibly as early as this summer.

If the Court agrees to hear the other detainee cases on a fast track, arguments could be held May 7, the detainees lawyers said. The justices could render a decision by the customary end of their term in late June.

The administration does not oppose expedited consideration of the appeals, the lawyers said.

The island prison at the U.S. Navy base on land leased from Cuba has become a rallying cry for international and domestic criticism of administration policy.

Some of the nearly 400 prisoners have been at Guantanamo since the detention facility opened more than five years ago -- after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. A number of detainees have committed suicide.

The administration has argued that legal protections do not apply to foreigners outside American territory and that the Guantanamo prison is beyond the reach of U.S. civilian courts.

Hundreds of people suspected of ties to al-Qaida and the Taliban -- including some teenagers -- had been swept up by the U.S. military and secretly shipped there beginning in 2002.

Many of the detainees were the innocent victims of Afghan and Pakistani bounty hunters who sold them to U.S. forces, lawyers for the detainees have said.

Democrats who took over the House of Representatives and Senate in the elections in November have vowed to rewrite the 2006 law that swept away the detainees' access to U.S. courts. It was enacted by the then-Republican-controlled Congress at the request of the White House.

The Supreme Court has twice thwarted the administration's efforts to keep the detainees out of the courts.

The Bush administration has reacted to each of the two previous rebuffs by undertaking remedial measures.

In 2004, the justices ruled that the courts can hear the detainees' cases, saying that prisoners under U.S. control have access to civilian courts, no matter where they are being held.

In 2006, the justices ruled that Bush's plan for military war crimes trials, planned for a small number of Guantanamo Bay detainees, is illegal under U.S. and international law. The justices also said a law that Congress passed in 2005 to limit federal court lawsuits by Guantanamo detainees did not apply to pending cases.

After the Supreme Court ruling in 2004, the Pentagon set up panels that reviewed whether each of the detainees had been correctly categorized as an enemy combatant and, therefore, not entitled to any legal rights.

After the justices' ruling in 2006, Congress at the urging of the White House enacted the law that blocked detainees from coming into U.S. courts.

Associated Press writer Pete Yost contributed to this report.

Guantanamo Intimidation (WP)

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

CULLY STIMSON may be gone from the Pentagon, but his spirit unfortunately lives on. Mr. Stimson, you may recall, was the Pentagon official in charge of Guantanamo Bay prisoners who had to leave his post after suggesting that private law firms shouldn't be representing detainees. Now the Pentagon's chief Guantanamo prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, has gotten into the attack-the-defense-lawyers act, this time complaining about the conduct of a military lawyer assigned to defend Australian David Hicks, who has been accused of terrorism. Mr. Hicks, who has spent five years at Guantanamo after allegedly being caught fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan, was charged last week with providing material support for terrorism and is to face trial before a military commission.

Mr. Hicks's outspoken military lawyer, Marine Maj. Michael Mori, has spent a good deal of time in Australia helping stir up public support for his client, and he has been unsparing in his criticism of the military tribunals, going so far as to call them kangaroo courts. His needling clearly is getting under the prosecution's skin. "Certainly in the U.S. it would not be tolerated having a U.S. Marine in uniform actively inserting himself into the political process. It is very disappointing to see that happening in Australia, and if that was any of my prosecutors, they would be held accountable," Col. Davis was quoted as telling The Australian newspaper. Col. Davis, though he later said he wasn't suggesting a court-martial, noted that it is a crime under military law for an officer to use "contemptuous words" about high public officials.

Col. Davis's unsubtle effort to quiet Maj. Mori may be even more disturbing than Mr. Stimson's remarks: It's not likely that private law firms are going to be intimidated out of representing their clients, but military lawyers who have to fear for their careers might think twice before zealously representing their clients. "Recent statements attributed to both the defense and prosecution in the David Hicks case do not reflect the views of the Department of Defense," Pentagon press officer Cynthia O. Smith told us when we called for comment. Okay, but it's the prosecution that really needs reining in.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York Officials Urge Renewal Of Federal Terrorism Insurance (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

New York officials urged Congress yesterday to renew a terrorism insurance program set to expire at the end of this year that they said allowed the city's economy to recover and grow in the years after the Sept. 11 terror attack.

The program, created by the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act in 2002 and extended in 2005, was devised when insurers began excluding terrorism from their property policies after Sept. 11, 2001. Under its terms, the federal government would pay most of the cost of losses from a foreign terror attack, up to a total of $100 billion a year. In seeking its renewal, the officials told the House Subcommittee on Capital Markets, Insurance and Government Sponsored Enterprises at a hearing in Manhattan that without it, the city's robust development engine could sputter to a halt.

Senator Charles E. Schumer told the panel gathered at City Hall that the cycle of pending expiration and renewal had created a damaging "fear pattern" among insurers, and he argued that the program should be made permanent or at least cover the next 15 years.

"The closer we get to the expiration, the fewer projects are planned," said Mr. Schumer, Democrat of New York.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg also spoke in support of continuing the program, saying it was crucial to the city's overall economic health.

"Without a doubt, the federal government's terrorism insurance program has been a critical part of New York City's revival and is giving businesses the confidence to move forward with exciting new projects," he said. "But without terrorism risk insurance, none of them would ever get off the ground."

The officials also urged lawmakers to extend the program to cover domestic terrorism and to take into account the possibility of nuclear, biological, chemical and radiological attacks.

Critics have argued that the act was an unneeded gift to the insurance industry and has weakened the marketplace by encouraging insurers to depend on it.

But Eric R. Dinallo, acting superintendent of the State Insurance Department, said that the program helped correct a market dynamic in which insurers would avoid offering coverage, or offer it only at astronomical prices to cover all possible outcomes of unpredictable acts.

Referring to the federal program, Mr. Dinallo said it "doesn't replace the private sector" but "makes private-sector involvement possible."

United States Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, a Democrat who represents parts of Manhattan and Queens and who had requested the hearing in New York, echoed that sentiment. She called the act "an essential tool for providing economic security following a terrorist attack, not a bailout of the insurance industry."

FEDERAL DIARY: Union Proposal For Airport Screeners Stalls At The Gate (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, March 6, 2007

It's almost a replay from five years ago.

The Senate plans to vote today on whether to extend union rights to federal airport screeners, a fundamental question that confronted Congress when it created the Transportation Security Administration after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Following a contentious debate at the time, Congress left union rights to the discretion of the Bush administration, which decided collective bargaining was inappropriate for TSA workers because of national security considerations. Last month, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), brought the issue back, a sign of how the 2006 election has changed congressional priorities.

But the administration is holding firm. Yesterday, at a Senate subcommittee hearing, Kip Hawley, head of the TSA, rejected proposals by Lieberman and Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) that would provide bargaining rights for transportation security officers, popularly called security screeners.

The proposals, Hawley said, pose "a serious negative security impact."

Although unions represent law enforcement officers at the Border Patrol and the U.S. Capitol Police, Hawley said the demands placed on screeners, who work in more than 400 airports, are different than those at other agencies.

"TSA's mission requires that its officers be proactive, that TSOs constantly change what they do and where they do it," he said. "They are required to flex to different places in the airport and to meet suddenly changing security and operating needs."

Providing bargaining rights would allow unions to take grievances to outside arbitrators to review management decisions "after the fact" and "sets up a morass of wasted time that detracts from the focus on security," Hawley said.

The TSA has provided senators with a private briefing on TSA security requirements, using information that cannot be publicly disclosed, Hawley said.

After Hawley's testimony, the Senate panel heard from John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, who said Hawley's concerns were misplaced. Since 2002, AFGE has pushed for the right to bargain on behalf of the TSA employees.

Gage pointed to the union contract with the Capitol Police, which he said permits the police chief to suspend contract provisions on shift assignments, vacations and other workplace matters to meet staffing shortages or emergencies. Gage, who noted that AFGE bargains on behalf of employees at the Defense Department and other agencies with security-related work, suggested the Capitol Police contract could be a model for the TSA.

Union contracts are "bargained in the context of an agency's mission," cannot stop an agency from deploying employees and provide employees with a forum to address unfair treatment, Gage said.

"These are rights," he said. "They should not be taken away lightly."

The hearing was held by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee on the federal workforce, chaired by Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii). He was joined at the hearing by Sens. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), John W. Warner (R-Va.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.).

Coburn suggested the hearing would not make a difference in the Senate's deliberations because the union-rights provision is on the chamber's floor in legislation dealing with unfinished recommendations from the 9/11 commission. "Doing this [hearing] after the fact says a whole lot on how the Senate operates," he said.

Last week, Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) proposed striking the Lieberman provision from the bill. McCaskill, in turn, offered a substitute that would give TSA screeners the right to collective bargaining but make it clear that they cannot strike or negotiate for higher pay.

Her amendment stipulates that screeners must follow agency orders during emergencies and "newly imminent threats." She also would prevent the use of classified or sensitive information in grievance proceedings.

Collins said yesterday that she hopes to win support for a compromise that would guarantee screeners coverage by government-wide whistle-blower protections and that would assure them the right to appeal major disciplinary actions to the Merit Systems Protection Board, an independent agency.

She hinted that her proposal would let senators put off a decision on screener union rights for a year by requiring a review of the TSA personnel system, probably by the Government Accountability Office.

Aides to President Bush have said they will recommend a veto of the bill implementing the 9/11 panel's recommendations if it includes union rights for screeners. Senate Republicans hope to sustain the veto, noting that 36 GOP senators, including Coburn and Warner, have signed a letter to Bush objecting to the union provision.

Unions Vs. Security (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

It's getting to be a full-time job keeping track of the favors that Democrats in Congress are doing for Big Labor. The latest two episodes are especially notable because they'd benefit unions at the expense of national security.

First up is Senator Jim DeMint's (R., S.C.) proposal to bar certain convicted felons from working in ports. Members of Congress professed to be outraged last year when a few U.S. ports would have been managed by Dubai Ports World. But a far larger concern is that 750,000 workers currently have unescorted access to secure port areas, and felons are obvious recruitment targets for any number of bad actors, including terrorists.

Mr. DeMint offered this amendment last year as part of the port security legislation. Democrats unanimously consented to it on the Senate floor, only to gut it later under the cover of a House-Senate conference. This was done at the request of the International Longshore and Warehouse Union, which later bragged about its political clout.

Mr. DeMint was back trying again last week, and every Senate Democrat once again voted for his amendment. However, they also voted for a separate amendment from Hawaii's Daniel Inouye that would allow future Administrations to delete the DeMint requirements. Both amendments now go to House-Senate conference, and with Democrats in the majority it's not hard to guess which one will emerge in the final bill.

Meanwhile, Democrats also keep trying to impose collective bargaining rights for all 43,000 screeners at the Transportation Security Administration. Congress expressly denied such organizing ability when it created TSA in 2001, on the sensible grounds that union work rules would compromise security.

Screeners need to adapt to changing threats, often with random and unpredictable methods. Union rules would require negotiating over these methods with labor chiefs at each work site, meaning at every airport. By TSA's estimate, union rules would also require pulling some 8% of the work force offline to meet new management demands. This would require either closing screening lanes or adding thousands of new screeners at more cost to taxpayers.

Democrats in both the House and Senate have nonetheless tucked TSA unionization provisions into their "9/11 Commission recommendation" bills. The White House has objected, however, and 36 Republican Senators have already promised to sustain a veto. So Democrats are now falling back to Plan B, which is a "compromise" offered last week by new

Missouri Senator Claire McCaskill. Under her approach, airport screeners would still be forced into collective bargaining, though the TSA head would have the right to put union rules aside in case of "emergency" or "imminent threat."

Those concepts could certainly use some fleshing out, since we thought terrorism after 9/11 was threat enough. Mr. DeMint asked on the Senate floor last week if Ms. McCaskill considered the global war on terror to be such an "emergency," and she said no -- but that a hurricane might qualify. We didn't know TSA screened for bad weather.

Mr. DeMint also asked if al Qaeda constituted an imminent threat. Ms. McCaskill largely dodged the question, noting instead that denying union rights because of "world-wide terror" was "specious reasoning." We realize that rookie Senators feel obliged to repay their supporters, but someone more senior should protect Ms. McCaskill from embarrassing herself so publicly. A vote on her amendment is expected as early as today.

All of this follows last week's largely party-line vote in the House to deny workers their long-held right to a secret ballot in organizing elections. The Democratic Presidential candidates are also falling in union line, with Senator Barack Obama recently vowing that he'll sign the secret-ballot ban if he makes it to the White House. John Sweeney and the AFL-CIO sure are getting their money's worth; voters are another story.

Repeal Real ID (USAT)

By Anthony D. Romero

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Real ID should be repealed, especially after the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) released its vague and evasive regulations last week. Rather than answer the hard questions and provide solid guidance, DHS told the states to find solutions by 2010, effectively passing the hot potato to the next administration.

Real ID's passage wasn't a true democratic process. A backroom deal attached it to a must-pass Iraq war/tsunami relief bill. No hearings. No debate. It lacks legitimacy from not having been studied, debated, considered and directly voted upon.

That democratic scrutiny would have shown that Real ID is an unfunded mandate that violates the Constitution's 10th Amendment on state powers, destroys states' dual sovereignty and consolidates every American's private information, leaving all of us far more vulnerable to identity thieves.

On privacy, DHS punted again by saying it "believes that it would be outside its authority to address this issue within this rulemaking" and encouraging the states to come up with a solution.

Real ID is not a solution that can stop terrorism. Clever and resourceful "terrorists" will always find ways to get IDs.

Twenty-three state governments so far have recognized how bad the law is and have repudiated Real ID in various legislative actions using strong terms such as repeal, prohibit, oppose, protest and delay. The federal government can't simply drop "terrorism" into dubious legislation and make us all stop thinking rationally.

Last week, DHS admitted Real ID will cost much more to implement than state legislators estimated in a comprehensive study. Instead of $11 billion, the cost to the states will range from $10.7 billion to $14.6 billion, plus individuals will have to cover an additional $7.8 billion, raising the price tag to as much as $22.4 billion.

Congress is taking credit for "solving" national security problems by forcing unachievable solutions onto states and giving them very little to do it. DHS made matters worse last week by releasing regulations that fail to address concerns about Real ID's impact on the states and constitutional rights.

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Khalid Al-Midhar and Hani Hanjour, the al-Qaeda hijackers who crashed American Airlines Flight 77 into the Pentagon, obtained the paperwork needed for their Virginia driver's licenses by paying $100 to an illegal immigrant in a convenience store parking lot. Five other 9/11 terrorists also had licenses from Virginia, although none lived there. With the fraudulently obtained IDs, the hijackers were able to rent cars and board planes to carry out their murderous plot.

As any underage drinker knows, getting a phony driver's license isn't difficult. But the stakes of tolerating fake IDs extend far beyond teenagers trying to buy beer. "For terrorists, travel documents are as important as weapons," the 9/11 Commission noted in calling for national standards to make driver's licenses more uniform and tamper-proof.

In response, Congress passed the Real ID Act in 2005, setting minimum standards for licenses and state-issued ID cards. Last week, after much delay and debate, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) issued proposed rules for implementing the law. If your state doesn't follow the rules, you won't be able to use your license as ID to get on a plane or into a federal building.

Real ID has produced much howling about the costs, the likely hassles at state motor vehicle departments and the potential threat to privacy. All are valid concerns. But the fact is that driver's licenses are the nation's principal form of ID. As long as that's the case, they need to be credible.

•It won't make the nation safer. True, there's no guarantee that the law would have stopped the 9/11 hijackers and that determined terrorists won't find a way around the new requirements. Averting terror attacks, however, requires layers of security. Credible IDs are an important layer.

•It costs too much. Motorists will have to spend an estimated $20 more, a relatively small sum for a standardized, tamper-proof license. For states, the costs are estimated at up to $14.6 billion over five years, offset by as much as $100 million in federal grants this year alone , on top of $40 million in federal aid already provided. Governors can make a case for more help, but cost-sharing arguments shouldn't stop the program from going forward.

•It violates privacy. The creation of large databases always is reason to be wary. But the new regulations don't create a national ID card or giant Big Brother-like federal database. States will still issue the licenses and retain information used to verify identity. Making an existing database more credible threatens privacy far less than many private sector data collections do.

•It forces illegal immigrants to drive without licenses or insurance. Illegal immigrants won't be able to get Real ID licenses, but states will be allowed to issue permits allowing them to drive and obtain insurance. In any event, the nation's immigration problems require a comprehensive solution in Washington; they can't be solved at state motor vehicle departments.

•It's too hasty. This is just absurd. DHS gave states until the end of 2009 to have programs in place to replace all licenses by 2013 — a sluggish 12 years after the 9/11 attacks.

Each day that driver's licenses lack credibility is a day of needless vulnerability. As DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff told Congress last month, "If we don't get it done now, someone's going to be sitting around in three or four years explaining to the next9/11 Commission why we didn't do it."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats Alter Plan To Restrict Iraq War (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Senior House Democrats, seeking to placate members of their party from Republican-leaning districts, are pushing a plan that would place restrictions on President Bush's ability to wage the war in Iraq but would allow him to waive them if he publicly justifies his position.

Under the proposal, Bush would also have to set a date to begin troop withdrawals if the Iraqi government fails to meet benchmarks aimed at stabilizing the country that the president laid out in January.

The plan is an attempt to bridge the differences between anti-war Democrats, led by Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), who have wanted to devise standards of troop readiness strict enough to force Bush to delay some deployments and bring some troops home, and Democrats wary of seeming to place restrictions on the president's role as commander in chief.

The legislative jujitsu in the backrooms of Capitol Hill underscores the difficulties the Democrats face in confronting the issue that helped them regain control of Congress -- Iraq. Democrats passed a resolution in February opposing Bush's deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, but Murtha's proposal to go a step further by restricting deployment to troops deemed to be adequately trained and equipped elicited a fierce response from Republicans, while also dividing the Democratic caucus.

The new plan would demand that Bush certify that combat troops meet the military's own standards of readiness, which are routinely ignored. The president could then waive such certifications if doing so is in "the national interest."

Democrats hope the waiver and benchmark proposals, whose details were confirmed by aides and senior Democrats close to the House Appropriations Committee and leadership, will keep the policymaking responsibilities on Bush. That should allow the committee to move forward next week with a $100 billion war spending bill.

"They're going to end up where they should have started a long time ago: You set readiness requirements, time-in-country requirements, time-in-rotation requirements as policy, then grant the president waivers and demand why it's so important for him to violate these principles," said a senior Democrat close to the Appropriations Committee. "It's all part of military regulations now. You have to elevate that to the policy of the country."

But any dilution of Murtha's original proposal is likely to infuriate the antiwar wing of the party, which wants dramatic action now. After a conference call yesterday, antiwar and labor groups all but gave up on Murtha's approach, concluding they could only support a war-funding "supplemental" bill if it contains a deadline for withdrawing troops.

Participants -- including the Service Employees International Union, MoveOn.org, Win Without War and the Iraq veterans group VoteVets -- insisted there would be more support for a straightforward approach to ending the war than the roundabout efforts Murtha champions.

"A timeline will make a vote for the supplemental a vote to end the war and a vote against it a vote for war without end," said Tom Matzzie, Washington director of MoveOn.org Political Action.

That conclusion mirrors the judgment of even some of the Democrats the proposal was meant to attract. One conservative lawmaker, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of angering Democratic leaders, dismissed Murtha's approach as "too cute by half."

Democratic leaders are not likely to embrace a straightforward legislative timetable. But they hope the adoption of the benchmarks will win over antiwar groups.

Under those benchmarks, which Bush laid out in a speech to the nation Jan. 10, the Iraqi government would have to take responsibility for security in all of Iraq's provinces by November, and adopt and implement oil-revenue-sharing legislation. The government would also have to spend $10 billion of Iraq's money on job-creating reconstruction and infrastructure projects; hold new provincial elections this year; liberalize laws that purged Baath Party members from the government; and establish a fairer process for amending the Iraqi constitution.

If those benchmarks are not met, Democrats would demand Bush submit to Congress a timetable for withdrawing troops, leadership aides said. The idea is to force Bush to abide by his own promises but to make sure he remains responsible for conducting and ending the war.

In the Senate, Democratic leaders are drafting a resolution that would drastically narrow the scope of the military mission in Iraq to that of a support role, with the emphasis on counterterrorism activities. The effort is expected to last most of the week, with debate starting on the Senate floor as early as next week.

But unlike last month, when nonbinding language expressing opposition to Bush's troop increase plan was blocked by GOP procedural objections, Democrats this time intend to give Republicans broad latitude to offer their own Iraq-related measures. If Republicans go along, the result could be a remarkably robust and wide-open debate -- but nothing of consequence is likely to pass.

The Politico, March 6, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is facing a full-blown revolt from liberal House Democrats over the $98 billion Iraq supplemental bill, according to Democratic insiders. Anywhere between 50 to 75 Democrats are now threatening to vote against the bill because it doesn't go far enough toward ending the war, including setting a date certain for withdrawal of U.S. combat forces from Iraq, said the sources. Pelosi and Democratic leaders are expected to postpone markup of the Iraq bill in the House Appropriations Committee by at least a week in order to buy time to resolve the matter.

Liberals are unhappy with the current proposal being discussed by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) and the Democratic leadership, which would prevent President Bush from sending more troops to Iraq unless they are certified as being properly equipped, trained and rested to take on combat missions. After weeks of political attacks from Republicans, Murtha softened his original proposal so that Bush can waive the requirements, although the White House would have to report to Congress why they are issuing such waivers. The Blue Dog Coalition, a group of moderate and conservative Democrats from swing districts, also wanted Murtha to soften his proposal.

But as happens so often in politics, if you move too far in appeasing one group, you then alienate another, which is what's happening here. Liberals Dems now don't want to vote for the Iraq supplemental, with many pointing out to Pelosi and party leaders that they never have voted for one before and aren't about to start doing so now just because Democrats are in the majority. These Democrats also want to offer their own alternative proposal to cut off Iraq funding immediately as an amendment to the supplemental on the House floor, said Democratic leadership aides.

Liberals Democrats like Rep. Maxine Waters (Calif.), co-chairwoman of the Out of Iraq Caucus, want to end the war now, so they want a date certain for a withdrawal or pullout or "strategic redeployment," and they want it in the Iraq supplemental or they won't vote for it. "They figure that we won the election on a promise to end the war, and they want to live up to that promise," said a senior House Democratic lawmaker who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "It's a tough place the speaker is in right now, but we'll work all this out."

Pelosi has a bit of a problem here. If the Democratic leadership puts a date certain for withdrawal in the bill, there's a chance that enough Blue Dogs Democrats would defect and vote with Republicans, meaning the bill could down for defeat outright. While that might suit anti-war lawmakers and groups. the political consequences could be disastrous for the party. It would end the Iraq war by default since there would be no more money for combat operations, and Republicans would punish the Democrats for years over it.

But if she leaves out a date-certain withdrawal, Pelosi may lose her left, and that's her power base, both within the Democratic Caucus and the party at large. She faces a very ticklish task sorting the whole thing out, although the senior Democrat lawmaker isn't worried. Pelosi "will get everyone on board at the end of the day," the lawmaker insisted.

The House Democratic Caucus will met at 12 p.m. on Tuesday, and Iraq will be at the top of the agenda, according to Democratic sources.

Consensus Slow To Build On Iraq Supplemental (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, March 6, 2007

As House Democratic leaders continue their attempts to craft a supplemental spending bill that limits the Iraq War while continuing to fund it, both liberal and conservative Democrats signaled that they might be willing to be team players if leaders accommodate them in small ways.

As of Monday evening, the chances of committee action on a bill this week were slipping away and it was unclear whether House Democratic leaders would include language, first proposed by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), to restrict in some way the president's ability to deploy troops to Iraq unless he publicly acknowledges that he is sending troops into combat without meeting certain readiness requirements.

However, one House Democratic leadership aide indicated that the bill most likely would include a provision requiring the president to report to Congress on whether the benchmarks he set out for the Iraqi government are being met. And there were other indications Monday that House Democratic leaders were considering language requiring the president to seek Congressional approval for any military action against Iran.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) huddled with her leadership team Monday afternoon in an attempt to manage the competing forces within the party and devise a $100 billion-plus war spending bill that could be ready for floor action as early as next week.

On his way into the strategy session, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said the decision on how or whether to try to rein in the Iraq War was "a moving target, but we may come to a consensus. That's why we keep talking."

Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said he believes "that on the core pieces, we have a Caucus consensus."

He said Democrats broadly agree that any "conditionality" on the president's use of funds should be focused on getting the Iraqi government to take over many of the operations currently being performed by U.S. soldiers.

Emanuel said a majority of Democrats believe that more money should go to the war in Afghanistan because "that's where al Qaida is." In fact, several Democratic sources indicated that appropriators had decided to shift some funds from the Iraq conflict to the re-emergent terrorist elements in Afghanistan.

Emanuel also said Democrats are committed to making sure the troops "have all the funding and equipment they need."

Even if a consensus is forming, it appears less likely that the overall bill will be ready for committee action this week. Because the limitations on war funding are not the only unresolved issues in the bill, House Democratic sources said it appeared increasingly unlikely that a draft would be ready by the end of today. That means that a possible Friday markup would be out of the question, considering House rules that require three days between a bill introduction and committee consideration.

Having the committee markup next week would put a significant time crunch on House leaders, but they could always waive the three-day waiting period for bills that come out of committee and are headed for the floor, sources indicated.

Additionally, the White House threw a wrench into the works Monday by indicating that it would send up a modified request for war funds as early as today, according to The Associated Press. The AP noted that the new request likely would be about $2 billion more than the nearly $94 billion for the Iraq War requested earlier this year and would specifically fund the president's controversial plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

Still, Democratic leaders appeared to be getting a little breathing room within the Caucus on Monday, as liberal Members began indicating that the House leadership could mitigate defections from the left by allowing a vote on an amendment to require the Pentagon to use the $100 billion to withdraw troops from Iraq and not for further combat missions.

One knowledgeable House Democratic aide said members of the Progressive Caucus might be more inclined to vote for the war-funding bill if they first were allowed to vote against such funding, considering that the amendment to fund a withdrawal is almost certain to fail.

"I think you'd see more sort of accommodation," said the aide, who noted that some liberals would still end up voting against the bill. "There are a certain number of Members who've never supported a supplemental for Iraq."

The Progressive Caucus has set up its own whip operation to find out where its 71 members stand on Iraq War funding and the proposals being floated by members of the Democratic leadership, the aide said.

"We feel this is an opportunity to flex our muscles," the aide said.

Meanwhile, conservative Democrats, particularly those in the Blue Dog Coalition, may be willing to swallow some limits on the president — with a waiver — if the leadership also adopted the language of their manifesto for providing accountability for the ballooning costs of the war.

Blue Dogs have introduced a resolution that would demand periodic reports from the Defense Department inspector general and the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction on how the nearly $400 billion already appropriated for the war has been spent.

The resolution also calls for the creation of a commission to conduct ongoing studies of government contractors in Iraq, insists that war funding should be conducted through the regular appropriations process, and asks the Bush administration to condition any further U.S. "financial, military and political resources" on the Iraqi government taking over police duties in country.

While noting that the Blue Dog Coalition as a whole has not taken a position on whether to set conditions on war funds, one aide to a coalition Member said including the resolution in the supplemental would "go a long way to making [the bill] a lot more palatable."

With Republican leaders threatening to whip against the supplemental if it includes any sort of funding restrictions — even those with a presidential waiver — Democrats can afford to lose only 15 of their own on the vote or risk seeing the bill fail in a highly public House floor vote.

In the meantime, Democratic leaders cautioned that language limiting the president on Iraq was not the only issue unresolved on the bill, given that Democratic leaders decided to include additional funding for hurricane relief in the Gulf Coast, for agriculture disasters and for a shortfall in poor children's health care programs.

"It's a major piece of legislation, and there's a lot of t's to cross and i's to dot," said one senior House Democratic aide.

And details of the bill remained under wraps Monday.

"We won't be releasing any details until we have a final package, and we don't have a final package," said Kirsten Brost, spokeswoman for House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.).

Testing Time For Democrats (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The story of the new Congress is actually two stories. Democratic leaders and their grass-roots supporters will decide in the coming days which narrative will prevail.

In January, Democrats dominated the news, the public agenda and the Republicans. In the last weeks of February, the Republicans came back -- not by offering grand proposals but by using the limited tools they have to prove that Democrats don't have enough power, yet, to end the war in Iraq.

When they took control, Democrats looked crisp and disciplined, attributes not normally associated with their party. Speaker Nancy Pelosi's House quickly passed the Democrats' popular campaign promises, including measures on the minimum wage, stem cell research, renewable energy and reforms of the student loan and Medicare prescription drug programs.

This agenda had its skeptics, but it provided focus for a party long out of power and drew significant Republican defections, feeding a raft of "Republicans in Disarray" stories. Pelosi noted at a January news conference that so many Republicans voted for the Democratic proposals that one of her colleagues joked: "Maybe you made these bills too easy."

The Senate Democrats quickly pushed through a different version of the minimum-wage increase, and the party's leading foreign policy voices framed a critique of President Bush's Iraq policy that squared with the public's increasingly skeptical view of the war.

But recent weeks have held nothing but trouble for Democrats -- and it is odd, as one Democrat noted, that they should be on the defensive when the scandal over the treatment of wounded veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center has focused attention on yet another failed aspect of the administration's execution of the war and its aftermath.

Instead, one news story after another has highlighted differences among congressional Democrats over how to end the war. There is also the divide between the Washington party and activists at the grass roots and in the blogosphere. All of these problems are rooted in two unalterable facts: Democrats, on the basis of their thin majorities in Congress, lack the numbers to force an unwilling president to alter his course. And they are short of votes to cut off funds for the war altogether.

This week could well determine whether Democrats splinter or find a new strategy on Iraq based on the unhappy but realistic assumption that -- unless Bush suddenly opens himself to new approaches -- the fight to change course in Iraq is likely to go on all this year, and perhaps into the next.

The premise of any strategy, said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic caucus, must be that "a lot of people were overshooting the runway on what one piece of legislation could accomplish." Emanuel was referring to the effort of war critics to achieve too many of their goals all at once through the supplemental appropriations bill for Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Illinois Democrat (whose commitment to gradualism has won him some enemies in antiwar ranks) said House Democrats will attempt this week to narrow their focus to three problems they can address through the supplemental bill. They will add funds for the war in Afghanistan, to make the point that the president's proposal "misses the mark" when it comes to defeating al-Qaeda. They will place clear demands on the Iraqi government to prove its effectiveness. And they will "give the troops what they're supposed to have, whether it's training or equipment."

Among some of the staunchest congressional foes of the war, there is a growing awareness of the obstacles they face. Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), an antiwar hero, sent an important message to his allies when he said Sunday on " Meet the Press" that "we don't have the votes" to cut off funding for the war.

Murtha is expected to offer a long-promised proposal this week that would impose readiness requirements on all troops sent to Iraq. But in an attempt to pick up moderate and perhaps even Republican votes, Murtha will add a provision allowing Bush to waive the requirement -- putting the burden on the president to explain why he is sending troops into harm's way with inadequate rest and training.

Democrats and the left face a testing time. For some in the antiwar movement, failing to end the war right now is immoral. But as Murtha suggested, a short-term strategy to end the war can't work. This is a long struggle, and those engaged in it need to battle for the long term.

White House Likely To Update War Request (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

The White House is ready to ask Congress for more money for President Bush's plan — already hotly debated — to send 21,500 new combat troops into Iraq.

The move would pay for support personnel and otherwise update last month's request for the Iraq war. It probably will draw criticism from Democrats who say the Pentagon had low-balled estimates of the costs of Bush's plan for improving security in Baghdad and Anbar province.

The latest request could come as early as Tuesday, modifying last month's $93.4 billion request for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan through Sept. 30.

Though the changes may be relatively modest, they nonetheless are embarrassing to the White House and the Pentagon, which earlier dismissed criticism from lawmakers that the original $5.6 billion estimate for the troop buildup was too low.

Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England told the Senate Budget Committee last week that about 6,000 additional support personnel — such as headquarters staff, military police, and medical personnel — would be needed to complement the 21,500 additional combat troops.

Hours after England testified, White House Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten paid a rare visit to the Capitol to press Senate GOP leaders for the additional money.

The modified request was being finalized Monday, said administration and congressional aides. In addition to the money for increased troop strength, the White House will press for more dollars to battle the Taliban's resurgence in Afghanistan and get mine-resistant vehicles.

The request probably will come to about $2 billion. It will be accompanied by equal-sized reductions to elsewhere in the larger request, which contained money for two next-generation Joint Strike Fighters and a V-22 tilt rotor aircraft.

At the same time, lawmakers have signaled they will provide an additional $3 billion to put in place the latest round of military base closings. The military base money — cut from the president's budget when Democrats pushed through a huge spending bill last month — has the strong support of the administration.

In addition to concerns about Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, Democrats say the Pentagon has underestimated the cost of the new mission. The $5.6 billion price covers deployment of combat troops through Sept. 30.

Typically, it takes 5,500 support troops for a 4,000 combat brigade, according to the Congressional Budget Office. But the Defense Department says the most recent addition of troops will require far fewer support troops because a sizable support infrastructure is in place in Baghdad and Anbar province.

Democrats are looking at the must-pass supplemental spending bill as a way of attaching their domestic initiatives. They include farm disaster aid, money for a children's health insurance program and improvements to levees around New Orleans.

Only 28% Think U.S. Will Win In Iraq (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

DOJ_NMG_0140536

WASHINGTON — A new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows deepening pessimism on Iraq, even as many Americans are reluctant to limit money or troops for the war effort.

Only 28% say the United States will probably or definitely win the war, down from 35% in December and the lowest since the question was first asked in September 2005. The share of people who now call the war a mistake is 59% — the same as September 2005 and the highest level in the 58 times the question has been asked since the war began.

RESULTSComplete poll results

The poll asked about proposals circulating on Capitol Hill as Congress weighs how to exert influence on President Bush's Iraq policy. House Democrats could unveil their plans this week.

Six in 10 people said they want Congress to set a timetable to withdraw all U.S. troops by the end of 2008. Three-quarters said Congress should require that U.S. troops come home if Iraqi leaders don't keep pledges to reduce violence, and that U.S. troops have at least a year's stay in the USA between deployments to Iraq. The mandatory break is part of a plan by Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa.

At the same time, six in 10 people said they don't want Congress to deny funding for additional troops to be sent to Iraq. A slim majority, 52%, said they don't want lawmakers to revoke the authority they gave Bush in 2002 to use military force in Iraq.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., a presidential candidate and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is pushing to revoke that authority. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., another White House candidate, wants to cap troop levels in Iraq. That idea won support from 54% in the poll.

Linda Fowler, a government professor at Dartmouth College, said there's some recent evidence of a decline in violence in Baghdad, "but that doesn't seem to have penetrated the public consciousness."

Fowler said that is because of other developments such as "wrenching stories" about National Guard and Reserve troops going off on their second and third tours of duty, and the turmoil at Walter Reed Army Medical Center "reminding people that we are asking a great deal of our soldiers and not properly taking care of them."

Bush's approval rating in the new poll was 33%, while 63% disapproved of his performance. That was a slight dip from last month, when 37% approved and 59% disapproved.

The latest poll showed a partisan divide. Majorities of Democrats supported every step to limit or wind down the war. Majorities of Republicans supported only the year-long break for Guard and Reserve troops and withdrawing troops if Iraqi officials don't reduce violence.

Reviving The Vietnam War (USAT)

By Jonah Goldberg

USA Today, March 6, 2007

There's a deep irony to the Democratic Party's dilemma over Iraq. For 30 years, the party's left-wing base has reflexively proclaimed every foreign policy challenge "another Vietnam." These voices rise and fall with America's fortunes. In 1991, again in 2003 and ever since, they've insisted Iraq is Arabic for Vietnam. They also claimed that Afghanistan was Pashtun for Vietnam. There were even some who insisted Kosovo was Serbo-Croatian for Vietnam and, of course, Nicaragua, El Salvador and Grenada were each feared to be Spanish for Vietnam. Like the old saw about Eskimos having a hundred words for snow, it seemed that anyplace the United States sends troops creates a new word for Vietnam.

Indeed, two years ago — when the air was already thick with Vietnam clichés — I wrote in this space, "You get the sense that Earth could be invaded by Klingons and some editorialist would hear 'echoes of Vietnam' amidst their disruptor blasts."

So it shouldn't be as surprising as it seems to be that, lo and behold, the Democrats are behaving as if Iraq is Vietnam all over again. But it is only now dawning on the Democrats that the Vietnam War wasn't exactly their finest hour.

The Democratic pickle is exquisitely simple: In the past election, they ran as the anti-war party and promised to bring the war to a close, but, like the dog who finally catches the car fender, they're at a loss about what to do now. As Virginia's Rep. Jim Moran says of his fellow Democrats, they "want to make sure this is still President Bush's war," but the only way they can end the war is to take possession of it. The Democratic base thinks that'd be fine. But, one gets the sense, someone in the party's leadership understands that might be a problem.

The Democrats are incapable of escaping the gravitational pull of the Vietnam myths they've nurtured for decades. At the same time, the liberal memory of the Vietnam War has become so gauzy and saccharine with nostalgia that they're unprepared to grapple with the downsides of their own all-purpose analogy. All that seems to matter is proving that the Iraq war not only has been lost but must be lost, lest the Vietnam worldview be invalidated. As my colleague Rich Lowry said in regard to Pennsylvania Democrat John Murtha's effort to sneakily thwart the Bush surge: "It used to be that the war had to end because it was a failure; now it must fail so that it can end." For example, Massachusetts' Sen. Edward Kennedy ridicules the notion that a withdrawal from Iraq would have grave humanitarian costs.

"I heard the same kinds of suggestions at the time of the end of the Vietnam War," Kennedy told NBC's Tim Russert, mocking the notion that we'd have a "great bloodbath" with more than 100,000 dead. "And for those of us that were strongly opposed to the war, (we) heard those same kinds of arguments."

Yes, but those arguments were right. Our withdrawal from Vietnam did contribute to a great bloodbath. More than a half-million Vietnamese died at sea fleeing the grand peace Kennedy and his colleagues orchestrated. And more than 1.2 million Cambodians died at the hands of the Khmer Rouge, thanks to the power vacuum created by our "humanitarian" withdrawal. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., a presidential candidate, insists that a U.S. withdrawal from Iraq can't make things any worse. In 1975 he took a similar line: "The greatest gift our country can give to the Cambodian people is peace, not guns. And the best way to accomplish that goal is by ending military aid now." Someone rent Dodd a DVD of The Killing Fields.

Of course, the costs of defeat in Vietnam were hardly just humanitarian. America's loss at the hands of a small, comparatively weaker nation arguably prolonged the Cold War and has long served as an emboldening example to enemies eager to believe Uncle Sam has a glass jaw — from Saddam Hussein to Osama bin Laden.

In the wake of 9/11, Ayman al-Zawahri, bin Laden's lieutenant, warned: "O, American people, your government is leading you to a new losing war. O, U.S. people, your government was defeated in Vietnam and fled scared from Lebanon. It fled from Somalia."

The Democratic Party itself — once the leader in vigorous internationalism — has since Vietnam been perceived as fundamentally unreliable on foreign policy by many American voters. Indeed, someone in the party recognizes this, which is why Democrats are working so hard to avoid being seen as the primary authors of U.S. defeat in Iraq, the way they were perceived after the Vietnam War.

The New Yorker's George Packer wrote in 2004 that since its experience with Vietnam, "the Democratic Party has had no foreign policy." Though Democrats were eager to spout the language of liberal internationalism in the 1990s, Packer noted, the Clinton administration nonetheless "allowed a genocidal war to bleed away in the Balkans for two-and-a-half years before acting to end it."

I don't think it's fair to say the Democrats have had no foreign policy — it's more that they've had lots of them. But Packer's invocation of Clinton's intervention in the Balkans illuminates an important point. Today, liberals proudly tout the Yugoslavian campaign as nigh upon the sole proof that Democrats believe America can use its military power as a force for good. Forgotten are the anti-war left's opposition to an American empire, Clinton's circumvention of the United Nations (at least Bush had U.N. resolutions to back him up), or the ups-and-downs of public opinion. All people remember is victory.

If President Bush's surge is successful, odds are Americans will think it was all worth it. If, on the other hand, the Democrats are successful at ending the war in defeat, it's not at all clear Americans will see our loss as the unambiguous triumph Kennedy remembers in Vietnam. Nor is it clear they'll congratulate Democrats for securing a sure defeat rather than chancing a possible victory.

Bomb Hits Baghdad Book Mart (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen,

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

A suicide attacker kills 30 at the longtime haunt of the Iraqi cultured set.

BAGHDAD — For decades, the Mutanabi Street book mart was a feeding ground for Iraq's intellectuals, serving up a rich menu of history and philosophy texts, novels and biographies, and atlases and manuscripts to the Middle East's most voracious readers.

On Monday, it proved yet another rich target for a suicide bomber, who left 30 dead and 60 wounded in one more grisly attack that evaded Baghdad's security crackdown.

The bomber detonated a sedan packed with explosives while sitting in a traffic jam in the area, shattering what had been a crystalline spring day.

The explosion left shoppers and sellers screaming and crying amid burning cars, pools of blood and bodies of the dead and injured. Notebooks and stationery fluttered in the air before scattering to the ground.

The incident was the latest to underscore the difficulty faced by U.S. and Iraqi forces as they try to stem sectarian violence here, and it raised questions about how long certain factions, such as Shiite Muslim militias, would continue to comply with the new security plan before taking revenge.

In Salahuddin province, north of Baghdad, six American soldiers were killed by an explosion near their vehicle, the military said. It said three other soldiers were wounded in the attack on a Task Force Lightning patrol conducting combat operations.

In Diyala province, northeast of the capital, three more soldiers from the same task force were killed in a similar attack, a separate announcement said.

The nine deaths would bring the number of American military personnel killed in the Iraq theater since the conflict began in 2003 to 3,184, according to a count by icasualties.org.

Around the capital Monday, police found the bodies of 25 men who had been shot to death, a number higher than in recent days and approaching the pre-crackdown average.

Since the operation was launched Feb. 13, it has seen some success in reducing such death squad killings, which are believed to be the work of Shiite militias.

Bombings at sites where people congregate, seen by the U.S. as largely the work of Sunni Arab insurgents, continue to occur virtually every day, and so far the bolstered forces in Baghdad have been largely powerless to stop them.

"The notion of deterring attacks depends on a rational adversary who does not want to die," said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va. "If you are facing a spiritually motivated zealot who associates martyrdom with success, deterrence will not work."

Iraqi security officials and policymakers acknowledge that they face a difficult task trying to head off attacks on civilians in crowded areas, but they say the job can be done with aggressive intelligence work targeting insurgents and through technology that detects car and belt bombs, as well as through political negotiations.

"Of course, stopping the car bombs is more difficult than stopping the assassinations," said Ammar Tuma, a lawmaker with the largely Shiite Al Fadila al Islamiya party who sits on the Iraqi parliament's security committee. Still, he said, "I'm optimistic of the capability of the plan to reduce these terrorist attacks."

In recent days, U.S.-led military forces have launched long-delayed efforts to establish regular security patrols in Sadr City, a Shiite slum of Baghdad that is home to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr and the Al Mahdi militia that is loyal to him. The operation has been one of the most delicate undertakings of the new security plan because of the volatility of Sadr's followers, who have been relatively safe under the watchful eyes of the Al Mahdi. U.S. and Iraqi forces conducted operations in the district again Monday without incident.

Downtown Baghdad was another story.

Iraqis have long held a reputation as the Middle East's bibliophiles; as an Arabic saying goes, "Egypt writes, Beirut prints and Baghdad reads." Occupying several streets of a cultural district around what had been an Ottoman Empire garrison, the Mutanabi book mart once offered virtually everything a reader could want.

But since the fall of Saddam Hussein four years ago, visitors to the mart have found it dominated by religious texts, particularly those of the majority Shiites.

"Destruction was everywhere," said Haydar Jassim, a 22-year-old who works at a nearby shoe store.

"It was rush hour at that time, and many people were preparing themselves to do their noon prayers."

Namir Abdul-Kadhum, 42, who sells stationery from a roadside kiosk, was hit in the head and eye by shrapnel and suffered a burned hand when the bomb exploded about 20 yards away. He lost consciousness and awoke at Kindi Hospital.

"As I was at my stand, I felt and heard a powerful blast," he said. "I was pushed and thrown away."

At least six Shiite pilgrims marking the anniversary of a 7th century imam's death were killed in separate attacks, including a drive-by shooting, a suicide bombing and a roadside explosion.

"I saw the flags that the pilgrims were carrying thrown on the ground, and blood was everywhere," said Wissam Khadhum, a technician at a nearby oil refinery who saw one of the attacks, an ambush on pilgrims as they crossed Baghdad's Dora Bridge.

"I saw two men lying dead on the ground by the fire of the gunmen from the orchard areas, others injured, and some were safe," he said, adding that it appeared to be a well-coordinated attack timed for when the pilgrims had reached the center of the bridge.

Baghdad Car Bomb Kills 20 On Booksellers' Row (NYT)

By Edward Wong And Wissam A. Habeeb

BAGHDAD, March 5 — The book market along Mutanabi Street was a throwback to the Baghdad of old, the days of students browsing for texts, turbaned clerics hunting down religious tomes and cafe intellectuals debating politics over backgammon.

Somehow it survived the war, until Monday, when a powerful suicide car bomb hit the market, slicing through the heart of the capital's intellectual scene. It killed at least 20 people and wounded more than 65.

In the hours after the noontime explosion, books and stationery, some tied in charred bundles, littered the block. Plumes of black smoke billowed above ornate buildings dating to the Ottoman Empire. The storied Shahbandar cafe, where elderly writers puffed away the afternoon on water pipes, lay in ruins.

Firefighters unleashed powerful sprays of water, only to have flames reignite because the paper had been transformed into kindling.

This part of Baghdad dates back centuries, to the era when the Abbasid caliphate ruled over the Islamic world. On Monday, victims lacerated by shrapnel were carried over shards of glass to waiting ambulances.

"There are no Americans or Iraqi politicians here — there are only Iraqi intellectuals who represent themselves and their homeland, plus stationery and book dealers," said Abdul Baqi Faidhullah, 61, a poet who frequently visits the street. "Those who did this are like savage machines intent on harvesting souls and killing all bright minds."

The bombing was the latest of a half-dozen major blasts aimed at civilians in the capital in the three weeks since the Iraqi government and American military announced the start of a new Baghdad security drive. The number of gunshot killings attributed to sectarian death squads appears to have dropped as militia leaders have ordered their followers to lie low. But deadly bombings have continued with ferocity.

American officials have said they are still struggling to tamp down the bombings and intend to bring thousands of additional troops into Baghdad in the next two months.

Many of the major bombings have taken place in central Baghdad, where Iraqi Army and police checkpoints have proliferated since Feb. 14, the start of the security drive, or in neighborhoods patrolled by Americans.

A bombing on Feb. 25 at a campus of Mustansiriya University, near Mutanabi Street in central Baghdad, killed at least 40 people, many of them students of business or economics. On Feb. 18, just two days after Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki called the opening stage of the security drive a "dazzling success," two bombs ripped through a market in the New Baghdad neighborhood, where American soldiers had been on patrol just minutes earlier, killing at least 60 people.

None of those bombings have had the symbolic resonance of the one on Mutanabi Street, the embodiment of Baghdad's venerable intellectual history. Avid readers could find novels by the Egyptian writer Naguib Mahfouz and Newsweek magazines from the 1960s. Merchants often spread their wares out on the sidewalk, down the block from a building used for administration by Ottoman-era officials and, after World War I, British colonial officers.

Religious texts, particularly on Shiite ideology, began to appear after the toppling of Saddam Hussein, who had banned them from markets across Baghdad. The conversations at the Shahbandar cafe blossomed into free expressions of political opinion. The cafe became popular with foreign reporters seeking comments from Iraqi intellectuals on the changes roiling Iraqi society.

But commerce along Mutanabi Street began to decline last summer after the Iraqi government imposed a citywide curfew every Friday for security reasons, making it tough to get to Mutanabi on its traditional market day.

An Iraqi colonel on the scene on Monday said the suicide car bomb, which was loaded with gas cylinders, had left a crater more than nine feet deep in the middle of the street. At least 20 cars were set ablaze.

"Those terrorists do not represent Islam," said Wissam Arif, 45, an engineer and eager browser of the book market. "They are fighting science. They hate the light of science and scientists. Haven't they killed hundreds of prophets and intellectuals?

"Yesterday they killed the prophets and today they are killing the books. But hopefully the just, the science and the light will win. We'll be patient until we achieve victory."

There are fewer and fewer public spaces where one can retreat from the violence of Baghdad. An animal market nearby has been bombed three times. Parks where couples once embraced are now empty of life because people are afraid to leave their homes. Some renowned restaurants have shut down and reopened in Amman, Jordan, a city brimming with Iraqi refugees.

At least six people were killed and dozens wounded Monday in other bombings and shootings in Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. The police found 16 bodies in various parts of the city. Six policemen were killed in two attacks in Diyala Province, and a headless body was found in Baquba, the province's capital, police officials said. Two Iraqi Army soldiers and two gunmen were killed in a firefight east of Baquba.

In the area of Kirkuk, the contested oil city, a policeman was killed and four bodies were found at two other locations, police officials said. An Arab Shiite sheik opposed to the resettlement of Kurds into the region was kidnapped, said Ahmad Hameed al-Ubaidi, a member of an Arab political group.

An American soldier was killed and one was wounded by a roadside bomb south of Tikrit on Sunday night, the American military said.

Aides to Mr. Maliki said Monday that the government had begun an investigation of a raid by British and Iraqi troops on an Iraqi intelligence agency building in Basra.

The British military said in a statement that the raid took place on Saturday night after Iraqi special forces captured a "known terrorist" who gave information that led the troops to look for a "known death squad leader" in the building. While there, the soldiers found 30 prisoners, including one woman and two children, "many of whom showed signs of torture and abuse."

The prisoners then escaped, the British military said. "It is unclear how this occurred, though we can confirm that the Iraqi forces did not release the prisoners," the military said.

Late Sunday, Mr. Maliki's office released a statement denouncing the raid but did not address the accusations of what appeared to have been government-sanctioned torture.

In eastern Baghdad, American and Iraqi troops continued to search houses in Sadr City but met no resistance, said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, an Army spokesman. The American military has begun a push into Sadr City, home of a formidable Shiite militia, as part of the Baghdad security plan.

Bomb Shatters Baghdad's Storied Literary Street (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

BAGHDAD, Mar. 5 -- Two firemen emerged from the thick curtain of black smoke that covered the pavement on Monday, carrying a soft, shapeless corpse wrapped in a green tarpaulin.

In their path was what was left of Mutanabi Street, Baghdad's literary heart. Bookstores in ruins. Balconies torn from oatmeal-colored buildings, some still on fire. Mangled cars with cracked windshields. The sounds of weeping mingled with the smell of burned flesh, as shards of paper seemed to flutter endlessly down from the sky.

At 11:40 a.m., a car bomb exploded on this storied street, killing as many as 26 people and injuring dozens, according to police officers at the scene. It shattered an area once known for liberal ideas, an intellectual haven that in the heady days after the U.S.-led invasion pulsed with the promise of freedom.

Solemn as pallbearers, the firemen walked through the landscape of twisted metal and debris, their feet crunching shattered glass. Behind them, the tower of smoke and ash billowed above the capital. One placed the charred body on a pushcart. The other covered it with a long sheet of white paper, as if he were tucking a child into bed. As they rolled the cart up the street, a young man in a black checkered sweater and light-blue jeans ran past. Tears streamed down his face.

"Where is my family? What happened to my family?" he screamed.

For many victims, the attack brought questions about the effectiveness of a new security crackdown that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has already declared a success. Nearly three weeks after its launch, the number of violent attacks has dipped, but bombings continue to plague Baghdad.

On Monday, U.S. and Iraqi troops continued their carefully orchestrated security sweeps into the Shiite militia stronghold of Sadr City, with Iraqi forces taking a more visible role than the Americans. Meanwhile, gunmen opened fire on Shiite pilgrims, killing seven in several areas of Baghdad, police said.

"What security plan? There is no security plan," said Abu Firas al-Tai, 47, as he stared at his blue car just off Mutanabi Street. Its windows were blown out. Shrapnel had pierced the trunk.

Tai, short with round glasses, was leaving a bank after collecting his pension when the car bomb detonated. "It was a huge explosion," he said, as ambulances carrying the injured sped past. "My head and face were full of dust and ash from the burning books."

Imad Abbas, 39, a burly man with thinning hair, was in his stationery shop when he heard the explosion. Shelves and boxes fell on his head, he recalled. The electricity went off. Outside, a car burned. Then his store caught fire.

He ran upstairs to the balcony and began shouting for help. Fifteen minutes later, he was rescued by firemen. One of them placed Abbas on his back and carried him down, depositing him near a corpse covered with a blanket.

"I just returned from the dead," Abbas said.

When Saddam Hussein was in power, Mutanabi Street exuded a defiant spirit that reverberated through its bookstores and the famed Shabandar Cafe. Here, intellectuals, over cups of sweet tea, engaged in lively debates.

But in recent months, the street had become a casualty of Iraq's incessant violence. As thousands of educated Iraqis left, many of the original booksellers closed shop. Others were kidnapped or killed. Many fled the country. Checkpoints, street closings and a Friday curfew kept customers away.

Still, the street was a hive of activity in the mornings, mostly because of a brisk trade in stationery products. Abbas said he believes that's why the street was attacked.

"They want to drive down the trade of Iraq," he said of the perpetrators. "They are trying to humiliate our history and humiliate our people."

The car bomb exploded near the cafe, igniting bookstores and stationery shops. The vast amounts of paper made it difficult for firefighters to control the flames.

As the young man in bluejeans cried, a friend clutched his shoulder and took him into his home for comfort. Others watched as firefighters tried to rescue two people trapped inside a burning building.

"The roof is going to collapse," one onlooker predicted.

Ten minutes later, the young man emerged onto the street, his face a mask of anguish.

"Where is my family?" he asked no one in particular. As he watched, another fireman rolled a pushcart bearing a body, this one covered in a blue tarpaulin.

"All we do is sell books," said Amer Kasim, 38, struggling for an explanation.

Suicide Car Bomb Kills 38 In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A suicide car bomber shattered a relative lull in Baghdad's violence yesterday, killing at least 38 persons, of which seven were pilgrims, in a blast that touched off raging fires and a blizzard of bloodstained paper from a popular book market.

It was the largest bombing in the capital in three days, and came on the heels of a major push by nearly 1,200 U.S. and Iraqi troops into Sadr City, a Shi'ite militia stronghold and base for fighters loyal to radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Iraqi troops in Sadr City set up checkpoints and took a far more visible presence than Americans, who led the push into the area Sunday. The move was an apparent attempt to avoid Shi'ite anger in a place of past street battles with U.S. forces.

But pressure on Sheik al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia continued on other fronts.

In the southern city of Karbala, the home of a Mahdi Army leader was raided in a joint U.S.-Iraq operation, the U.S. military said.

Sheik al-Sadr's followers also warned the Iraqi government that they would not relinquish Cabinet posts unless other members of the ruling coalition do the same -- setting the stage for a major political battle as Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki prepares to reshuffle his administration.

Meanwhile, a raid by British and Iraqi troops on a police intelligence headquarters in southern Iraq on Sunday found 30 prisoners with signs of torture. A purported death-squad leader was captured.

The raid took place at the National Iraqi Intelligence Agency building in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city 340 miles southeast of Baghdad. Inside, troops discovered the prisoners, including one woman and two children, with signs of torture and abuse, the British military said in a statement. It did not elaborate.

The Iraqi government criticized the raid and yesterday began an investigation.

"We have a committee that ... has started work to uncover the circumstances of the incident," said Ali al-Dabbagh, a government spokesman.

Mr. al-Maliki had ordered the inquiry a day earlier and vowed to punish "those who carried out this illegal and irresponsible act," his office said in condemning the raid. Mr. al-Maliki's statement did not mention the prisoners.

Yesterday, black smoke drifted over central Baghdad from burning shops, cars and book stalls in the mixed Sunni-Shi'ite area around Mutanabi Street along the Tigris River. At least 66 persons were wounded in the suicide blast and the death toll could rise, police said.

"Papers from the book market were floating through the air like leaflets dropped from a plane," said Naeem al-Daraji, a Health Ministry worker who was driving about 200 yards from the blast and was slightly injured by broken glass from his car window.

"Pieces of flesh and the remains of books were scattered everywhere," he said.

People began driving the injured to hospitals in private cars without waiting for ambulances to arrive. A worker at a nearby shoe store, Youssef Haider, 24, said the blast flipped burning cars with charred bodies trapped inside. He and co-workers used two-wheel pushcarts to carry away the wounded.

Sporadic car bombs and attacks have hit the capital in recent days, but none with mass casualties since a blast Friday killed at least 10 persons.

In other violence, gunmen opened fire on Shi'ite pilgrims in several places around Baghdad, killing at least seven persons, police said. The Shi'ites were apparently heading to shrines and holy sites in southern Iraq for the annual commemoration of a 40-day mourning period for the death of a revered 7th century warrior, Hussein.

The U.S. military said one American soldier was killed and another was wounded when a roadside bomb hit their convoy south of Tikrit.

38 Die, 105 Hurt In Baghdad Market Blast (AP)

By Brian Murphy,

AP, March 6, 2007

A suicide car bomber turned a venerable book market into a deadly inferno and gunmen targeted Shiite pilgrims Monday as suspected Sunni insurgents brought major bloodshed back into the lap of their main Shiite rivals. At least 38 people died in the blast and seven pilgrims were killed.

The violence — after a relative three-day lull in Baghdad — was seen as another salvo in the Sunni extremist campaign to provoke a sectarian civil war that could tear apart the Shiite-led government and erase Washington's plans for Iraq.

The Shiite Mahdi Army militia has so far resisted full-scale retaliation through a combination of self-interest and intense government pressure. But the militia's leader, the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, is now being cornered in new ways that have put him on the defensive.

An expected Cabinet reshuffle could take a serious bite out of al-Sadr's voice in government — a move strongly encouraged by Washington.

Al-Sadr also opened the door for U.S. and Iraqi troops to enter the Mahdi stronghold of Sadr City in Baghdad — under a painstaking deal with authorities — but his loyalists are still being hunted outside the capital.

"Al-Sadr and his forces could be feeling under siege," said Alireza Nourizadeh, chief researcher at the London-based Center for Arab-Iranian Studies. "That makes them less predictable. That means they are more dangerous."

One possible sign of brewing troubles was 30 bullet-ridden bodies found across Baghdad. Many of those killings are blamed on Shiite death squads, and Monday's figure was the highest in weeks.

And the Sunni extremists keep pressing.

The suicide mission tore through booksellers and other stores on narrow Mutanabi Street, a mostly Shiite-run commercial area in Baghdad's historical heart along the Tigris River.

Within seconds, flames engulfed open-air stalls and shops brimming with books and magazines. Gas-powered generators — needed because of frequent power cuts — exploded one by one.

Bloodstained pages that escaped the fire were carried away in a wind-whipped pillar of black smoke.

Firefighters had to spray huge arches of water from blocks away because their trucks were took large for the warren of lanes in old Baghdad. At least 38 people died and 105 were injured, said Raad Jabar, a Health Ministry official.

But the final casualty count may not be clear until Tuesday. Fire crews still battled the blazes more than 12 hours after the attack, said civil defense Maj. Gen. Abdul Rasoul al-Zaidi.

"Papers from the book market were floating through the air like leaflets dropped from a plane," said Naeem al-Daraji, a Health Ministry worker who was driving about 200 yards from the blast and was slightly injured by broken glass from his car window.

"Pieces of flesh and the remains of books were scattered everywhere," he said.

A worker at a nearby shoe store, Youssef Haider, 24, said the blast flipped burning cars with charred bodies trapped inside. He and co-workers used two-wheel pushcarts for shoe boxes to carry away the wounded.

In other violence, gunmen opened fire on Shiite pilgrims in several places around Baghdad, killing at least seven people, police said.

The Shiites were apparently heading to shrines and holy sites in southern Iraq for the annual commemoration to end a 40-day mourning period for the death of a revered 7th century Shiite martyr, Imam Hussein.

It was the bloodiest day in the capital in more than a week, and came on the heels of a major push by nearly 1,200 U.S. and Iraqi troops into teeming Sadr City as part of a nearly 3-week-old security offensive across Baghdad.

The sweeps seek to drive out militants and establish permanent stations in troubled areas. Search teams also uncovered a nearly tenfold increase in hidden weapons stashes in the past week, the military said.

More than 21,000 small arms rounds were confiscated last week, up from 2,160 the previous week; 937 mortar rounds were discovered, up from 89 the week before, it said. Attacks on soldiers in some Shiite districts are also down sharply.

That's mostly because al-Sadr ordered his fighters to pull back after coming under strong government arm-twisting to allow the security plan to proceed.

In Sadr City, Iraqi troops set up checkpoints and took a far more visible role than Americans, who led the push into the area Sunday. The move was an apparent attempt to avoid Shiite anger in a place of past street battles with U.S. forces.

The troops plan to establish outposts in Sadr City that will bring together Iraqi police, military and U.S.-led forces, said U.S. Brig. Gen. Terry Wolff, who oversees training of Iraqi soldiers.

"It's about presence," he said.

But pressure on al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army continued on other fronts.

In the southern city of Karbala, the home of a Mahdi Army leader was raided in a joint U.S.-Iraqi operation, the U.S. military said.

Al-Sadr's followers also warned they would fight any Cabinet changes that would single them out.

"We will not give up our share and any of our ministerial posts under any circumstances unless all other blocs are subjected to the same procedure," said Saleh al-Ukaili, head of Sadrist faction in parliament, where the bloc controls 30 of the 275 seats.

An adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said 10 of the 39 ministry posts soon would be replaced — including five of the six ministers loyal to al-Sadr. The adviser spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not supposed to release the information.

Relations between al-Sadr and the government are already tense. Late last year, the prime minister withdrew his official protection for al-Sadr and the Mahdi Army and allowed U.S.-led forces to close in.

U.S. Narrows Financial Focus To Aid Iraqi Small Businesses (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

BAGHDAD — Mohamed Raheem saw fliers posted all over his neighborhood offering money to Iraqis who wanted to expand their small businesses.

He called a phone number listed on the flier and set up an appointment with the Iraqi-American Chamber of Commerce and Industry. "I explained to them that I have a shop and I want to expand my work," said Raheem, 44, who owns a small grocery store in the Kadhamiya district of Baghdad. He applied for a $10,000 grant.

As U.S. military and civilian officials try to help Iraq's economy rebuild, they are placing a new emphasis on small businesses like Raheem's. Through grants and loans — often for a few hundred dollars each — they're trying to stimulate job growth and eventually improve Iraq's security.

So-called microfinance projects have proved more efficient at creating jobs than large-scale, multibillion-dollar reconstruction efforts, says Eric Nigh, executive director of the Iraqi-American Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

Large infrastructure projects, such as power plants, required enormous spending on workers' security, says Ra'ad Omar, chief executive of the chamber. He said Iraqi contractors tended to invest their profits in real estate abroad rather than reinvest them at home. Many owners of larger Iraqi companies eventually left the country because of security issues.

"The American government has learned from their mistakes in Iraq," Nigh says. "Now, instead of the big contracts with big companies, we are working on giving small grants for ordinary people."

The chamber's program, called "Najah," Arabic for "success," is funded through the U.S. Agency for International Development.

Small-business owners must match at least 25% of the grant's value with their own money and commit to hiring new employees. The grants are distributed in the form of equipment and services, such as construction, instead of cash. USAID has also offered small loans through other programs in Iraq.

Raheem says that if he receives his grant, he will hire two workers and get new refrigerators, a generator, shelves and carts. "I could bring (customers) everything they need so they do their shopping from me only," he says.

The chamber follows businesses for a year to ensure they continue to operate. Recipients have included barbers, grocers, mobile phone sellers, mechanics and cooks.

In a year, the program is projected to distribute $6 million and create about 2,000 jobs, according to the chamber.

Iraq's unemployment rate was 17.6% last year, according to a draft report released by the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. U.S. military officials hope that if more young Iraqi men have jobs, they will be less tempted to join sectarian militias.

"Security improves the economy. And improvement in economic conditions reduces dissatisfaction," says Brig. Gen. Vincent Brooks, a deputy commander of coalition forces in Baghdad. "Reducing dissatisfaction makes it more difficult for the insurgents to influence the actions of the people."

Other U.S.-sponsored economic projects include:

•Renovation of a building near Sadr City, a major stronghold of Shiite militia, that will become a trade school for young men. Armed with skills, a new army of electricians, plumbers and mechanics will go to work for themselves and "not be tempted to place IEDs (improvised explosive devices)," says Lt. Col. Bob Ruch, deputy team leader of the Baghdad Provincial Reconstruction Team.

•Changes in traffic patterns in commercial districts to make them safer from car bombing attacks.

Iraq's economy grew about 3% in 2006, according to the World Bank. Growth was flat in the oil sector, which has been damaged by insurgent attacks on pipelines and low foreign investment. The non-oil economy, composed largely of small businesses, grew 10%, the Bank said.

The biggest obstacle to economic growth continues to be security, says Frank Lavin, U.S. undersecretary of Commerce, who traveled to Iraq last month. Security expenses account for about one-third of most companies' operating budgets, he says.

For some, even the unrest in Iraq could bring business opportunities. "Because of the difficulties that people are facing, they prefer to do their shopping from just one place," said Raheem, who hopes his expanded store will offer more products. "That is what I am trying to achieve."

Fighting For Iraq's Culture (NYT)

By Matthew Bogdanos

WITH the situation in Iraq growing seemingly graver by the day, Americans are increasingly reluctant to risk American blood to save Iraqi lives. So it's a pretty tough sell to ask people to care about a bunch of old rocks with funny writing.

But what if they understood that the plunder of Iraq's 10,000 poorly guarded archaeological sites not only deprives future generations of incomparable works of art, but also finances the insurgents? Having led the United States investigation into the looting of the Iraq National Museum in 2003, I know that millions of dollars' worth of antiquities flow out of the country each year. And it would be naïve to think the insurgents aren't getting a major share of the loot.

And what if Americans understood that our failure to appreciate the importance Iraqis place on their history has added to the chaos faced by our troops? Four years after the initial looting — and despite having recovered almost 6,000 antiquities — we cannot keep pace with the artifacts being stolen every day. This continued failure to protect an artistic heritage going back to the dawn of civilization has convinced many in Iraq and the Middle East that we do not care about any culture other than our own.

It's worth pointing out that the failure to safeguard Iraqi antiquities does not rest solely with the United States. While the United Nations and NATO took the lead in providing security for cultural artifacts in postwar situations in Bosnia, Cyprus and elsewhere, neither seems much interested in rectifying the situation in Iraq. NATO opened a training center for security officers outside Baghdad in 2005, but none of the Iraqis trained have been assigned to archaeological sites. The United Nations says that it has no mandate to train guards and that the level of violence does not permit its involvement.

So who might act? In the past, most archaeological digs in Iraq have had foreign sponsorship — the Germans at Babylon and Uruk, the British at Ur and Nimrud, the French at Kish and Lagash, the Italians at Hatra, and the Americans at Nippur. Given that background, it would make sense for each of these countries to "adopt" the sites its scholars have been studying.

Each of the foreign nations would provide guards around the perimeter and around the clock. (Obviously, this would entail getting permission from the Iraqi government and help from the American military.) Ideally, these foreign forces would also be assigned a group of Iraqi recruits to train. Once the Iraqis were mission-capable — it should take only six months or so if the Baghdad government supplied the manpower — the donor nation would recall its forces.

In this way, Mesopotamia's cultural patrimony would be safe, Al Jazeera would have to find other ways to show TV clips of Western indifference to Arab culture, and the terrorists would have to find another income source.

One challenge has been convincing European governments that providing coordinated site security would not be a statement in support of the war. But surely they could be persuaded that it would be a humanitarian effort to protect a cultural heritage rich with common ancestry that predates the splits among Kurd, Sunni Arab and Shiite.

The lesson for the United States is that we must never again cede the moral high ground on cultural issues like this one. In advance of any future military action, we should assign units the task of protecting cultural property. And all troops scheduled to deploy overseas should receive cultural awareness training; the Archaeological Institute of America has already conducted some seminars at Camp Lejeune in North Carolina.

Yes, diverting resources to save cultural artifacts during a time of war may seem like cutting funds for the police and firefighters in order to expand the public library. And my decision to expand my team's counterterrorist mission to investigate the looting of the museum was characterized by many as a distraction. But some soldiers before us have seen the wisdom of this approach. "Inevitably, in the path of our advance will be found historical monuments and cultural centers which symbolize to the world all that we are fighting to preserve," said Dwight Eisenhower just before D-Day. "It is the responsibility of every commander to protect and respect these symbols whenever possible."

9 From One Family Die In U.S. Strike Near Kabul (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 5 — Nine members of a family, including five women and three children, were killed in an American airstrike in central Afghanistan late Sunday during a battle with militants, Afghan officials said Monday.

The American military acknowledged that it dropped two 2,000-pound bombs on a compound on Sunday night, but said that it could not confirm the casualties.

The strike occurred 12 hours after American forces in eastern Afghanistan fired on civilians following a suicide car bombing next to an American convoy. The American fire killed at least 10 people and wounded 25, Afghan officials said. In response, protests on Sunday blocked the main highway in the area.

On Sunday night, American forces at a small base in Tape Ahmed Beg, in Kapisa Province, northeast of the capital, Kabul, came under rocket fire at 9 p.m., the United States military said in a statement. When two men with Kalashnikov rifles were spotted entering a compound, the Americans called an airstrike, which ended the engagement, it said.

"Coalition forces observed two men with AK-47s leaving the scene of the rocket attack and entering the compound," Lt. Col. David Accetta, a military spokesman, said in the statement. "These men knowingly endangered civilians by retreating into a populated area while conducting attacks against coalition forces."

"We did this in self-defense," said Gen. Muhammad Eiwaz Masloom, the police chief of Kapisa Province, whose men work beside Americans at the base. "The enemy of Afghanistan is trying to use different tactics to destroy the peace and stability in our area, especially in the districts of Tagab and Nejarab, and they have repeatedly attacked our bases."

He said that members of the Islamic Party, which is led by the renegade mujahedeen commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, and Taliban supporters were active in the area.

But a local representative of the provincial council, Suraya Bahadur, who comes from Nejarab district, where the bombing happened, condemned it. "I condemn both the suicide attacks and the rocket attacks by the enemy of Afghanistan, and also I condemn these type of mistakes," by American and NATO forces, she said. "We never want our civilian people to be killed."

John Sifton, a senior researcher at Human Rights Watch, which is based in New York, also expressed concern about the level of force. "That is heavy firepower to respond to two men, even if they have Kalashnikovs," he said in a telephone interview. "If that version of events bears up, it would strongly suggest that the attack was disproportionate." Mr. Sifton said insurgents also regularly violated the rules of war by using force near civilian areas.

On Monday, President Hamid Karzai condemned the killing of the civilians in eastern Afghanistan on Sunday morning. He blamed the "enemies of Afghanistan" for the suicide bombing, which "caused the American forces to fire on civilian people and demonstrators that killed 10 people." He ordered a government delegation to the scene to investigate with the American military.

The American military, in a statement, revised its account to 8 civilians killed and 35 wounded, from 16 dead and 24 wounded, saying that the latest figures were its most accurate. A spokesman at Bagram Air Base, Sgt. Dean Welch, said that as the day progressed and after coordination with Afghan officials, the initial reports were corrected.

The statement said the military deeply regretted the loss of civilian life. "This attack put every innocent man, woman and child buying food or clothing in the bazaar at risk," Col. John Nicholson of the United States Army said. The statement said American forces would work with the Afghan authorities to "investigate and identify those responsible."

Nine witnesses, including five Afghans recuperating from bullet wounds in a hospital, told The Associated Press that the American forces had fired indiscriminately along at least six miles of one of eastern Afghanistan's busiest highways — a route often filled with cars, trucks and Afghans on foot and bicycles.

The NATO secretary general, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, said in Brussels that he understood that both episodes involved American-led coalition forces rather than NATO's forces in Afghanistan, but he said, "Every civilian casualty is one too many," [a news agency] reported.

Mr. Sifton urged Afghanistan, NATO and coalition forces to develop protocols for troops in such cases.

9 Afghan Civilians Reported Killed In U.S. Airstrike (WP)

By Griff Witte

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 5 -- U.S. forces killed nine Afghan civilians Sunday night while bombing a house where two Taliban insurgents had taken refuge, Afghan authorities said Monday.

Sayed Mohammed Daoud Hashimi, deputy governor of Kapisa province in northeastern Afghanistan, said the insurgents fled to the house after firing rockets at a base used by the U.S.-led coalition. The house belonged to relatives of one of the fighters, and nine of them -- three children, five women and an elderly man -- were killed when U.S. forces dropped bombs on it, Hashimi said. The two Taliban members were injured in the blast but managed to escape.

U.S. military officials later acknowledged having dropped the bombs but said they could not confirm reports of civilian casualties.

The deaths followed by hours the killing of at least eight Afghan civilians outside the eastern city of Jalalabad on Sunday morning. In that incident, U.S. Marines engaged in a firefight with insurgents after their convoy was hit by a van packed with explosives, according to U.S. officials. Afghan witnesses later said the Marines fired indiscriminately at bystanders as they sped away. The deaths remain under investigation.

The incidents, while separate, underscore the challenge facing coalition forces as they confront insurgents who, according to military officials, are trying to provoke battles that lead to civilian deaths. Both the coalition and the Taliban, the Islamic militia that ruled most of the country until the U.S.-led invasion in 2001, have indicated that they are preparing for a violent spring as conditions for fighting improve.

The deaths of the civilians near Jalalabad sparked angry protests Sunday, with hundreds of people taking to the streets, throwing rocks and chanting anti-American slogans. Authorities in Jalalabad said there were no additional protests Monday and described the situation as calm.

Hashimi said that in contrast to the Jalalabad incident, the reaction to the airstrike in Kapisa was muted because local residents knew that the bombed house was being used by the Taliban.

"The people knew these men were constantly attacking security and coalition forces. The people asked them to stop, because we don't want any problems for our village," he said. "But they didn't listen to the people. They kept attacking."

The provincial police chief, Gen. Raz Mohammed, said his forces had also come under attack from the Taliban on Sunday. He called the U.S. response justified.

In a statement, the U.S. military acknowledged dropping two 2,000-pound bombs on the building where the insurgents were believed to be hiding.

"Coalition forces observed two men with AK-47s leaving the scene of the rocket attack and entering the compound," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a coalition forces spokesman. "These men knowingly endangered civilians by retreating into a populated area while conducting attacks against coalition forces."

The U.S. military said its forces suffered no injuries in the initial rocket attack. The incident was under investigation Monday night.

John Sifton, a senior researcher with Human Rights Watch, said the advocacy group was calling for independent investigations into whether U.S. forces reacted disproportionately in either incident. "The insurgents are regularly carrying out illegal attacks, but these responses are also extremely destructive," he said. "Whenever a mistake or, worse, recklessness, occurs, it sets back the effort."

Bombing Kills Nine Relatives In Afghanistan (WT/AP)

By Amir Shah

JABAR, Afghanistan -- A coalition air strike destroyed a mud-brick home after a rocket attack on a U.S. base, killing nine persons from four generations of an Afghan family including a 6-month-old, officials and relatives said yesterday.

It was the third report in two days of U.S. forces killing civilians. The air strike occurred late Sunday in Kapisa province north of the capital, some 12 hours after U.S. Marines reportedly opened fire on civilian cars and pedestrians after a suicide bombing in eastern Nangahar province.

In the other incident, an American convoy in the southern city of Kandahar -- where suicide attacks have become commonplace over the past year -- opened fire yesterday on a vehicle that drove too close, killing the driver, said Noor Ahmad, a Kandahar police officer who said he witnessed the shooting. A NATO spokesman said he did not have any information.

Up to 10 Afghans died in the aftermath of the Nangahar suicide attack, which wounded a U.S. Marine. President Hamid Karzai condemned the bombing, "which caused the American forces to fire on civilians," and a statement said relatives of the dead wanted the "perpetrators" brought to justice.

In both the Nangahar and Kapisa incidents, the U.S. military blamed militants for putting innocent lives in danger. A villager in Kapisa, about 50 miles northeast of the capital, confirmed the U.S. account that a rocket was first fired at the American base.

Mr. Karzai has repeatedly pleaded for Western troops to show more restraint amid concern that civilian deaths shake domestic support for the foreign military involvement that the president needs to prop up his government, which is increasingly under threat from a resurgent Taliban.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said coalition forces will always respond in self-defense when fired upon: "It is often the enemy that is putting innocent peoples' lives in danger by where they're conducting these attacks on our forces."

In the Kapisa province violence, the U.S. military said a rocket was fired at a hilltop U.S. base, prompting return fire by the coalition forces and the air strike.

Two men with automatic rifles were seen leaving the site of the rocket attack and heading into a compound that was then hit by two 2,000-pound bombs, a military statement said. Rural homes in Afghanistan are built in a compound style with one large outer wall often encasing several small rooms; many families tend to share the same compound.

"These men knowingly endangered civilians by retreating into a populated area while conducting attacks against coalition forces," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. military spokesman. "We observed the men entering a compound and that compound was targeted and hit by an air strike."

The bombs left a large crater of twisted lumber and chunks of mud and killed four women, four children between 6 months and 5 years old, and an 80-year-old man, said Gulam Nabi, a relative of the victims.

Sayad Mohammad Dawood Hashimmi, Kapisa deputy governor, confirmed the nine deaths.

Among those killed were Gulam Nabi's parents, his sister, two female relatives by marriage and four of the extended family's youngest children.

Record Opium Crop Possible In Afghanistan, U.N. Study Predicts (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 5 — Afghanistan's opium harvest could be bigger than last year's record crop, with nearly half of the provinces showing an increase in planting this year, the director of the United Nations Office for Drugs and Crime said here Monday.

His office released an assessment of winter planting trends, which shows an increase in 15 provinces, no change in 6 provinces, and a decrease in 7 provinces. Six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces have no poppies, the study said.

Similar assessments of the size of the crop and harvest have proved accurate in the past. Afghanistan had a substantial increase of poppy cultivation last year, resulting in the highest recorded harvest, more than 6,000 tons, the drugs and crime office said.

Although some of the country is showing a decrease in poppy cultivation this year, the south, which has been plagued by the insurgency and traditionally has been the biggest source of poppies, is showing a continued increase, "which may result in an overall increase in opium poppy cultivation in 2007," the report said.

The ample rainfall and snowfall this winter would also contribute to a good harvest in 2007, it said.

"The real increase is taking place in the provinces characterized by insurgency, and the problem there is not only a narcotic problem but an insurgency problem," Antonio Maria Costa, the director of the drugs and crime office, based in Vienna, said in an interview. "The southern provinces are a textbook case of lawlessness prevailing, and therefore everybody from farmers and labs, traffickers and warlords are trying to profit from the bonanza of the product."

Lack of security has also prevented aid from reaching farmers who want to change crops, he said, which has been a major factor in other areas in persuading farmers to abandon poppy growing.

Mr. Costa said a decrease in poppy growing across a band of provinces that have been the target of such an effort was an important development. Money was provided in those areas to help farmers change crops.

"We may be able to create a corridor, or an area ranging from Pakistan in the southeast to Turkmenistan in the northwest" that is free of opium, Mr. Costa said. The strategy was, he said, "Establish a stronghold of opium-free, or provinces with a negligible amount, and then slowly regain control of the other provinces."

The intent of the big traffickers is uncertain because the huge crops last year produced a glut of opium on the world market, he said. The excess, which was worth about $1 billion, has not reached the market and depressed the price of opium, so someone is holding it for future sales, he said.

"Is it in the insurgents' hands?" he asked. "It is not under the bed of the farmers," he said, adding, "It could become a serious problem down the road."

CIA Rushing Resources To Bin Laden Hunt (ABC News)

ABC News, March 6, 2007

Armed with fresh intelligence, the CIA is moving additional man power and equipment into Pakistan in the effort to find Osama bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al Zawahri, U.S. officials tell ABC News.

"Reports that the trail has gone stone cold are not correct," said one U.S. official. "We are very much increasing our efforts there," the official said.

People familiar with the CIA operation say undercover officers with paramilitary training have been ordered into Pakistan and the area across the border with Afghanistan as part of the ramp-up.

Although never publicly acknowledged, Pakistan has permitted CIA teams to secretly operate inside Pakistan.

Pakistan officials say they are aware that CIA teams have increased their presence in northern Waziristan since last September when Pakistan withdrew its troops from the area under a much-criticized "peace deal" with tribal leaders.

Director of National Intelligence Mike McConnell testified last week that current intelligence "to the best of our knowledge" puts both bin Laden and al Zawahri in Pakistan. It was the first time a high-ranking U.S. official publicly identified Pakistan as bin Laden's hiding place.

Past intelligence has indicated that bin Laden often changed locations in March, traveling to hiding places in the mountains once the snow cover begins to melt.

Probe Of Prosecutor Firings Intensifies (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The probe into the Bush administration's firings of U.S. attorneys intensified Monday as lawmakers ordered two more ousted officials to tell their stories and the Justice Department said Republican Sen. Pete Domenici had complained repeatedly to the attorney general about one prosecutor.

A second lawmaker from New Mexico, GOP Rep. Heather Wilson, acknowledged that she, too, had complained to the same prosecutor about the slow pace of an investigation. Like Domenici, she denied pressuring the U.S. attorney in her state.

The administration has said eight prosecutors were told to leave, all but one for performance-related reasons. However, Democrats have suggested ever more pointedly that politics was behind many of the dismissals, and the Domenici revelation fueled that idea.

Six of those fired, meanwhile, issued a stiff defense of their conduct and implied that they had had differences with Justice Department officials in Washington.

"We leave with no regrets, because we served well and upheld the best traditions of the Department of Justice," the group said in a joint statement released in advance of a Tuesday hearing by a House subcommittee.

The Justice Department, besieged by charges of cronyism, acknowledged that lawmakers — both Republican and Democratic — had complained about several of the eight.

One, David Iglesias of New Mexico, was the subject of four phone calls from Domenici to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his deputy questioning whether the prosecutor was "up to the job," department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

It's unclear whether Iglesias was aware of the senator's calls to the Justice Department, but he knew of Domenici's interest in his work. Domenici said over the weekend that he had called the prosecutor in October 2006 to ask about the progress of a probe into an alleged Democratic kickback scheme.

Iglesias has said he received calls from two lawmakers — he has not named them publicly — who inquired about the case. He said that he felt pressured by them to rush indictments before the November elections.

Domenici has apologized for the call while denying he put any pressure on Iglesias. The Senate ethics manual advises lawmakers to refrain from speaking to court officers about specific proceedings until after they are resolved.

Wilson said Monday she contacted Iglesias but did not put pressure on him to speed up the investigation.

In a statement released to The Washington Post, Wilson said: "I did not ask about the timing of any indictments and I did not tell Mr. Iglesias what course of action I thought he should take or pressure him in any way. The conversation was brief and professional."

She said the department dismissed Iglesias "without input from me."

During a briefing that Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty gave senators last month about the firings, McNulty singled out two U.S. attorneys, Iglesias and Carol Lam of California, who had generated "extensive congressional concern," according to a senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the official was not authorized to speak on the record about that briefing.

The Justice Department released letters from Sen. Dianne Feinstein and Rep. Darrell Issa of California to Gonzales and Lam complaining about Lam's prosecution record with illegal immigrants, and other matters.

Lam's and Iglesias' accounts are just two of the stories expected to receive public airings on Capitol Hill Tuesday. The Justice Department has said Iglesias was among those dismissed for performance-related issues.

U.S. attorneys are political appointees and can be fired for any reason, or none at all. But these firings have become a stress point of a power struggle between the Republican Bush administration and newly ascendant Democrats in Congress.

Separately on Monday, the Justice Department said that Michael Battle — a senior official who directed the department's Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys and had personally informed the ousted prosecutors of their removal — would leave his post March 16.

Battle was not involved in the decision-making that led to the prosecutors' ouster, the department said. "His departure is not connected to the U.S. attorney controversy whatsoever," Roehrkasse said.

Democrats scoffed.

"The wheels seem to be coming off the Bush administration's increasingly hollow defense of its decision to fire eight U.S. attorneys," said Rep. Linda Sanchez, D-Calif., who planned to lead the House hearing.

They are the fifth and sixth ordered to testify. The others — Iglesias, Lam, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Washington — were expected to testify before both the House panel and the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The six attorneys said in a statement released ahead of the proceedings that they were given "little or no information about the reason" for their firings.

"When we had new ideas or differing opinions, we assumed that such thoughts would always be welcomed by the department and could be freely and openly debated within the halls of that great institution," they said.

Domenici said Sunday he had had a brief conversation with Iglesias last year and asked "if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at."

"In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologize," Domenici said, adding, "I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

House Widens Prosecutor Firings Probe (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, USA TODAY

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congressional inquiries into the Bush administration's dismissal of eight federal prosecutors deepened Monday, as the House Judiciary Committee announced it would seek subpoenas for two more of the prosecutors.

The panel now plans to hear from as many as six of the ousted prosecutors today, and several of them are likely to also appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Both panels are investigating whether the administration unfairly dismissed the eight prosecutors — who serve at the pleasure of the president — as political retaliation for their investigative activities.

The House panel's announcement said it would seek testimony from former U.S. attorneys Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona. Previously scheduled to testify today were former U.S. attorneys H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Carol Lam of Southern California and John McKay of Washington state.

Meanwhile, the senior Justice Department official who carried out the controversial firings announced his resignation Monday. Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, said in a statement that his resignation was unrelated to the dismissals and that he was leaving to enter private practice.

Battle said he first notified the department of his decision to leave last June. However, Democrats called the timing of his departure suspicious.

"This raises another question about a subject where there are already too many unanswered questions," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who has led the Senate investigation.

Rep. Linda Sánchez, D-Calif., a member of the House panel, said the explanation for Battle's departure "is as murky as everything else (the administration) has told us about this case."

Administration officials, including Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, have said that all but one of the firings were related to the prosecutors' performance. Last month, McNulty told the Senate panel that Cummins was removed so he could be replaced by an ex-aide to White House political director Karl Rove.

Since then, the Senate panel has disclosed that Justice had issued generally favorable evaluations of all of the fired prosecutors. And Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, has said that before he was dismissed in December he was contacted by two unidentified members of Congress who asked about the status of corruption probe looking at Democrats.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., has since acknowledged that he contacted Iglesias. Domenici said in a statement that he asked Iglesias whether "he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at.

"I regret making that call, and I apologize," Domenici said. "However, at no time … did I ever tell (Iglesias) what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter."

Senate Ethics Committee Chairwoman Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., and Vice Chairman John Cornyn, R-Texas, declined to comment on whether Domenici's action would trigger an ethics inquiry.

Democrats To Probe Sackings Of US Attorneys (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Congressional Democrats concerned about what they say is a political purge of US attorneys plan to use hearings on Tuesday to probe allegations that New Mexico's top prosecutor was fired after Pete Domenici, a Republican senator, involved himself in a political corruption investigation there.

A subcommittee of the House judiciary committee has subpoenaed six of the eight US attorneys ousted by the Department of Justice in December. The prosecutors, who run the 93 local offices that bring most cases, are chosen by the president and confirmed by the Senate, but the mass mid-term firings are highly unusual, legal experts said.

"More than any other justice department officials, US attorneys must be above reproach. Today's revelations call into serious question whether they were allowed such independence in this administration," said Chuck Schumer, New York senator. He added that the Senate judiciary committee, which will also hold hearings, planned to explore the recent resignation of Mike Battles, the DoJ official who informed the US attorneys of their dismissals

Several of the ousted attorneys have said they were told they were being pushed out to make way for people with political connections.

The firing of Carol Lam, former US attorney for San Diego, has also prompted questions because that office is presiding over a political corruption probe that ensnared Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican congressman, and other Republicans.

David Iglesias, the former top prosecutor in New Mexico, added fuel to the fire last week when he said that he was put under pressure last autumn by two -congressional Republicans to speed up a political corruption probe involving -Democrats.

Mr Domenici acknowledged at the weekend that he contacted Mr Iglesias about the corruption investigation late last year, saying: "In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologise. However . . . I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

He also said he had begun seeking Mr Iglesias's removal well before that call because he was dissatisfied with the progress on illegal drug and immigration cases.

Heather Wilson, a Republican congresswoman accused of being one of the two who allegedly put pressure on Mr Iglesias, has declined to comment on the claims and other members of New Mexico's delegation have said they did not contact the US attorney.

Brian Roehrkasse, DoJ spokesman, said Mr Domenici had complained four times to top officials there about Mr Iglesias but never mentioned the corruption investigation.

"Any suggestion that any US attorney was removed to inappropriately interfere with any investigation is plainly wrong and ill-conceived," he said. "These decisions were based on the individual concerns of each US attorney about their overall performance . . . [including] ineffectively prosecuting departmental priorities areas, failure to follow departmental guidelines or just an inability to lead."

Senate Democrats are also seeking to roll back a 2005 law change that allows the justice department to name interim US attorneys who can serve indefinitely without Senate confirmation. Previously, interim replacements could serve only 120 days and then had to seek approval from federal judges. The DoJ says the law change is irrelevant to the controversy because it plans to name permanent replacements and seek Senate confirmation for the open-positions.

Linda Sanchez, chairwoman of the House subcommittee, said the hearings would "shed additional light on the Bush administration's apparent decision to pursue a political agenda through the selection of federal -prosecutors".

Political Retribution? Poor Performance? Congress Will Hear From Fired U.S. Attorneys (ABC)

By Z. BYRON WOLF

ABC News, March 6, 2007

Probe Studies Sen. Pete Domenici's Phone Call to Dismissed Prosecutor

March 5, 2007 — - Honest inquiry or political pressure? Differing perceptions of a quick phone call in New Mexico before the midterm elections last November could put one senator in ethical hot water.

Former U.S. attorneys are set to testify before both the House and the Senate Tuesday about why they were fired in recent months to determine whether they are the victims of political retribution. Six attorney were fired with little explanation. They claim they were performing well in their jobs. The Justice Department claims some were dismissed because of poor performance.

Among the six former prosecutors who will testify is David Iglesias, who was until last week the U.S. attorney in New Mexico. He is expected to allege that Republican lawmakers, including New Mexico Sen. Pete Domenici, pressured him to speed up a corruption investigation involving New Mexico Democrats ahead of last November's midterm election .

An outside group has already filed an ethics complaint against Domenici, accusing him of breaking Senate rules by interfering with an ongoing criminal investigation.

Everyone agrees that Domenici picked up the phone last October and called Iglesias, though Iglesias did not name Domenici or another yet-to-be unidentified lawmaker who Iglesias said also tried to pressure him. Rep. Heather Wilson, who has not commented on the Iglesias matter, is the only other New Mexico Republican in Congress.

The topic of conversation between Iglesias and Domenici was a corruption investigation Iglesias was conducting into an alleged kickback scheme involving New Mexico Democrats.

But the substance of that call is up for debate. Domenici, who admits to placing the call, said he was just interested in the timeframe for any potential indictments stemming from the investigation.

"I asked Mr. Iglesias if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what timeframe we were looking at," Domenici said in a written statement released Sunday.

Iglesias, however, has said he felt violated by the call and sensed pressure to bring indictments sooner than he wanted to -- before the November election. The indictments never came. And last week Iglesias was fired by the Department of Justice.

Iglesias was not the only person Domenici was calling. A Justice Department spokesman confirmed to The Associated Press that Domenici complained about Iglesias in three separate calls to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales between September 2005 and March 2006. Also, in October 2006, Domenici complained about Iglesias to Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. It is unclear if this call was made before or after Domenici's conversation with Iglesias.

Justice Department spokesmen have said Iglesias was among the attorneys let go because of poor performance.

Monday the liberal-leaning public interest group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington asked for an ethics investigation of Domenici.

"If, as it appears, Sen. Domenici pressured a sitting U.S. attorney to push a criminal case to benefit a political party, the Ethics Committee should take swift and harsh action," said Melanie Sloan, director of CREW. "No member of Congress can be permitted to manipulate our system of justice for political gain."

Senators will surely question Iglesias about the ethics allegations and his contact with Domenici in the run-up to the November election, but Democrats in the Senate are not expected to take a public stance on whether Domenici violated Senate ethics or whether there should be a full-scale ethics committee investigation until after tomorrow's hearing. Iglesias is expected to dispute Domenici's version of their conversation in which Domenici said, "I have never pressured or threatened him in any way."

The Senate Ethics Committee is unable to comment on any ethics allegations or inquiries, but the Senate ethics manual spells out that the committee will engage in a "preliminary inquiry" whenever it receives a sworn complaint against a senator or senate staffer. Ethics Committee Chairwoman Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., and Vice Chairman Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, confirmed Tuesday that a preliminary inquiry into Domenici's actions would, as rules require, be launched.

The preliminary inquiry is not a full-scale investigation but establishes whether the committee should proceed with any sort of action against a senator. This would be the equivalent of a grand jury inquiry.

It is Domenici's admitted call to Iglesias last year that could put him in jeopardy with the committee. According to the ethics rules, it is "against the general advice" of the committee for a senator to meddle in ongoing litigation.

Domenici said he was seeking a status report and a timeframe. A status report inquiry is not against Senate rules as long as the agency being contacted is not "engaged in an ongoing enforcement, investigative or other quasi-judicial proceeding with respect to the matter. …"

While something that is done against the "general advice" of the committee may not violate a specific rule, it could be deemed to constitute an ethics violation, because the committee members could determine the action reflects poorly on the body. But these guidelines are specifically geared to senators intervening in cases on behalf of constituents; so, it is unclear if that will apply to Domenici's interaction with Iglesias.

Gonzales Defends Move To Fire Attorneys, Denies Political Role (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, facing criticism for the firing of eight U.S. attorneys, defended the action as appropriate but said the Justice Department handled the situation poorly.

"We could have rolled out the decisions more smoothly," he said in an interview. But he also rejected accusations from Democrats and other critics that the prosecutors were fired for failing to follow the Bush administration's political agenda.

"To think we made these changes to retaliate or because they didn't carry out certain prosecutions?" he said. "That did not occur here. I stand by the decision to make the changes."

The tempest has been the latest imbroglio for the Justice Department and Mr. Gonzales, a longtime Bush friend and former White House counsel who has defended the administration's often-controversial law-enforcement programs, from domestic surveillance to the treatment of enemy combatants.

Part of the problem is the Justice Department's contention that the Dec. 7 dismissals were performance related, which came after initial suggestions that the moves were normal turnover. That switch has prompted protests from some of those let go. Some have taken to referring to the firings as the "Pearl Harbor Day Massacre." And some of have said they wouldn't have protested the moves otherwise.

Internal Justice Department documents, reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, show evaluations offering positive reviews for all the prosecutors' work as recently as last March. Mr. Gonzales said the written reviews were among several factors the department used to evaluate prosecutors, which include numbers and types of prosecutions and management issues.

"It should never have come to this," said John McKay, former U.S. attorney for the Seattle-based western district of Washington, who was among those fired and is now an adjunct law professor at the Seattle University law school. "I resigned quietly and left. But when they started saying it was for 'performance reasons,' I couldn't keep quiet any more."

The situation has put Democrats in the unusual role of championing the cause of Republican appointees to batter the administration. Indeed, many of the ousted prosecutors remain loyal to President Bush and Mr. Gonzales, and blame Republican party operatives for giving the two men bad advice.

Today, committees in the House and Senate are holding hearings in which four of the fired prosecutors are scheduled to testify.

In prepared testimony, Carol Lam, the former U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California, planned to read a statement on behalf of the group, saying, "Each of us was fully aware that we served at the pleasure of the President, and that we could be removed for any or no reason. In most of our cases, we were given little or no information about the reason for the request for our resignations."

The Justice Department said lawmakers had complained about some of the prosecutors. New Mexico Republican Sen. Pete Domenici said this weekend that he had sought the removal of David Iglesias, the U.S. attorney in his state, and had called him to inquire about the status of a corruption probe involving local Democrats.

Yesterday, Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, who requested the resignations, announced his own resignation. He said he plans to enter the private sector and that his departure had nothing to do with the firings.

Democrats initially claimed the administration was using a little-noticed clause in the Patriot Act to circumvent Senate confirmation for some of the interim replacements who otherwise might not be able to pass muster with the new Democratic majority. There is no fixed term for U.S. attorneys. They typically are appointed at the beginning of a new president's term and serve throughout.

Mr. Gonzales denied any political motivation for the moves. "I made recommendations to the president" that the changes be made, he said. "Ultimately, these are presidential appointees."

Second Lawmaker Contacted Prosecutor (WP)

By Paul Kane And Dan Eggen

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) acknowledged yesterday that she contacted a federal prosecutor to complain about the pace of his public corruption investigations, as the Senate ethics committee signaled that it had opened a preliminary inquiry into a similar communication by her state's senior senator, Pete V. Domenici (R).

Wilson denied allegations from former New Mexico U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias that she pressured him to speed up a political corruption investigation involving Democrats in the waning days of her tight election campaign last fall.

"I did not ask about the timing of any indictments and I did not tell Mr. Iglesias what course of action I thought he should take or pressure him in any way," Wilson said in a statement to The Washington Post. "The conversation was brief and professional."

Iglesias, one of seven U.S. attorneys fired by the Justice Department on Dec. 7, is expected to tell Congress today that Wilson and Domenici were trying to sway the course of his investigation. Domenici acknowledged Sunday that he called Iglesias about the corruption case but said he did not pressure him. The telephone calls to Iglesias by Domenici and Wilson appear to put them in conflict with congressional ethics rules that bar contacts with federal agency officials during most active investigations.

The furor over Domenici and Wilson has rapidly become the focus of the dispute over the firings of eight U.S. attorneys and a change in law that allows Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors for an indefinite period of time. The Justice Department has said that seven of the prosecutors were dismissed for failing to follow Bush administration policy on multiple issues, and acknowledged that one was sacked to make way for an ally of White House political adviser Karl Rove.

But most of the prosecutors have cited positive job reviews, and Democrats have alleged that there were political motivations behind the firings.

"Each of us was fully aware that we served at the pleasure of the president, and that we could be removed for any or no reason," six of the prosecutors said in a statement released yesterday. "In most of our cases, we were given little or no information about the reason for the request for our resignations."

Iglesias and three other ousted prosecutors are scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee this morning. The same group and two others are slated to testify in the afternoon before a House Judiciary subcommittee.

The Senate Ethics Committee released a statement yesterday evening declining to address the allegations against Domenici, but it said that anytime a legitimate complaint is filed against a senator, a preliminary inquiry is begun. The statement, from the chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), and Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.), the committee's ranking Republican, noted that preliminary inquiries can lead to wider investigations.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a liberal-leaning advocacy group, filed a complaint against Domenici with the committee yesterday.

Wilson said in her statement that many of her constituents had complained about "the slow pace of federal prosecutions" in corruption cases and that one unidentified constituent told her that "Iglesias was intentionally delaying corruption investigations."

Wilson also said she was trying to help Iglesias. "If the purpose of my call has somehow been misperceived, I am sorry for any confusion. I thought it was important for Mr. Iglesias to receive this information and, if necessary, have the opportunity to clear his name."

Wilson said Iglesias's dismissal occurred "without input from me." Justice officials said they are not aware of any contacts by Wilson about Iglesias. But they said Sunday that Domenici complained about him to Gonzales three times in 2005 and 2006 and spoke to Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty in the first week of October 2006.

Also yesterday, the senior Justice Department official who carried out the attorney firings announced his resignation but said his departure was not related to the dismissals.

Michael A. Battle, who has headed the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys since 2005, said in a statement that he began considering outside employment last June. His last day will be in mid-March, officials said.

Battle called seven U.S. attorneys on Dec. 7 and notified them that they were being asked to leave. He notified then-Arkansas U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins of his dismissal in June.

The ethical quandary facing Domenici and Wilson heightens the political pressures that both are facing at home, where Democrats are touting the Iglesias allegations with one eye on attacking the Bush White House and the other on two seats they consider vulnerable in 2008.

There has been speculation in both parties that Domenici, a 34-year veteran of the Senate, may not run for a seventh term next year, when he will turn 76. He held a large fundraiser in Albuquerque two weeks ago that was meant to give notice of his intention to run again, and aides and outside advisers maintained yesterday that the latest flap will not change his plans.

But the potential for an ethics review of his actions has independent analysts discussing the possible political fallout for the otherwise popular Domenici. Wilson, the heir apparent to his seat, won reelection in November by fewer than 1,000 votes.

"You're having an impact on the Senate race either way -- whether he stays or not," said Amy Walter, a handicapper with the Cook Political Report.

An inquiry into Wilson's actions could impair what Walter called Wilson's "outsider" reputation. "It calls into question those skills," she said.

Justice Stymieing Probe Of 6 Firings, Democrats Say (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer, The Washington Times

Congressional Democrats say half a dozen former federal prosecutors were fired by the Bush administration for political reasons, and they're accusing the Justice Department of withholding information related to the dismissals.

"Eleven months after the firings, we still haven't gotten straight answers from the Department of Justice, which changed its own story this weekend and admitted the firings weren't based on job performance," said Rep. Linda T. Sanchez, California Democrat and chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee on commercial and administrative law.

Both the House and Senate Judiciary committees will hold hearings today with the six former prosecutors.

Supporters of the administration's policy say the firings were not done improperly. U.S. attorneys have four-year terms, but can be removed or replaced at any time, and for nearly any reason, according to federal law.

DOJ_NMG_0140557

"We ought to not lose sight of the fact that president has the power to replace them," said Sen. Arlen Specter, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee. "He doesn't have to have a reason. If it is a bad reason, that is different."

The Pennsylvania Republican added he would listen to the Democrats' accusations of improper firings.

Democrats have specifically cited the case of former prosecutor Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, California Republican. Cunningham resigned from office last year after pleading guilty to bribery charges in connection to a case involving military contractors. Cunningham received an eight-year sentence.

Mrs. Lam, who was appointed by Mr. Bush in 2002, was fired after the Justice Department issued a request for her dismissal in January. According to the Justice Department, Mrs. Lam was fired for not aggressively pursuing the prosecution of border crimes.

The other five former U.S. attorneys scheduled to testify today include Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas, Paul K. Charlton of Phoenix, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., David C. Iglesias of Albuquerque, N.M., and John McKay of Seattle.

Meanwhile, Sen. Pete V. Domenici, New Mexico Republican, yesterday said he made a mistake by contacting Mr. Iglesias during an ongoing probe of state Democrats on charges of corruption last year. While apologizing for making the call, Mr. Domenici told reporters he "never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

The Justice Department replaced Mr. Iglesias last December and said Mr. Domenici had put in four calls making such a request. Both say the calls happened between September of 2005 and October 2006, while the call to Mr. Iglesias took place in October.

Mr. Iglesias said he thinks the October calls to him from Mr. Domenici and Republican Rep. Heather A. Wilson were made to pressure him on the pace of his corruption probe and are the real cause of his dismissal.

Last night, Fox News reported that Michael A. Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, had resigned his post. Mr. Battle was behind eight of the recent top-level firings. The Justice Department said the resignation was not connected to the firings and that Mr. Battle had announced his departure in an internal e-mail last month.

Prosecutor Worried 'Gloves Would Come Off' Over Criticism Of Ouster (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - A high-ranking Justice Department official told one of the U.S. attorneys fired by the Bush administration that if any of them continued to criticize the administration for their ousters, previously undisclosed details about the reasons they were fired might be released, two of the ousted prosecutors told McClatchy Newspapers.

While the U.S. attorney who got the call regarded the tone of the conversation as congenial, not intimidating, the prosecutor nonetheless passed the message on to five other fired U.S. attorneys. One of them interpreted the reported comments by Michael Elston, the chief of staff to Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, as a threat.

Justice Department officials denied that the conversation with the U.S. attorney ever took place, and Elston said he called several of the fired U.S. attorneys but never made any such comments.

"I had no conversation in which I discussed with any U.S. attorney what they should or should not say to the media regarding their removal," Elston said.

The two prosecutors who described the call demanded anonymity because, they said, they didn't want to antagonize the Justice Department further.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse criticized McClatchy for running the story. "It is unfortunate that the press would choose to run an allegation from an anonymous source from a conversation that never took place," he said.

Six of the eight ousted U.S. attorneys have been subpoenaed to testify Tuesday before the House of Representatives. Four will appear voluntarily before the Senate after a liberal public-interest group Monday asked for the Senate ethics committee to investigate Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., for calling the U.S. attorney in New Mexico, who was later fired, during a corruption investigation of at least one Democrat.

According to one of the fired U.S. attorneys, Elston made the comments during a telephone conversation after Democrats began questioning whether the administration was attempting to purge more independent-minded Republican appointees in order to replace them with more partisan candidates.

According to the former U.S. attorney, Elston made a "pointed comment that indicated that somehow anyone who talked might become more embarrassed if the story continued on."

"The inference was that they were holding themselves back from saying more about why people were fired - that it was likely the department was going to step up the defense of their actions," the fired prosecutor said. "It could have been construed as friendly advice or a casual prediction. But I think it was expected that everyone would be told about the call."

When conveying the message to the others, the prosecutor tried to make it clear that the meaning of the conversation shouldn't be overdramatized.

But another former U.S. attorney, who wasn't a party to the Justice Department conversation, interpreted the comments as a threat, especially since it came when congressional Democrats were contacting the attorneys about possibly testifying before Congress.

"I took it to mean that negative, personal information would be released," the prosecutor said. "That if we made public comments or if we were to testify in Congress, that the gloves would come off and the Department of Justice would make us regret that we were talking."

The controversy over the firings of the eight U.S. attorneys has continued for weeks, but it was reignited last week when U.S. Attorney David Iglesias told McClatchy Newspapers that he believed that two members of Congress called him in mid-October to pressure him to complete the investigation before the November elections. Iglesias, who stepped down last week, added that he believed he was fired because he didn't speed up the case.

Domenici, who originally had recommended Iglesias for the post, apologized for making the call in a statement Sunday, but he said that he never pressured or threatened Iglesias about the case.

McClatchy Newspapers reported previously that Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., also called Iglesias about the investigation. The Washington Post reported in its online edition Monday that Wilson acknowledged contacting Iglesias, but denied pressuring him.

Domenici also acknowledged in his statement that he asked the Justice Department to replace Iglesias, but he said that he made the request before he called about the corruption probe.

Justice Department officials confirmed that Domenici called Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in September 2005 and January and April of 2006.

During those calls, Domenici expressed general concerns about Iglesias' performance and questioned whether he was "up to the job," Roehrkasse said. During the first week of October 2006, Domenici made a similar and "very brief call" about Iglesias to McNulty, the deputy attorney general. At no time in these calls did the senator mention the public corruption case, Roehrkasse said.

The left-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) asked the Senate Select Committee on Ethics to investigate whether Domenici violated ethics law. Lawmakers are prohibited from attempting to influence Justice Department investigations. Members of the ethics committee released a statement saying they couldn't comment on an ongoing matter.

Also on Monday, Michael Battle, the Justice Department official who oversees the U.S. attorney's offices, resigned. In January, Battle sent an e-mail to all U.S. attorneys announcing that he'd be leaving and sent a more detailed e-mail to his immediate staff in February with his departure date, a Justice Department official said.

On Dec. 7, Battle told most of the U.S. attorneys that they were to be fired. Former prosecutors said that Battle told many of them he didn't know why they were fired, but the orders came from "on high."

Messenger In Prosecutors' Firings Quits (NYT)

By David Johnston

WASHINGTON, March 5 — The Justice Department official who told seven United States attorneys in December that they were being dismissed said Monday that he was resigning.

Michael A. Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, said in a statement that his departure was unrelated to the dismissals, but Democrats said he appeared to be a casualty of the uproar over the firings.

Mr. Battle, formerly a United States attorney in Buffalo, is not believed to have played a significant role in the decision to remove the United States attorneys, although Justice Department officials said he had accepted it.

Mr. Battle said in his statement that he had been planning to leave the agency since last June.

But Democrats in Congress said the timing of his departure, on March 16, appeared unusual.

With hearings planned on Tuesday in the Senate and the House, a House Judiciary panel said on Monday that it would issue subpoenas to two more of the ousted prosecutors, Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona. The panel had previously subpoenaed four prosecutors.

The week is shaping up as pivotal for the new Democratic majority, a chance to exercise its subpoena and oversight powers over the Bush administration on two politically charged fronts: the circumstances of the removal of the United States attorneys and the treatment of veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Democratic leaders say it is the beginning of a fundamentally different power relationship between Congress and the Bush administration. Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who is chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said of the administration: "In the past, they would stonewall this through a news cycle and know they could ride it out. Now they know there's a Congress of another party, with the power of subpoenas, the power to hold hearings, the power to ask questions."

One of the dismissed United States attorneys who are expected to testify is David C. Iglesias, who was removed as the top federal prosecutor in New Mexico. Mr. Iglesias is expected to describe in detail the phone calls he received last year from Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico, and an unidentified Republican lawmaker, Congressional aides said.

Mr. Iglesias has said the calls were intended to press him into bringing indictments that would embarrass Democrats before the November 2006 elections. The case centered on an investigation of a kickback scheme related to a construction project involving a former Democratic official. Mr. Domenici has acknowledged making a call to the prosecutor but has said he did not press Mr. Iglesias.

Mr. Domenici is one of the three Republican members of the state's Congressional delegation. One of the other lawmakers, Representative Steve Pearce, has said he did not contact Mr. Iglesias. The remaining Republican, Representative Heather A. Wilson, told The Washington Post on Monday that she had spoken with Mr. Iglesias but said she had not pressured him.

Also on Monday, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington asked the Senate Committee on Ethics whether Mr. Domenici violated Senate rules when he contacted Mr. Iglesias. The group noted that Mr. Domenici made the call shortly before the November elections, in which control of the House came down to a handful of competitive races.

Carol C. Lam, who was removed as United States attorney in San Diego, said in testimony prepared for her appearance in the House that "in most of our cases, we were given little or no information about the reason for the request for our resignations." Ms. Lam said in her written testimony that she would not speculate on the reasons.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who has led the Senate investigation into the removals, said the ousted prosecutors wanted to talk about their experiences. "We have spent decades trying to insulate U.S. attorneys from the political process," Mr. Schumer said, "and it looks more and more like all that has been undone in the last few years."

Both the issue of the ousted United States attorneys and the disclosure of dilapidated facilities and poor care at Walter Reed fit neatly with core Democratic charges: that the Bush administration is more interested in politics than in government and that despite its rhetorical flourishes, it is not doing enough for the troops.

Dems Question DoJ Resignation In Wake Of Attorney Dismissals (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Susan Crabtree

The Hill, March 6, 2007

Democrats are questioning the timing of the resignation of a Department of Justice official who called to fire several U.S. attorneys late last year.

Michael Battle, a former U.S. attorney who serves as the director of the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, will leave his post voluntarily March 16.

The circumstances surrounding Battle's departure add to questions Democrats plan to ask about whether politics played any role in the firings of seven U.S. attorneys, some of whom were pursuing public-corruption cases against GOP lawmakers. The House and Senate Judiciary committees will hold hearings featuring the testimony of several of the fired U.S. attorneys today to investigate the matter.

A Department of Justice staffer said only that the public-affairs office planned to send out a statement about Battle's resignation; it did not do so by press time yesterday.

Battle called six federal prosecutors in early December to fire them, and reportedly was unhappy about doing so.

A Justice Department spokesman told the Associated Press that Battle "was not involved in the actual decision-making."

"This raises another question about a subject where there are already too many unanswered questions," Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who will chair today's Senate Judiciary Committee hearing with U.S. attorneys, said in a statement. "While Mike Battle, a man of integrity, must issue the customary denial, the timing of this resignation asks whether he's another casualty of the U.S. attorney imbroglio."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and Judiciary Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative Law Chairwoman Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.) vowed to "do everything in their power to unearth the facts surrounding Battle's resignation."

"The wheels seem to be coming off the Bush administration's increasingly hollow defense of its decision to fire eight U.S. attorneys," Sánchez said. "The administration's explanation of Mr. Battle's apparent resignation is as murky as everything else they have told us about this case."

Six ousted U.S. attorneys are slated to tell their stories to a House subcommittee today and four will appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee, as the flap surrounding their dismissal threatens to engulf two Republican lawmakers.

Democrats have seized on the U.S. attorney departures to bolster their charges of cronyism in the administration. Although replacing U.S. attorneys is a common move by a president at the beginning of a term — Clinton famously reshuffled their ranks when he entered office — it's unusual for an administration to make such changes midterm.

The Democrats' net unexpectedly may have snared their GOP colleagues, after New Mexico prosecutor David Iglesias alleged that two lawmakers had called him before his resignation to push for expediting a state corruption probe.

Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) acknowledged over the weekend that he called Iglesias to ask for an update on the progress of a contentious investigation of alleged kickbacks to a local Democratic politician related to a lavish courthouse construction contract. Domenici denied pressuring Iglesias on the case and said he had recommended the prosecutor's removal before making the call.

The identity of the other congressional caller remains unconfirmed. Iglesias has said both lawmakers were New Mexico Republicans, and Rep. Heather Wilson — often mentioned as a possible replacement for the 74-year-old Domenici, her political mentor — is the only member of the delegation who declines to comment on the allegations.

Iglesias's testimony today may pose a new dilemma for Democrats, who must decide whether to pursue any potential ethics violations that may arise from the prosecutor's sworn testimony. The U.S. attorney scandal so far has proven an effective Democratic cudgel against the Bush administration, but formal complaints against sitting Republicans, particularly the well-liked Domenici, could create unanticipated partisanship.

Schumer demurred late last week when asked whether he had discussed Iglesias's charges with Domenici.

"I don't think that's appropriate," the Democratic Caucus vice chairman said.

Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) spoke of the U.S. attorneys late last week as part of a pattern of unilateral decision-making by the White House, which used a little-known provision in last year's Patriot Act reauthorization to install replacement prosecutors without promptly seeking Senate confirmation.

"It's entirely consistent with the unitary executive … diminishing the power of Congress," Durbin said. When asked whether he had discussed Domenici's alleged call to Iglesias with the senior Republican, Durbin added, "I think that's what you do for a living."

In the House, however, Republicans already may have started an ethics war of words by pledging last week to block the assignment of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is under FBI investigation for bribery charges, to the Homeland Security Committee.

"Any time they're calling attention to Jefferson, they have a problem because they have many members with problems," a Democratic aide said. "Whether it's Wilson or other Republican members, they will no doubt get bitten in the behind."

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) was one of the first lawmakers to shine a spotlight on the resigned prosecutors' predicament, after his state's U.S. attorney, H.E. "Bud" Cummins, was asked to depart to make room for a former aide to senior Bush adviser Karl Rove. That replacement since has agreed to forgo formal Senate confirmation, and Pryor said he has met with Rep. John Boozman (Ark.), the state delegation's sole Republican, to discuss new recommendations to send to the White House.

Of the New Mexico case, Pryor said, "It would seem inappropriate for a member of Congress to try to intervene in a political investigation, whether to speed it up or slow it down."

William Canfield, a former Senate Ethics Committee counsel who now practices at Williams & Jensen, said any charges Iglesias may make would be difficult to prove without substantive evidence of the nature of the lawmakers' calls. Members of Congress are forbidden from making "ex parte" communications with executive-branch employees aimed at influencing investigations.

"I don't think [rules about] ex parte communications would stop a member of the Senate or House from getting on the phone with a local U.S. attorney and asking, 'What are you doing?'" Canfield said. "None of that is a request for information, just advice that the U.S. attorney take this case seriously."

The case on which Iglesias was working at the time of his dismissal centered on Manny Aragon, a former state Senate president pro tem and influential figure in Albuquerque's Democratic establishment. Aragon was accused of taking payments from a construction company that worked on several city courthouses, and local media reports hinted at imminent indictments several times late last year with none materializing from Iglesias.

Wilson's reelection challenger last year was state Attorney General Patricia Madrid, whom she ultimately beat by 861 votes. Wilson accused Madrid during the campaign of being soft on crime, a contention state Republicans believed to be bolstered by Madrid's decision to seek indictments of cooperating witnesses in yet another corruption probe that Iglesias was pursuing.

Illustrating the cosseted circles of New Mexico politics, Iglesias and Madrid first encountered each other in 1998, when the future U.S. attorney lost the attorney general's race to the future Democratic House candidate.

Watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) sent a letter to the Senate Ethics Committee on Monday calling for an investigation into Domenici's phone call to Iglesias. Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, said they would file an ethics complaint against Wilson if Iglesias names her tomorrow as the other caller during his testimony.

"They're not going to do anything," she said. "They, like the House committee, are just a fig leaf. I'd be shocked [if they] actually took this up because they never take anything up."

Gerald Hebert, of the Campaign Legal Center, also said Domenici's admission raises serious ethical questions.

"Domenici can claim all he wants that he didn't put any pressure on that prosecutor," Hebert said. "But there is inherent, implicit pressure whenever a senator calls someone like that."

Hebert said Domenici's action warrants an ethics investigation, but he also said he doubts the Senate Ethics Committee will act on it.

"They have a very shaky record of being able to police themselves," he said. "That's why we've called upon the Senate to establish an [outside] office of public integrity — their track record is not a good one."

Former Prosecutor Says Departure Was Pressured (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — The former federal prosecutor in Maryland said Monday that he was forced out in early 2005 because of political pressure stemming from public corruption investigations involving associates of the state's governor, a Republican.

"There was direct pressure not to pursue these investigations," said the former prosecutor, Thomas M. DiBiagio. "The practical impact was to intimidate my office and shut down the investigations."

Mr. DiBiagio, a controversial figure who clashed with a number of Maryland politicians, had never publicly discussed the reasons behind his departure. But he agreed to an interview with The New York Times because he said he was concerned about what he saw as similarities with the recent firings of eight United States attorneys.

As in those cases, there are conflicting accounts of the circumstances that led to Mr. DiBiagio's ouster. The Justice Department disputes his version.

His office had been looking into whether associates of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. had improperly funneled money from gambling interests to promote legalized slot machines in Maryland. Mr. DiBiagio said that several prominent Maryland Republicans had pressed him to back away from the inquiries and that one conversation had so troubled him that he reported it to an F.B.I. official as a threat.

But he said that the Justice Department had offered little support and that that made it "impossible for me to stay."

Several current and former officials in the Baltimore office said Mr. DiBiagio voiced concerns in 2004 that the corruption inquiries were jeopardizing his career, a view that they shared.

The Justice Department rejected Mr. DiBiagio's explanation. An official in the department, David Margolis, said he told Mr. DiBiagio in 2004 that he had to leave because "we had lost confidence in him."

Mr. Margolis said the prosecutor's harsh management style had caused resentments in the office that ran "wide and deep" and called "an absolute fairy tale" the idea that Mr. DiBiagio's departure was tied to the gambling case or any other investigation.

Mr. Ehrlich, who was defeated for re-election in November, denied any involvement in Mr. DiBiagio's departure and said there was nothing to the gambling investigations.

The controversy over the dismissals continued to grow on Monday, as the head of the Justice Department office that oversees prosecutors stepped down, a watchdog group filed an ethics complaint, and House and Senate committees prepared for testimony on Tuesday from some of the ousted prosecutors.

Because Mr. Ehrlich was the sole statewide Republican in Maryland at the time of Mr. DiBiagio's appointment in 2001, he had a critical role in recommending him to the White House for the position.

Mr. DiBiagio, a former assistant prosecutor, was a political unknown, but he and the governor had become friends as young lawyers in Maryland. The bond disintegrated soon after the prosecutor took office.

Mr. Ehrlich and his advisers acknowledged on Monday that they were unhappy with Mr. DiBiagio's handling of an earlier corruption investigation that led to the indictment in 2003 of Mr. Ehrlich's state police superintendent, Edward R. Norris, over his misuse of police money.

The gambling investigation caused less concern in the governor's office because officials there considered it without merit, Mr. Ehrlich said. But because of lingering suspicions in Maryland political circles that Mr. Ehrlich's people had a hand in Mr. DiBiagio's departure in early 2005, a longtime aide to the governor, Jervis Finney, called Mr. DiBiagio a few months ago to deny any involvement, Mr. Finney said.

Mr. Finney said in an interview Monday that he wanted to "clean things up" and to let Mr. DiBiagio know that "neither Gov. Bob Ehrlich or his representatives had asked the Department of Justice to push him out."

Mr. DiBiagio said he did not accept the explanation.

"I believe it was that investigation that played an integral role in what was done to me," Mr. DiBiagio, now at a law firm here, said about the gambling inquiries. "I clearly got the message that I had alienated my political sponsor and I would not have any political support to stay another term. Clearly, they wanted me to leave."

Mr. DiBiagio pointed to tense conversations in 2003 and 2004 with advisers to the governor who, he said, intimated that the corruption investigations could derail his career. He would not name them publicly.

The former prosecutor said he was particularly troubled by one visit in June 2004 in which, he said, a lawyer allied with the governor said the gambling inquiries were disrupting legislative consideration of the slots question and should be shut down.

Mr. DiBiagio said the lawyer inquired about his political future, asked whether he was interested in being a judge and suggested that his life could be closely scrutinized.

Mr. DiBiagio said he described the conversation in a memorandum for his records and reported it to an official of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Baltimore as a possible threat.

Soon after the meeting, Mr. DiBiagio told a Justice Department official in Washington about his office's gambling investigation and said, "Powerful politicians and businessmen are very upset that we are looking into this matter," according to an e-mail message that The Times reviewed.

Investigators were said to be interested in tracing substantial payments made by a gambling company to a political marketing business in Maryland with ties to Maryland Republicans, people involved in the issue said.

Mr. Ehrlich said Monday that he had no knowledge of any improper transactions to support the slots initiative, and he said the investigation was unfounded.

"I've been for slots for 20 years," he said. "It wasn't any shock that I was for slots. There wasn't anything to this."

The investigation appears to have ended after Mr. DiBiagio left office in January 2005.

In Maryland law enforcement circles, Mr. DiBiagio had as many detractors as supporters. The Justice Department publicly rebuked him in mid-2004 over a leaked memorandum that spoke of his desire to bring three "front page" corruption cases before November, a memorandum widely interpreted in Baltimore as an effort to pursue Democrats.

In response, the department said all public corruption cases in Maryland would have to obtain approval by superiors in Washington. Soon, the department initiated an unscheduled performance review of Mr. DiBiagio. Mr. Margolis said the review had shown deep resentment over the prosecutor's aggressive management.

Several officials in the Baltimore prosecutor's office said that although Mr. DiBiagio had been an unpopular manager, the timing of the events leading to his departure appeared to be linked, at least partly, to the corruption investigations.

"We had several investigations that were very sensitive publicly, and what did him in was the probes into prominent Republicans," said a former official involved in the inquiries who insisted on anonymity.

The state's attorney in Baltimore, Patricia C. Jessamy, who worked often with Mr. DiBiagio, said she believed that he had alienated too many important people to succeed.

"He was a good prosecutor," she said. "But he did not play politics well, and that was his downfall."

N.M. Calls May Spark Probes (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, March 6, 2007

A pair of Judiciary panel hearings today featuring testimony from at least four U.S. attorneys who were summarily fired by the Justice Department could spark the first major ethics probes of the 110th Congress.

The star witness at this morning's Senate Judiciary hearing and this afternoon's House Judiciary session will be ousted U.S. Attorney for New Mexico David Iglesias, who has told various media outlets that two New Mexico lawmakers contacted him in mid-October 2006 to inquire about the pace of an ongoing corruption probe of local Democrats.

Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) already has admitted to, and apologized for, making a phone call to Iglesias in mid-October. But Domenici denied doing anything improper, saying in a statement over the weekend that "at no time in that conversation ... did I ever tell [Iglesias] what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter."

Various media reports have singled out Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) as the other lawmaker who contacted Iglesias to ask about the corruption probe. Her office did not return phone calls on Monday.

On Monday, ethics attorneys off Capitol Hill said that Domenici's behavior involved seriously suspect activity and could result in Senate Ethics Committee action, a major investigation by the Justice Department or even an independent counsel.

"Having been in Washington for 35 years, I'm sure we're headed to a full-blown obstruction investigation of some variety that will involve not only the Members of Congress but the Justice Department itself," said Stan Brand, a former House general counsel who now works at Brand Law Group.

"This isn't some rulemaking, this is serious stuff and I don't know where it ends or what the outcome is, but it's going to have to be investigated," Brand added.

Senate Rule 43 states that: "Senate offices should refrain from intervening in such legal actions ... until the matter has reached a resolution in the courts."

Attorney Jan Baran of Wiley Rein, who has counseled GOP clients, said it is unclear if there was a violation of Senate Ethics rules, let alone any laws that would lead to a broader probe.

"It can be an issue with the Senate Ethics Committee as to whether he was properly inquiring about an ongoing investigation," Baran said. "We just don't have all the facts."

Several attorneys said the situation was a rare one and drew comparisons to the "Keating Five" scandal in which lawmakers intervened with federal regulators on behalf of savings and loan operator Charles Keating.

"The ethics rules attempt to balance the job of a Senator representing constituents and making sure the government is responsive with the ethical consideration that they not intervene in investigative or other formal agency type proceedings," Baran explained.

"The lines are not always clear," he said.

But attorney Kenneth Gross of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom said that both the timing — right before an election — and the nature of Domenici's call were suspect.

"The more I look at this, the more troubling it is," Gross said, a former associate general counsel at the Federal Election Commission. "It's one thing if it's a mere status request as opposed to one that carries with it pressure. And the nature of the proceeding, in this case a criminal prosecution, is among the most delicate for any type of inquiry."

On Monday, the liberal group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington wrote to the Senate Ethics Committee asking the panel to investigate Domenici's behavior. The Senate Ethics panel can consider complaints from groups such as CREW when deciding whether to launch an investigation, while the House ethics committee does not allow complaints to be filed by outside groups.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) — who is currently serving as chairwoman of the Senate Ethics Committee while Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) recuperates from brain surgery — did not return a call for comment.

If the Senate panel launched an investigation of Domenici or the House panel began a probe of Wilson, both committees would attempt to keep their activities secret.

Brand suggested any investigation would go beyond the scope of the ethics committees and directly expand into a criminal probe, which could not be managed by the Justice Department since it is involved in the allegations.

Justice Department officials have conceded that Domenici personally called Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on at least four occasions to complain about Iglesias. Those contacts occurred in September 2005, January and April 2006, and again in October 2006.

The Domenici revelations further fuel Democratic charges that there has been improper political interference by the Bush administration in judicial proceedings. They say at least seven U.S. attorneys were unfairly fired for political reasons and are set to be replaced with political cronies. The Justice Department maintains that the seven — with the exception of Bud Cummins III, the ex-U.S. attorney for Eastern Arkansas — were dismissed for "performance based" reasons.

"More than any other Justice Department officials, U.S. attorneys must be above reproach," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who will chair today's Senate Judiciary hearing. "Today's revelations call into serious question whether they allowed such independence in this administration."

Schumer also questioned the timing of the imminent departure from the Justice Department of Mike Battle, the director of the executive office of U.S. attorneys. The Justice Department released a statement Monday saying Battle's departure, which he notified Justice of months ago, was "unrelated" to the U.S. attorneys controversy.

"This raises another question about a subject where there are already too many unanswered questions," Schumer charged.

A Republican, Iglesias serves in the Navy Reserve and was the model for Tom Cruise's character in the movie "A Few Good Men."

Though he would not name the lawmakers who contacted him, Iglesias told The Associated Press last week that he "frankly felt violated" by the contacts. "They were very troubling phone calls," he said.

The other prosecutors slated to testify today are Cummins, ex-San Diego Attorney Carol Lam, who secured the guilty plea of former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), and John McKay, the former U.S. attorney for the Western district of Washington.

Since their firings and the Congressional uproar, the U.S. attorneys have remained relatively silent about their treatment. In earlier testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy U.S. Attorney Paul McNulty claimed that the bulk of the firings were "performance related."

One Democratic Senate aide said he expected the U.S. attorneys to speak "candidly" about their frustrations today.

The House Judiciary hearing today will consider legislation drafted by Rep. Howard Berman (D-Calif.) that would reverse an amendment to the USA PATRIOT Act that allows the U.S. attorney general to permanently appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The subcommittee on commercial and administrative law plans to meet this morning to consider subpoenaing two other fired U.S. attorneys: Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has already passed legislation to amend the USA PATRIOT Act and return that power to district courts until the Justice Department submits a name for Senate confirmation.

Yang Denies Departure Is Linked To That Of Other U.S. Attorneys (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

A former U.S. attorney for Los Angeles, Debra Wong Yang, dismissed questions about the timing of her departure, which occurred about a month before several other U.S. attorneys were fired late last year.

Wong Yang was heading up the investigation into Rep. Jerry Lewis's (R-Calif.) ties to a lobbying firm and the millions of dollars in contracts the firm's clients received from Congress. Wong Yang, the first Asian-American woman to serve as a U.S. attorney, left her post with Justice to become a partner at Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher, the law firm representing Lewis. She will co-chair the firm's crisis-management practice group, along with Washington, D.C., partner Theodore B. Olson, a former Bush administration solicitor general.

Wong Yang said her departure was a personal decision based on financial concerns and the fact that she is a single mother, and had nothing to do with the firings of other U.S. attorneys. She also said her departure would not affect the case against Lewis in any way, noting that the Justice Department said it would have allowed her to stay in the position "as long as I wanted to."

"The investigation [into Lewis] would never be delayed or affected in any way because of my departure," she said. "We had 260 attorneys in that office."

She said that she had been looking for a more lucrative position in the private sector for months and that a longtime friend, Nick Hanna in the Orange County office of Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher — not Olson or anyone else with close ties to the Bush administration — first contacted her about the position. She said she turned down a more lucrative offer from another firm to take the job at Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher.

Issa To Testify On Lam Firing (NCT)

By William Finn Bennett, Staff Writer

North County Times, March 6, 2007

NORTH COUNTY -- U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa will testify Tuesday at one of two congressional hearings addressing the firing of former San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam and a handful of other U.S. attorneys.

The hearings come in the wake of pressure from Democrats who have raised questions about whether the recent sacking of Lam and the other U.S. attorneys was politically motivated.

Issa has been one of the chief critics of the Yale-educated Lam, who left her post on Feb. 15 after being asked to resign in December. Issa criticized Lam for what he saw as a failure to prosecute illegal immigrant smugglers.

Issa said Monday that Lam lost her job because she failed to fulfill part of her mandate.

"Clearly she needed to be fired for not implementing policy over a long period of time," the Vista Republican said during a telephone interview. Issa's 49th District covers much of northern North County and Southwest Riverside County.

Starting in early 2004, Issa and other Republican members of Congress began sending letters to Lam and the attorney general's office complaining about the job she was doing.

Issa, who will testify before a House panel, said he takes "maybe one twentieth" of the credit for Lam's dismissal, adding that he believes that California Democratic U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein also played a role.

On Monday, Issa's office sent to the North County Times a copy of a June letter from Feinstein to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in which Feinstein expressed concerns about the low rate of human smuggler prosecutions by Lam's office.

"It has come to my attention that despite high apprehension rates by Border Patrol agents along California's border with Mexico, prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office Southern District of California appear to lag behind," Feinstein wrote.

Feinstein spokesman Scott Gerber said Monday that Lam's office addressed the issues Feinstein had raised and that the senator never suggested Lam be dismissed.

"There is a difference between raising a concern and saying someone should be fired," Gerber said. "What the Justice Department has done is unnecessarily dismiss a number of U.S. attorneys with good records."

In a written release issued Monday, Issa maintained Lam's firing was justified.

"Only someone who believes that trafficking human beings isn't a serious crime could look at Carol Lam's record and say she was removed for no good reason," he wrote.

But Feinstein's office continues to maintain the dismissal was political. In late February, Feinstein sent a letter to Democratic Majority Leader Harry Reid, in which she noted the Justice Department had given Lam and five of the other fired U.S. attorneys positive performance reviews.

"These reports confirm my speculation that the rash of firings that occurred in December was not based on misconduct or poor performances," Feinstein wrote.

A spokeswoman for Gonzales said privacy issues prevented her from talking about performance review details but confirmed Issa's position that the San Diego office had the lowest number of prosecutions of any U.S. attorney's office on the Southwest border.

The spokeswoman, Tasia Scolinos, also said the performance reviews Feinstein referred to evaluated the U.S. attorneys' offices as a whole and "not necessarily ... the U.S. attorneys themselves."

Lam's four-year tenure was highlighted by the investigation and indictment of former 50th District U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who pleaded guilty in late 2005 to taking more than $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for steering tens of millions to defense contractors.

The former eight-term Republican congressman is now serving an eight-year sentence in a federal prison near Tucson. Cunningham's former district covers most of North County including Encinitas, Carlsbad, San Marcos and Escondido.

U.S. Rep. Linda Sanchez, the chairwoman of the subcommittee conducting Tuesday's 2 p.m. House hearing, also sent a letter Gonzales in mid-February suggesting the firings were politically motivated.

In her letter, Sanchez questioned why Lam had been asked to step down even as the investigation into Cunningham's co-conspirators was starting to "bear fruit."

"It is vital that U.S. attorneys be able to prosecute wrongdoing free from political pressure," Sanchez and the others wrote.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will conduct a similar hearing starting at 10 a.m.

The dismissed attorneys issued a joint statement Monday, saying they were given "little or no information about the reason" for their firings.

"When we had new ideas or differing opinions, we assumed that such thoughts would always be welcomed by the department and could be freely and openly debated within the halls of that great institution," they said.

Group Seeks Probe Of Domenici's Call To Iglesias (ALBTRIB)

By Michael Gisick

Albuquerque Tribune, March 6, 2007

Although no member of the New Mexico delegation sits on the two congressional committees that will interview Iglesias and other dismissed U.S. attorneys Tuesday, Republicans are expected to ask tough questions about Iglesias' tenure.

Democrats say they believe Iglesias and other federal prosecutors were political victims, and want to know more.

Iglesias is scheduled to testify in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee in a hearing that begins at 8 a.m. New Mexico time. The cable news channel C-SPAN may televise the hearing, but the channel's Tuesday schedule will not be finalized until late this afternoon, a spokesman said.

Iglesias will testify before a House Judiciary subcommittee beginning at noon MST. C-SPAN coverage is possible, but not confirmed as of early today, a C-SPAN spokesman said.

A Washington, D.C., group today called for a congressional investigation into whether Sen. Pete Domenici violated Senate ethics rules by contacting then-U.S. Attorney David Iglesias about an ongoing corruption case.

But about the same time Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said the call to Iglesias looked like political pressure, the Justice Department released information that Domenici, an Albuquerque Republican, had long-held concerns about Iglesias' performance, starting more than a year earlier.

The two announcements help illustrate the debate expected Tuesday as two congressional panels take up the firings of eight U.S. attorneys, including Iglesias: Were the dismissals unwarranted political pressure, or simply the end result of poor performance?

After Iglesias announced last week he had received calls from two members of Congress before the Nov. 7 election pressing him about the pace of corruption investigations involving New Mexico Democrats, Domenici has denied any involvement.

"I have no idea what he's talking about," the senior senator said.

On Sunday, Domenici admitted he had called Iglesias, but denied putting pressure on the U.S. attorney.

The citizen group that filed the complaint points to a Senate ethics rule that say senators "should refrain from intervening" in an ongoing case "until the matter has reached a resolution in the courts."

The manual also indicates that senators are not to communicate with an agency regarding ongoing enforcement or investigative matters, according to CREW.

And in initially denying Iglesias' allegation, Domenici may have violated Senate rules by engaging in "improper conduct which may reflect upon the Senate," the group said in a statement.

In the meantime, the Justice Department said today that Domenici called Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his deputy four times - starting in September 2005 - to question whether Iglesias was "up to the job."

In a written statement this weekend, Domenici apologized for his October phone call to Iglesias, then said he had been concerned for several years about the slow pace of prosecutions.

"New Mexico needed a new U.S. attorney," Domenici concluded.

Iglesias has said he was fired for resisting pressure to rush a corruption probe reportedly focused on Democrats.

Similar claims have been made about seven other U.S. attorneys, all Republicans, fired in recent months. Democrats have called it an unprecedented political purge of federal prosecutors.

Indeed, the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Tuesday, called by Chairman Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat, is titled, "Preserving Prosecutorial Independence: Is the Department of Justice politicizing the hiring and firing of U.S. attorneys?"

"I would say this statement sets the stage for the hearings," University of New Mexico political science professor Lonna Atkeson said. "I'm sure you'll see the Republicans try to establish these issues."

Ethics rules permit members of Congress to request a status report on a case from federal agents if they're doing so at the behest of constituents.

In his statement, Domenici seemingly moved to insulate himself from ethics charges, saying he'd received a "growing number of inquiries from constituents" about the courthouse case.

"I asked Mr. Iglesias if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at," Domenici said. "It was a very brief conversation, which concluded when I was told that the courthouse investigation would be continuing for a lengthy period.

"In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologize," the senator said.

Domenici, who recommended Iglesias' appointment by the Bush administration in 2001, said his frustration grew "as we tried to get more resources for it, but public accounts indicated an inability within the office to move more quickly on cases."

Iglesias has said the October calls seemed especially interested in whether indictments in the courthouse case would come ahead of the Nov. 7 election.

U.S. Rep. Heather Wilson, an Albuquerque Republican, was then locked in a bitterly close race with Attorney General Patricia Madrid, whom Wilson had accused of being soft on corruption.

Iglesias has said he felt "violated" by the calls and believes he was fired because he refused to "play ball" by rushing the indictments.

Iglesias has, however, acknowledged that he failed to report the calls to the Justice Department as required, a decision he said he regrets.

Wilson, who has not responded to several reports naming her as the other person who called Iglesias, did not have any comment Sunday, a spokesman said.

As Democrats continue to refer to the firing of the attorneys in the terms of a nefarious mystery, observers say the new majority in Congress is certain to push an issue that pits powerful Republicans against their own appointees as far as they can.

"Where this goes is going to depend on where the Democrats take it," said Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond. "And that's going to depend largely on what the U.S. attorneys have to tell them - what they give the Democrats to work with."

Rep. Linda Sanchez, the California Democrat who heads the House subcommittee that subpoenaed four of the prosecutors, has said contact like that described by Iglesias might violate ethics laws.

While Domenici's statement may have taken some of the heat off her for the moment, Atkeson said Wilson will still have to address the matter. Iglesias has said he will identify who contacted him when he testifies Tuesday.

"I still think this has the potential to be much worse for (Wilson) because she's the one who stood to gain" from the indictments, Atkeson said. "She was the one up for re-election, not Pete."

Lawmakers On The Line (WP)

WHEN MEMBERS of Congress call, people listen -- especially if those people are political appointees who owe their positions in part to support from the lawmaker at the other end of the line. That is why the phone calls made to David C. Iglesias, the since-replaced U.S. attorney in New Mexico, by home-state Republicans Sen. Pete V. Domenici and Rep. Heather A. Wilson are so troubling. The Senate and House ethics committees have a duty to investigate.

Mr. Domenici has acknowledged calling Mr. Iglesias, as did Ms. Wilson in a statement to The Post yesterday. Inquiring about the status of a criminal investigation would be ethically dicey under any circumstance, but this was not any old criminal investigation. It was a corruption probe that involved a local Democrat, and the calls were made in the run-up to last November's election, in which Ms. Wilson's seat was in peril amid a swirl of allegations involving congressional Republicans. So when Mr. Domenici says he simply asked the prosecutor "if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at," the query was not a simple act of senatorial curiosity. It was an ill-advised intrusion into an ongoing criminal investigation.

Mr. Domenici says that "at no time in that conversation or any other conversation with Mr. Iglesias did I ever tell him what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter. I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way." Simply placing the phone call was pressure enough, and if Mr. Domenici didn't mean to exert improper pressure on the prosecutor, he should have realized that his actions were nonetheless susceptible to that interpretation.

Mr. Domenici's initial response to the allegations of Mr. Iglesias was to tell reporters, "I have no idea what he's talking about." As his statement on Sunday demonstrated, Mr. Domenici knew full well that he had talked to the prosecutor, and his failure to be forthcoming adds to the questions about his conduct. As for Ms. Wilson, her repeated refusal to answer questions about "that personnel matter" did not reflect well on her. Now she says she had merely been relaying constituent complaints that the prosecutor was "intentionally delaying corruption investigations." She owes her constituents and colleagues an explanation.

Mr. Iglesias should have reported the lawmakers' phone calls to the Justice Department in Washington, as protocol dictates. He is to testify on Capitol Hill about the calls today. That may be illuminating. But more urgent is for the Justice Department to stop hiding behind vague assertions of "performance-related issues" and explain, finally and clearly, why Mr. Iglesias and seven other U.S. attorneys were dismissed.

U.S. attorney scandal update: Who's to blame for those alarming Patriot Act revisions?

The U.S. attorneys purge scandal is heating up. The House and Senate have convened hearings for Tuesday, promising an orgy of named names and pointed fingers. Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., now admits what he once denied: that he may have had a hand in the removal of New Mexico's U.S. attorney. And the senior Justice Department official who personally canned the U.S. attorneys has just announced the date of his resignation.

But as the political scandal spreads, the question at its heart gets less and less public attention: Who changed the Patriot Act to make it easier to replace U.S. attorneys without oversight, and how did it happen with nobody looking?

U.S. attorneys are well aware that they serve at the president's pleasure, but new wording in the Patriot Act made it worth the president's while to fire a big, fat lot of them and hire a group of new ones. And while certainly half the scandal is that the Justice Department did that—let eight U.S. attorneys go, seemingly for no reason—we seem to have forgotten that even without the mass firings, this law had been changed in the sneakiest way imaginable.

The background: When Congress reauthorized the Patriot Act last year, it included little-noticed language that changed the way U.S. attorneys would be appointed if their predecessors were removed in the middle of their term. Under the old regime, interim U.S. attorneys needed to be confirmed by the Senate after 120 days. If they weren't, federal district judges could select their replacement. The new language removed both judicial and congressional oversight of the interim U.S. attorneys, letting DOJ anoint them indefinitely. This served three important goals: consolidating presidential power, diminishing oversight, and ensuring that "interim" prosecutors had permanent jobs.

On Feb. 6, when the Senate held hearings on the issue of prosecutorial independence, former judiciary committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., proudly claimed to have been as clueless as the rest of us. Denying New York Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer's claim that he or his staff had "slipped the new provision into the Patriot Act in the dead of night," Specter asserted, "The first I found out about the change in the Patriot Act occurred a few weeks ago when Sen. [Dianne] Feinstein approached me on the floor."

Specter added that he only looked into how the provision was altered after Feinstein told him about it. As he explained, "I then contacted my very able chief counsel, Michael O'Neill, to find out exactly what had happened. And Mr. O'Neill advised me that the requested change had come from the Department of Justice, that it had been handled by Brett Tolman, who is now the U.S. attorney for Utah, and that the change had been requested by the Department of Justice because there had been difficulty with the replacement of a U.S. attorney in South Dakota."

Thus, at least according to Specter, O'Neill had merely been following orders from the Department of Justice when he snuck new language into the Patriot Act that would consolidate executive branch authority. Huge relief there.

Now, it's not necessarily outrageous that Sen. Specter didn't know what his subordinate slipped into the legislation. The Patriot Reauthorization was a long and hotly debated bill. While one might hope that the committee chairman would have read the legislation, you can understand that he might skip a clause or two in the melee. But this was not some minor technical amendment. It was a substantial enhancement of executive power. So, Specter now finds himself in an exceedingly strange position: His staff either lied to him or misled him about what he acknowledges to be a significant legal change. He himself observed at that same hearing: "I did not slip it in and I do not slip things in. That is not my practice. If there is some item which I have any idea is controversial I tell everybody about it."

So, Specter concedes that the item is controversial. He denies knowing about it. That implies it was O'Neill who slipped the new language in, and misled Specter and the Senate. And yet, at least as far as I can tell, nobody in power has said a word about O'Neill's conduct, and not one iota of blame has been laid at his doorstep. Joe Conason noted in Salon last month that 1) O'Neill is a former Clarence Thomas clerk, and 2) he joined Specter's staff at the same time Specter was fighting accusations of being wobbly in his fealty to the White House.

The Justice Department has been quite clear that this change was needed to do away with judicial incursions into an executive function: They felt it improper that judges were effectively making executive-branch appointments. And it now seems that either the DOJ snookered O'Neill, O'Neill snookered Specter, or Specter snookered his colleagues. But any way you slice it, the executive seems to have encroached on congressional turf in order to expand executive turf.

Whether Specter actually knew that O'Neill was carrying water for Karl Rove and turned a blind eye, or whether he was duped by O'Neill may never be known. But either way, it seems to me that Specter's office has done terrible damage to the very notion of independent and co-equal branches of government in this affair, and has yet to be called to account for it. Given that respect and esteem for co-equal independent branches of government is one of the senator's sacred cows, it's doubly ironic that no one has questioned him on this.

It's a good thing that the ousted U.S. attorneys will testify before the House and the Senate. It will clear up a good deal of confusion about the Justice Department's claim that there was something wrong with their job performance. But it seems to me that that's precisely 50 percent of the scandal here. And there are some other folks deserving of subpoenas as well. Mr. O'Neill and Mr. Tolman spring to mind. The outrage isn't merely that the Justice Department abused its power to hire and fire. The real scandal is that it rewrote federal laws to do so, yet nobody seems to know who did it or why.

Unaccountably Called To Account (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

So this is what accountability looks, sounds and feels like. It's been so long -- since George W. Bush moved into the White House -- that we hardly recognize what used to be a commonplace phenomenon, as much a part of Washington's behavioral DNA as megalomania and mendacity.

Imagine how surprised Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey must have been when Defense Secretary Robert Gates fired him last week over the shocking neglect of injured veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Gates, who cut his teeth in George Bush the Elder's administration, obviously didn't get the memo about how blatant malfeasance is handled by George Bush the Younger's crew.

Remember what happened to George Tenet (the former CIA director who said it was a "slam-dunk" that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction), Gen. Tommy Franks (who led the Iraq invasion, making decisions that allowed the insurgency to form) and Paul Bremer (who botched the Iraq occupation, allowing the insurgency to grow)? Bush gave them all the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Harvey would have had every right to expect the usual tut-tut from the White House. The commander of Walter Reed, Maj. Gen. George Weightman, had already fallen on his sword. Never mind that Weightman had been in charge only since August, which means he inherited the situation. The post commander was resigning, and that should have been enough. Harvey needed an interim director to run Walter Reed, so he turned to the medical center's former commander, Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, on whose watch the shabby treatment of outpatient vets became standard practice.

Gates was not amused, and the next day Harvey was out of a job. Kiley was out as well, at least as Walter Reed's chief. It's hard to believe, but the officials who presided over a terrible failure of government are actually being held accountable.

This administration's nonchalance about its most grievous transgressions has been stunning, and the only inference that fits the facts is that the people running our government don't really believe in government at all. They certainly haven't taken it seriously.

The White House has accepted even the worst outrages with a shrug. Look at what happened after the Abu Ghraib atrocities came to light. The low-ranking troops who tormented those prisoners were brought to justice. But senior officers -- who should have installed procedures and oversight that never would have let that kind of depravity take place -- were allowed to go their merry way. What message did this send to the Arab world?

The debacle after Hurricane Katrina was so total that the hapless FEMA director, Michael Brown of "heck of a job" fame, had to go. But what did the White House expect, after putting the former judges-and-stewards commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association in charge of marshaling the nation's first response to the disaster? Why did the administration keep Brown on the payroll for weeks as a consultant? And now, with New Orleans and much of the Gulf Coast still prostrate, is anyone being called onto the carpet?

Before Gates arrived, it was awfully difficult to get fired by this administration for failing to do your job. Brown hardly counts, since he never should have been hired in the first place. Donald Rumsfeld presided over the Iraq war mess for years before his policies were essentially rejected by the American people last November. Generally, though, incompetence has not been a firing offense.

Political incorrectness, on the other hand, seems to be more than enough to get you shoved aside.

In December, the Justice Department fired eight U.S. attorneys -- top federal prosecutors -- in New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, California, Washington and Arkansas. The administration acknowledges that one of the prosecutors, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, was ousted so his job could be given to a former aide to White House political czar Karl Rove. Hey, what's wrong with that?

Another of the fired prosecutors, David C. Iglesias, said he was being pressured by two members of Congress to speed up a criminal investigation that involved a Democratic legislator. The pressure came last fall, before the midterm election, Iglesias said. Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) admitted on Sunday that he called Iglesias and asked about the investigation, saying he was looking for "an idea of what time frame we were looking at" -- but he denies pressuring Iglesias.

The White House acknowledges that complaints from members of Congress factored into the decision to fire the prosecutors, who say they had no prior indication of unhappiness with their performance.

Do a good job, do a bad job -- who cares? With his quaint ideas about accountability, clearly Robert Gates doesn't understand how this White House works.

Worth A Second Look (LAT)

WHEN LAST we left the question of whether the Bush administration had improperly removed a handful of U.S. attorneys, there was a lot of smoke and no fire. A month later, some of the smoke — such as the theory that Carol Lam was removed in San Diego to thwart the prosecution of a politically connected defense contractor — has dissipated. But other firings have created sparks of concern that Congress is right to investigate.

A House Judiciary subcommittee has subpoenaed some of the dismissed prosecutors, including Lam, to testify today about their removals. The Senate Judiciary Committee is close behind. We hope that the hearings generate light and not just partisan heat.

Today's star witness is likely to be David Iglesias of New Mexico, who has complained that, before being fired, he was approached by two Republican politicians who wanted him to expedite an investigation that could have embarrassed state Democrats before last November's election. Over the weekend, Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) acknowledged that he had called Iglesias to ask about the "time frame" of that investigation. On Monday, the Justice Department said Domenici called U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales or his deputy on four occasions to complain about the prosecutor.

Last month, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty assured the Senate Judiciary Committee that none of the removals were designed to thwart ongoing investigations or to punish prosecutors for investigating public corruption. At the same hearing, McNulty said that the firings were "performance related." Yet some of the dismissed prosecutors had received positive evaluations. This seeming contradiction needs to be cleared up, not just by Congress but by the Justice Department's inspector general.

That said, we continue to oppose a proposal by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would return to federal judges the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The bill is grounded in a suspicion that the Bush Justice Department wants to install cronies in U.S. attorneys' jobs indefinitely and without Senate confirmation — a claim the administration denies and must now refute with prompt presidential nominations subject to Senate confirmation.

Even after being approved by the Senate, a U.S. attorney — like a member of the Cabinet — is an officer of the executive branch who under our system of government can be removed by the president at a moment's notice. Congress has no business asking whether such dismissals are wise, but it has every right to determine whether they are intended to thwart or politicize the administration of justice. That question should be the focus of today's hearings.

Purged Prosecutors (HC)

Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, March 6, 2007

Competent U.S. attorneys should not be fired for petty politics or cronyism.

The unprecedented dismissal of eight top U.S. prosecutors at the behest of the White House late last year finally is getting the attention it deserves. House and Senate judiciary committees are preparing to question the ousted U.S. attorneys.

There are indications the purge was anything but the routine bureaucratic shuffle claimed by Justice Department spokesmen. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' deputies gave conflicting explanations as to why the officials were forced to resign.

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam in San Francisco was relieved of her post after successfully prosecuting Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham for taking bribes. In Arkansas, a former aide to Bush political adviser Karl Rove, J. Timothy Griffin, was named as the temporary replacement for H.E. Cummins III.

A former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, David Iglesias, says GOP officials pressured him concerning a pre-election investigation of Democrats before he was forced out. U.S. Sen. Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., admitted contacting Iglesias to inquire about the probe of Democratic state lawmakers and issued an apology. Iglesias says he also was contacted by a second Republican lawmaker, U.S. Rep. Heather Wilson of New Mexico. She has not commented.

Congressional ethics rules mandate that lawmakers refrain from any contact with parties to specific legal actions until the matter has been resolved in the courts. According to the Justice Department, Domenici also repeatedly complained about Iglesias to Attorney General Gonzales and Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty.

All of the ousted attorneys are Bush appointees, with good records as prosecutors. McNulty testified at a congressional hearing that the shake-up occurred because of performance-related issues, but he was mistaken. Most of the attorneys' personnel evaluations turned out to be highly complimentary.

The most innocuous explanation for the mass firing is that White House officials simply wanted to create vacancies so cronies could burnish their resumés during the closing years of Bush's presidency.

Considering that at least one of the dismissed prosecutors was highly effective in bringing corruption cases against high-ranking Republicans, partisan revenge probably played a role in some of the firings.

DOJ_NMG_0140573

Former U.S. Attorney Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada told The New York Times that superiors told him he was being dismissed to make room for a favored appointee.

"You hear something like that, there is a sense of disbelief," Bogden said.

Getting rid of dedicated federal prosecutors in order to dispense their jobs as short-term plums places patronage above justice. If some government attorneys were dismissed in order to derail or speed up investigations for partisan gain, such conduct borders on the criminal.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Supreme Court Turns Down Appeal From Imprisoned Former WorldCom Chief (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, March 6, 2007

The Supreme Court turned down an appeal Monday from former WorldCom chief Bernard Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year prison sentence for fraud and conspiracy.

The justices rejected without comment Ebbers' bid for review of his 2005 conviction based on his contention that he was denied a fair trial.

Ebbers argued in court papers that the trial judge improperly allowed prosecutors to use testimony from witnesses who had been given immunity, but denied immunity to potential defense witnesses.

The judge also instructed jurors that they could find Ebbers guilty if they believed he suspected a crime was being committed but intentionally looked the other way.

A federal appeals court upheld the conviction last year, acknowledging that Ebbers' sentence for a white-collar crime was longer than sentences routinely imposed by many states for violent crimes. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said Ebbers' actions to hide WorldCom's financial problems were substantial and had cost investors dearly.

Ebbers was convicted for his role in the massive fraud that drove Clinton, Miss.-based WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002.

Investigators uncovered $11 billion in fraud at WorldCom Inc., much of it because accountants were classifying regular expenses as long-term capital expenditures. The company re-emerged under the name MCI. Verizon later bought MCI.

In 2005, the court unanimously threw out the conviction of the Arthur Andersen accounting firm for destroying Enron Corp.-related documents because the jury instructions were too broad.

The case is Ebbers v. United States, 06-590.

Toronto Holding Company Pleads Guilty In Hollinger Fraud Case (AP)

By Mike Robinson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

(AP) - CHICAGO-A private Canadian holding company used by former media baron Conrad Black to control the Hollinger International newspaper publishing empire pleaded guilty Monday to defrauding Hollinger.

Toronto-based Ravelston Inc. entered its plea to a single count of mail fraud as lawyers for Black and the federal government prepared to start jury selection March 14 for his racketeering and fraud trial.

Black, 62, and three other former Hollinger executives are charged with plundering $80 million (â,¬61 million) from Hollinger, mainly by selling off hundreds of community newspapers across the United States and Canada.

Black allegedly received sizable payments from the buyers in exchange for signing agreements not to compete with them by starting or buying newspapers in markets where the ones sold by Hollinger were circulating.

Prosecutors say the non-compete money should have gone to Hollinger shareholders and not into the pockets of Black and other executives.

Black and the three other executives have pleaded not guilty and vowed to fight the charges.

Ravelston had been trying for weeks to plead guilty, but the company was blocked until last week in a Canadian court from going ahead with the plea.

Black owns 65.1 percent of Ravelston and had sought to block the plea. But the company is in receivership and the receiver, who is responsible to the creditors, won permission from a Canadian court last week to go ahead and plead guilty.

Chicago attorney Deborah Steiner, representing Ravelston, entered the plea with authorization from the Toronto-based receiver. Under a signed agreement with prosecutors, the company would pay a $7 million (â,¬5.3 million) fine under terms of the plea agreement.

U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve must still decide whether to give her approval to the agreement.

In pleading guilty, Ravelston admitted its role in a complex legal maneuver growing out of the September 2000 sale of community newspapers.

The total sale price was $14 million (â,¬10.7 million). Of that amount, $400,000 (â,¬305,740) was set aside as compensation for agreement not to enter into competition.

Ravelston arranged to have $300,000 (â,¬229,305) of the non-compete money sent to Hollinger International, based in Chicago, and 25 percent to Hollinger Inc., a separate Canadian holding company controlled by Ravelston.

Ravelston admitted it knew of no request from the buyer for a non-compete contract with Hollinger Inc., whose name sounds like Hollinger International and which owns part of International but is a separate firm.

Ravelston acknowledged that its decision to siphon $100,000 (â,¬76,435) of International's coffers represented a conflict of interest.

In its plea agreement, Ravelston acknowledged that the loss to Hollinger from the count to which it was pleading guilty was only $100,000. But it also acknowledged that the loss from the entire scheme - which took in a number of other sales of Hollinger International assets - came out to $83,950,000.

How much the decision of Ravelston to plead guilty will affect the Black trial is unclear, but prosecutors already had key documents involved.

Lead prosecutor Eric Sussman declined to comment.

Also Monday, both sides began sorting out the questionnaires that prospective jurors filled out in advance of March 14 jury selection. Defense attorneys agreed on 16 individuals they wanted to exclude from a list of 106 prospective jurors.

St. Eve set a further hearing in the Ravelston case for June 29. 2007

Clock Ticking On Prosecuting Backdating Of Stock Options (MERCN)

By Troy Wolverton

The San Jose Mercury News, March 6, 2007

Federal prosecutors investigating the backdating of stock options are bumping up against a legal deadline that will probably affect when they file charges and what charges they bring.

Under federal law, prosecutors typically have five years to bring charges of securities fraud. For many of the backdating cases, that time window could be closing, because the misdating of stock options largely ended in 2002 thanks to new regulations.

``It's a prevailing issue in most of the cases," said one Bay Area defense attorney, who asked not to be named. Added the attorney, who is a former federal prosecutor, ``Is the government under pressure (to make decisions) sooner rather than later? The answer is yes."

The five-year deadline also means that the government could soon lose the chance to file charges on some of the most egregious instances of backdating.

There are ways around the deadline issue: The government can attempt to pause the clock, for instance, or file charges related to the backdating (for example, conspiracy or lying to prosecutors) if not on the backdating itself. But prosecutors can't get the clock to stop permanently, and the related charges could well be easier for defendants to challenge and can carry lighter penalties.

``There's some room for creativity," said another former federal prosecutor, who also asked not to be named. ``But they don't want to risk that. They want to go with the most solid theory they have."

Quicker indictments

The U.S. Department of Justice investigated alleged backdating at Brocade Communications Systems for 18 months before moving to indict former Chief Executive Greg Reyes. Indictments of officials at other companies could take a fraction of that time, in part because of concern about this legal ticking clock.

Indeed, the pace of the overarching backdating investigation appears to have quickened. In recent days, federal prosecutors secured a guilty plea from a former executive at Monster Worldwide in a backdating case and are reportedly close to bringing similar charges against the former general counsel of McAfee. Take-Two's former CEO also recently pleaded guilty to backdating in New York state court.

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, declined to say whether the government felt pressured by the five-year deadline or if it would prompt quicker actions in outstanding cases.

``It's something we're aware of," said Macaulay, whose office has been handling the lion's share of the backdating investigations. ``It's something we take into account in the final analysis of how we are investigating and prosecuting cases."

The government can -- and frequently does -- seek waivers from potential defendants that pause the clock. But the government generally has to have a pretty good idea about what charges it might bring against a defendant before it can seek such agreements, meaning that it has to have done at least a cursory investigation.

Even then, defendants don't always agree to them, and when they do, the so-called tolling agreements usually don't last more than six months -- a year at most, legal experts say. At the end of that time, the clock starts ticking again, unless the government can secure another waiver, typically for an even more limited duration.

``The tolling agreement doesn't completely get the government off the hook," the first former prosecutor said. ``You don't know (if) the next time you call for further extension, the answer is going to be no."

A little extra room

However, prosecutors could have a bit of deadline leeway in some cases and with some potential defendants. Even if most backdating ended five or more years ago, the misdated options were generally accounted for inaccurately.

Companies restate their financial results in new regulatory filings years after the fact. Many didn't restate their results until the past six months or so to include the real cost of the backdated options. Theoretically, prosecutors could allege that executives in the know about the backdating were covering it up until recently through the understated financial reports.

``That could extend the statute for a couple years," said Jeffrey Bornstein, a white collar defense attorney with K&L Gates. But he adds, ``I don't know if that's been tested or not."

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

A judge declared a mistrial in a $170 million fraud case against accounting firm BDO Seidman LLP after an attorney for the Portuguese bank suing the firm mentioned the suicide of one of the company's executives, against the judge's orders.

Miami-Dade County Circuit Judge Jose M. Rodriguez agreed with BDO Seidman that it couldn't receive a fair trial.

A lawyer for Banco Espirito Santo SA last week mentioned the suicide while questioning a witness. The judge had prohibited references to the suicide, in an order issued before the trial began.

In a 2004 lawsuit, Banco Espirito Santo accused BDO Seidman of failing to uncover the fraud at a former partner of the bank, E.S. Bankest LLC. The bank said BDO Seidman, hired to audit Bankest's books, failed to find signs of the fraud beginning in the late 1990s in part because the firm had financial ties to another Bankest partner.

The Big Four accounting firms typically settle high-stakes cases. Those actions often involve damage claims that run to the billions, rather than millions, of dollars. But BDO, along with fellow second-tier firm Grant Thornton LLP, are often willing to risk a trial.

A lawyer representing BDO Seidman, Mark Schnapp, argued that the jury would associate the suicide with the uncovering of fraud at the financial-services firm, a connection that was never suggested.

Testimony in the aborted trial began in late January. A meeting was set for tomorrow to plan for a new trial.

Steven Thomas, an attorney for Banco Espirito Santo, said his co-counsel's reference to the suicide was unintentional.

RIM Sets Restatement, Shake-Up On Board In Backdating Fallout (WSJ)

By Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

In the latest fallout from the stock-options backdating scandal, Research in Motion Ltd. said it made widespread accounting errors in issuing some 3,000 improperly dated options grants going back to the 1990s and would take a roughly $250 million restatement.

Co-Chief Executive Jim Balsillie, a recipient of some of the grants improperly accounted for, stepped down as chairman of RIM. He and co-CEO Mike Lazaridis, who also received options, agreed to pay about $4.25 million each "to assist RIM in defraying costs" from the board probe and restatement, the company said.

Though some executives have repaid some gains from backdated shares, no executives have made such payments in the unfolding backdating scandal.

RIM, the maker of the popular BlackBerry hand-held device, said all options granted before late February 2002 and approximately 321 grants made between that time and August 2006 were improperly accounted for. The 321 grants represent approximately 63% of the grants made by the company after Feb. 28, 2002. Correcting the accounting likely will cut earnings up to the end of RIM's fiscal year 2006 by $250 million, a much larger restatement than investors had expected. In September, RIM indicated it would have to restate between $25 million and $45 million in results. The company didn't name a new chairman.

• The News: Research In Motion said correcting options-related accounting errors will reduce earnings through fiscal year 2006 by about $250 million.

• The Backdrop: The maker of the popular BlackBerry devices is among scores of companies hit by options backdating.

• The Explanation: Co-CEO Balsillie said the accounting issue slipped by management amid the company's quick growth.

RIM posted $382 million in net income on $2.1 billion in revenue in its most recently reported fiscal year, ended March 4, 2006. RIM said the announcement yesterday came after a seven-month probe by a special board committee.

RIM also said Dennis Kavelman, the company's finance chief, will become chief operating officer of administration and operations. Two board members on the compensation committee, E. Kendall Cork, who is with Sentinel Associates Ltd., and Douglas Wright, president emeritus of the University of Waterloo in Ontario, have resigned from all board committees and won't stand for re-election. The company also added two board seats.

RIM said an informal investigation is continuing by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Ontario Securities Commission. RIM shares fell $1.45, or 1%, to $134.52 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The improprieties identified by the board included the practice of backdating options -- that is, pretending they were issued at an earlier time than they actually were, when RIM's share price was lower. Such backdating can increase the payoff for recipients by setting an artificially low strike price, increasing the gain when the options are exercised. About 140 companies are under investigation for backdating.

"It has been determined that several errors occurred in the accounting for options, including the fact that in many cases, the company did not grant options with an exercise price equal to the fair-market value of the shares on the day of the grant," RIM said in a written statement.

BlackBerry Head Ousted; Earnings To Be Restated (WP/BLOOM)

By Chris Fournier And Ville Heiskanen, Bloomberg News

Research in Motion, maker of the BlackBerry e-mail phone, will restate earnings by about $250 million and said James Balsillie will give up his post as chairman following a review of its stock-options grants.

Research in Motion did not find intentional misconduct by its executives, according to a statement released by the company, based in Waterloo, Ontario. The restatements, which are not yet complete, cover more than three years of results dating back to 2004.

The adjustment exceeds an earlier prediction by Research in Motion, which forecast in January that restatements would cut past earnings by more than $45 million. In concluding its options probe, the company said Balsillie would remain co-chief executive as it separates the roles of chairman and chief executive to upgrade corporate governance.

Research in Motion is one of at least 200 companies that have disclosed internal or federal investigations into options. Investigators are trying to determine whether companies inflated the value of employee options by backdating or timing the grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low.

Balsillie and co-chief executive Michael Lazaridis will voluntarily contribute $8.5 million to cover some costs of the review and the restatement, the company said. Directors and officers will return any benefit from mispriced options, the company said.

All grants except those to the company's chief executives were made "by or under the authority of" Balsillie, the company said. A special committee of the board found the company had "failed to maintain adequate internal and accounting controls with respect to the issuance of options in compliance with the company's stock option plan," it said.

Balsillie said in an interview yesterday the company's options probe "hasn't affected our business one bit."

McAfee Plucks EMC Executive For CEO (WSJ)

By Vauhini Vara And Joann S. Lublin

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

McAfee Inc., trying to move past fallout from a federal investigation of its stock-options grants and revive its growth, named EMC Corp. executive David DeWalt as its new chief executive.

The hiring of Mr. DeWalt, EMC's head of world-wide customer operations, comes as McAfee tries to stabilize its executive bench after a string of financial debacles, including probes into improperly dated stock-options grants. Mr. DeWalt, a 42-year-old software industry veteran, will be the Santa Clara, Calif., security-software maker's fourth CEO in six years.

George Samenuk, McAfee's last permanent chief executive before Mr. DeWalt, resigned in October after an internal probe found accounting irregularities related to stock-options grants. Last month, a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint claimed that Mr. Samenuk had known about a change to a 2002 stock-option grant made in his favor by a subordinate. The complaint charged Kent H. Roberts, McAfee's former general counsel, with fraud for his alleged role in manipulating options and followed a criminal indictment of Mr. Roberts. Mr. Samenuk hasn't been charged.

Mr. DeWalt, who starts at McAfee on April 2, is expected to clean up the mess. The company plans to restate several quarters of past financial results in the wake of the stock-options problems. Interim chief Dale Fuller, the board member who temporarily replaced Mr. Samenuk, will remain on the board. Chuck Robel will remain chairman.

Mr. DeWalt joins McAfee as the security-software industry enters a more difficult phase after years of go-go growth. McAfee's antivirus software for home users and companies was once in demand as computer users sought to protect themselves against viruses and worms. But new threats like "phishing" have displaced the old ones, leaving McAfee and other security-software makers scrambling to catch up. Priorities have also shifted at businesses, where security officers are focused on new problems like keeping corporate data from getting lost or stolen. McAfee recently launched products to fight phishing and data leakage, but those areas are already crowded.

McAfee also faces new pressure from big technology companies that are investing heavily in security. International Business Machines Corp., Cisco Systems Inc. and Mr. DeWalt's former employer EMC have all bought security companies in the past year.

McAfee's stock price has risen more than 4% so far this year, fueled partly by rumors that McAfee could be a candidate for a takeover by private-equity investors or a big technology maker. Mr. DeWalt's appointment is likely to quell such speculation, at least for a while. Yesterday the stock was down 43 cents to $29.55 in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

EMC directors tried to keep Mr. DeWalt by offering him a chance to become chief operating officer and possible successor to 59-year-old CEO Joe Tucci, according to one person familiar with the situation. "They certainly wanted [Mr. DeWalt] to stay and made it very difficult for [him] to leave," another knowledgeable individual said.

Though EMC directors were grooming Mr. DeWalt for the corner office, "Tucci isn't going to retire anytime soon," the second person added. And Mr. DeWalt, who ran Documentum Inc., a storage-software vendor that EMC acquired in 2003, "very much wanted to be a CEO" again.

Acceptance of the chief operating officer post also would have required Mr. DeWalt to move cross country. EMC is based in Hopkinton, Mass., while Mr. DeWalt worked from Documentum's Pleasanton, Calif., headquarters. EMC yesterday announced that its vice chairman, Bill Teuber, will expand his responsibilities to include Mr. DeWalt's customer-operations duties.

Mr. DeWalt emerged as front-runner for McAfee CEO soon after the search began last December. "The board was immediately impressed by him because he had been a CEO before" and grew a business with stalled growth, the first informed individual recalled. The main stumbling block was whether McAfee directors "could extract him out of EMC."

The new McAfee leader will enjoy a pay package roughly comparable to Mr. Samenuk's, and include equity partly linked to performance triggers, this person reported. McAfee promised Mr. Samenuk a 2006 salary of $900,000 and set his maximum bonus at $1.35 million for last year, according to McAfee's April 2006 proxy statement.

If Mr. DeWalt thrives running McAfee, there is always the chance that EMC someday might buy his new employer, too. "He could end up being CEO of EMC anyway," the first informed individual observed.

Grasso Case's New Lawyer (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

NEW YORK -- New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo named lawyer Benjamin E. Rosenberg to be his chief trial counsel, a role that will include handling high-profile cases such as the long fight against former New York Stock Exchange Chief Executive Dick Grasso.

Mr. Rosenberg, a partner with law firm Dechert LLP, will start in the state's law-enforcement office Monday, said a spokesman for the attorney general's office. His salary will be $140,000. Mr. Rosenberg, 48 years old, worked on several high-profile white-collar cases while at Dechert, said the attorney general's spokesman. Mr. Rosenberg couldn't be reached to comment.

The attorney general's office won a partial summary judgment in the Grasso case last year, but Mr. Grasso is appealing. A decision on the appeals is expected in coming months, and if Mr. Grasso loses, he may have to give $100 million or more of his compensation back to the NYSE, where he worked for decades. Mr. Grasso has been fighting the case and has said he did nothing to warrant giving back part of his pay package.

Mr. Cuomo's predecessor, New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, brought the case. Mr. Spitzer harshly criticized Mr. Grasso for collecting a pay package of $187.5 million while at the NYSE, which at the time was a not-for-profit company under New York state law.

Some legal experts predicted Mr. Cuomo would focus less on Wall Street cases than Mr. Spitzer. But the appointment of Mr. Rosenberg, a former assistant U.S. attorney in the Southern District of New York, shows that Mr. Cuomo is putting a formidable figure to take over the case against Mr. Grasso.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jurors Consider Cooper Conversation (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Jurors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby indicated yesterday they remain focused on whether Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff lied to the FBI about a July 12, 2003, conversation with Matthew Cooper, then a reporter for Time magazine.

In a note to the presiding judge late yesterday afternoon, jurors asked three questions about how they should decide whether Libby is guilty of making a false statement to investigators about his conversation with Cooper.

After sending the note, the jury concluded its ninth day of deliberations without reaching a verdict. During that time, it has sent U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton five questions about Libby's statements to the FBI regarding his conversation with Cooper.

The note was not released to the public. According to a partial description by Walton, who summoned lawyers for both sides to go over the note, the 11 jurors sought in one of the three questions to know whether they may consider Libby's March 2004 grand jury testimony about his conversation with Cooper as they deliberate whether he made false statements to the FBI months beforehand about the same conversation.

Libby gave the FBI and the grand jury similar descriptions of the conversation, saying he passed along gossip from other reporters about an undercover CIA officer to Cooper, and told Cooper he was not sure it was true. But the grand jury testimony is tape-recorded, and the defense has questioned the accuracy of an FBI agent's notes.

Walton released the jury for the day and said he would decide how to instruct them today.

Libby, 56, is charged with five felony charges of lying to the FBI and grand jury about his role in disclosing the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media. Her name and CIA job were revealed in a syndicated column in July 2003, days after her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly accused the White House of twisting intelligence he had gathered.

The CIA sent Wilson to Africa in 2002 to assess reports that Iraq had been trying to buy uranium from Niger for use in a nuclear weapons program. Wilson concluded those reports were baseless, and shortly after the Iraq war began, denounced President Bush and Cheney for using the claim as a central argument for war.

Prosecutors allege that, in the spring and early summer of 2003, Libby was part of a White House campaign to discredit Wilson, then lied to investigators to protect his job and spare Cheney and Bush political embarrassment.

Defense attorneys contend their client inaccurately remembered conversations about Wilson and Plame because he was busy with critical national security issues.

Also yesterday, defense and prosecution lawyers argued about how Walton should respond to a question the jury posed Friday about the definition of reasonable doubt. He responded by asking the jury for more information.

Libby's Jurors Inquire About One Charge (NYT)

By The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 5 — The jury considering the perjury case against I. Lewis Libby Jr. suggested on Monday that some of its members were deeply uncertain about one of the five felony charges.

Before the jurors departed at the end of their ninth day of deliberations, they sent a note to Judge Reggie B. Walton asking for clarification of Count 3, in which Mr. Libby is charged with giving a false statement to an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is charged with lying to the F.B.I. and to a grand jury investigating the leak, in 2003, of the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative, Valerie Wilson.

Judge Walton did not disclose the text of the query, which he is expected to address on Tuesday. But in the discussions he had with both sides' lawyers, it appeared that the jury was asking whether its members might consider Mr. Libby's testimony to the grand jury in March 2004 to help determine whether he made a false statement in his F.B.I. interview six months earlier.

The false-statement charge, which many lawyers view as the weakest count, involves a conversation Mr. Libby had on July 12, 2003, with Matthew Cooper, then a reporter for Time magazine, about Ms. Wilson.

Judge Walton has also yet to deal with a jury request to explain further the concept of reasonable doubt.

FBI To Probe Wal-Mart Employee (FT)

By Jonathan Birchall

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

The FBI is investigating the activities of a Wal-Mart "technician" who was fired by the retailer after it learnt that the employee had been intercepting electronic messages transmitted by people outside the company.

A company spokeswoman said the employee had used personal equipment to intercept all text messages sent "within a few miles" of Wal-Mart's Bentonville headquarters, and had collected messages containing certain key words, without giving more details.

ADVERTISEMENT

The unnamed “technician” also had been involved in recording telephone conversations between its public relations staff and a reporter for The New York Times without appropriate clearance, said Mona Williams, the Wal-Mart spokeswoman.

It follows trouble last year at Hewlett-Packard, the computer maker, over questionable techniques used in a leak investigation to obtain phone records.

Wal-Mart said it had found no evidence that the employee, who worked in the company’s information systems division, was acting on anyone else’s orders. “As far as we know, he was acting alone,” Ms Williams said.

Wal-Mart said it had learnt about the phone surveillance from another company employee in January and had informed the FBI, which has now launched an investigation into the affair.

The retailer said that while recording phone conversations involving its employees was not illegal, the taping of the reporter’s conversations over a four-month period had been carried out without the necessary approval.

It said that “the interception of text messages and pages that does not involve Wal-Mart associates is not authorised by company policies under any circumstances”.

Wal-Mart Tapings Spark Probe (WSJ)

By Gary Mcwilliams

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Federal investigators are probing a Wal-Mart Stores Inc. employee's electronic interception of telephone conversations and text messages of other employees and outsiders, including a New York Times Co. reporter.

People familiar with the issue said the criminal probe targets an employee who was searching for the identities of those who had leaked embarrassing company memos to the newspaper and others. Wal-Mart has been the subject of articles by the Times and others for its health-care, wage and benefit policies.

• News: Investigators are probing a Wal-Mart employee's interception of phone conversations and text messages of other employees and outsiders, including a New York Times reporter.

• Background: Wal-Mart has been the subject of articles by the Times and others for its health-care, wage and benefit policies.

• The Law: U.S. law prohibits intercepting wireless communications without a court order.

The U.S. attorney for Western District of Arkansas confirmed it has begun a probe after being notified by the Bentonville, Ark., retailer of the recordings and electronic interceptions. Deborah Groom, first assistant U.S. attorney, declined to say whether it had subpoenaed records or interviewed employees of the world's largest retailer.

Mona Williams, a Wal-Mart vice president, said the retailer fired two employees of its computer-systems department as a result of a nearly two-month internal review. One was a manager, who was dismissed yesterday. A third employee, also a computer-systems unit manager, was disciplined but not fired for "failure to carry out management duties," Ms. Williams said.

The technician, who Ms. Williams wouldn't identify further, had programmed the company's computers to search for calls originating from or directed to a Times reporter and to record those calls. A handful of other calls also were recorded, the Wal-Mart spokeswoman said. While she wouldn't name the reporter, people familiar with the issue said Times staff reporter Michael Barbaro was the primary target of the interceptions.

Wal-Mart Chief Executive H. Lee Scott Jr. personally apologized to Janet Robinson, chief executive of the New York Times, in a telephone call yesterday. The spokeswoman also personally contacted the Times reporter to deliver the news, she said.

In a statement, the Times said: "We are troubled by what appears to be inappropriate taping of our reporter's conversations. At this point we don't know many of the key facts such as what the purpose of this taping was and the extent, if any, to which the action was authorized."

The effort captured calls for a four-month period beginning in September and continuing until January of this year, Ms. Williams said. She added the technician used wireless equipment brought into the retailer's headquarters to capture text messages from personal digital assistants and pagers within a several mile radius of its Bentonville headquarters. She described the wireless equipment as the employee's personal gear.

Those text messages, from a variety of sources, were stored on company-owned computers and later scanned for unidentified "key words" that the employee had designated. Wal-Mart declined to identify the words.

Ms. Williams also wouldn't reveal the technician's motivations for recording the calls and messages, citing the federal investigation. She confirmed agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation were carrying out the probe for the U.S. Attorney's office.

The recordings began about the same time that a former Hewlett-Packard Co. board member publicly exposed a similar effort at the Palo Alto, Calif., computer maker. There, company-paid investigators had improperly obtained phone records and text messages of employees and news reporters in an effort to identify the source of embarrassing leaks about its former chief executive. Those complaints led to indictments of Patricia Dunn, the company's former chairwoman, and others.

U.S. law prohibits the interception of wireless communications without a court order. Wal-Mart said the technician's recording of phone calls involving its employees isn't against the law in Arkansas, but violated its corporate policies. It said recording text messages violates its corporate policies as well as U.S. law.

The two employees fired include a computer technician who allegedly intercepted and recorded phone calls, pager and text messages, and the technician's boss. Ms. Williams declined to further identify them.

"As far as we know, he was acting on his own," she said of the fired technician. "We can't speak to why the technician did what he did." She declined to say how many messages were intercepted during those four months.

Wal-Mart said it launched an internal investigation and contacted the U.S. attorney in January after an employee reported the interceptions. An internal investigation found phone, pager and text messages were captured and stored on its computers.

In the case of Hewlett-Packard, director Thomas Perkins had complained of the tactics being used by outside investigators hired to find the source of information leaks to reporters. Private investigators hired by H-P were accused of illegally accessing phone records of reporters, employees and directors. Criminal charges were filed by the California attorney general against Ms. Dunn, who pleaded not guilty, and security experts used by the company.

Wal-Mart Says Employee Taped Reporter's Calls (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

Federal investigators are looking into the actions of a computer systems technician at Wal-Mart Stores who, over a period of several months, intercepted pager and text messages and also secretly taped telephone conversations between Wal-Mart employees and a reporter for The New York Times, the company said yesterday.

The United States attorney's office for the Western District of Arkansas and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are assessing the actions of the employee and others inside Wal-Mart to determine whether federal and state laws were broken and whether they have jurisdiction in the matter, according to spokesmen for the investigators' offices.

Wal-Mart said the technician was not authorized to monitor and tape the conversations between members of its media relations staff and Michael Barbaro, a retail reporter for The Times.

The company did not say what led the technician to make the recordings or why Mr. Barbaro's conversations were the target.

Over the last year, Mr. Barbaro has written dozens of articles about Wal-Mart, including some that were based on internal company documents that were given to him by union-financed groups that were critical of Wal-Mart's business practices.

Mona Williams, a spokeswoman for Wal-Mart, which is based in Bentonville, Ark., said the company fired the technician and a supervisor yesterday. A third manager in Wal-Mart's information technology group was disciplined. Ms. Williams declined to identify the technician or his supervisors.

H. Lee Scott Jr., Wal-Mart's chief executive, called the chief executive of The New York Times, Janet L. Robinson, early yesterday to explain the situation and apologize, Ms. Williams said.

Ms. Williams added that she contacted Mr. Barbaro and personally apologized to him, as well.

Wal-Mart said it began an internal investigation into the matter on Jan. 11 after executives were notified by an employee about the recordings. It then notified the United States attorney's office two days later.

Over the course of a two-month internal investigation, Wal-Mart discovered that the technician had used a program that identified calls coming in from, or made to, Mr. Barbaro at The Times's New York headquarters from last September to mid-January, Ms. Williams said. The inquiry involved an outside technology firm that scoured more than 100 computer drives and other devices, she said.

Members of the media relations group, including Ms. Williams, were unaware they were being taped, Ms. Williams said.

"No one knew he was recording these conversations," Ms. Williams said in a conference call with reporters yesterday afternoon. "As a matter of fact, I'm not even sure he knew whose conversations he was recording. He simply programmed in the reporter's phone number and captured those calls."

It is unclear whether the technician was able to sort Mr. Barbaro's calls from those other Times reporters might have made to Wal-Mart since all calls from the newspaper's New York office register on caller ID screens as a series of numeral 1s.

The technician told investigators of some motives for his actions, Ms. Williams said, but she declined to say what they were because of the continuing investigations.

In a statement, a spokeswoman for The Times, Diane C. McNulty, said: "We are troubled by what appears to be inappropriate taping of our reporter's conversations. At this point, we don't know many of the key facts, such as what the purpose of this taping was and the extent, if any, to which the action was authorized."

Mr. Barbaro declined to comment.

At first blush, it does not appear that the taping of the conversations was illegal.

Under federal and Arkansas state law, a telephone conversation can be recorded if one party has given consent. Wal-Mart said that under its policy, all employees give their consent to the monitoring and recording of their calls made through Wal-Mart systems and equipment.

Wal-Mart said, however, that calls were monitored only in cases of suspected criminal activity or fraud and only with written consent from the company's legal department. No approval for the recordings was sought or given, the company said.

Ms. Williams added that in the course of the investigation only one person — a "senior-level lawyer" at Wal-Mart — listened to parts of the tapes between Mr. Barbaro and the media group.

The focus of any criminal investigation might be on the text messages and the pages transmitted near company headquarters by people who were not Wal-Mart employees; the technician made those interceptions using his own personal radio-frequency equipment.

"He captured all of the text messages that were within a range of his equipment," Ms. Williams said. "Some of those messages had key words in them that he was watching for. Those were captured and put into a separate file or bucket from the others." She declined to provide details of the messages or motives for those actions by the technician.

Federal and most state laws forbid the unauthorized interception of messages, said Rodney Smolla, dean of the University of Richmond Law School.

Wal-Mart Worker Secretly Taped Reporter's Calls (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

An employee for Wal-Mart secretly taped phone conversations between members of its public relations staff and a reporter at the New York Times, and intercepted text messages between people who do not work for the company, Wal-Mart officials disclosed yesterday.

Wal-Mart fired the technician it said was responsible and the employee's supervisor, both of whom worked in information systems at the retailer's headquarters in Bentonville, Ark. Another manager was disciplined. Spokeswoman Mona Williams said she could not say why the technician recorded the conversations.

"I can't really speak for why the associate did this," Williams told reporters yesterday during a conference call. "No one knew that he was recording these conversations."

The U.S. attorney's office for the Western District of Arkansas has opened an investigation into the case to determine whether the technician violated federal wiretapping laws, said Deborah Groom, first assistant attorney. A spokesman for the FBI did not return several phone calls or respond to an e-mail asking whether an investigation was underway.

The conversations took place between September and January and involved New York Times reporter Michael Barbaro, according to the newspaper's spokeswoman, Diane McNulty. Barbaro, who formerly worked for The Washington Post, wrote 38 articles about or referencing Wal-Mart during that time, including articles about new uniforms for workers, the retailer's marketing of energy-efficient light bulbs and the departure of top advertising executives.

Wal-Mart told the Times about the tapes yesterday. McNulty said the Times was not planning legal action, but was concerned about the actions. Reached by e-mail, Barbaro declined to comment.

"We are troubled by what appears to be inappropriate taping of our reporter's conversations," McNulty said. "At this point, we don't know many of the key facts."

Federal and Arkansas law allow a telephone call to be recorded if one party consents. Wal-Mart said all its employees consent to a blanket policy that allows electronic communications to be monitored or recorded at any time. But the retailer said it tapes phone calls only in "compelling circumstances," such as suspected criminal fraud or security issues, with written permission from its legal department. Williams said the recordings did not meet that threshold and that the employees speaking with Barbaro did not know they were being taped.

An investigation could include an examination of the strength of Wal-Mart's policy, said Mark Rasch, managing director of technology for consulting firm FTI and a former federal prosecutor who specialized in computer crime. Having a policy does not automatically imply consent, he said, especially if workers have reason to believe it would not be applied.

"It has to be well known, well distributed, and it's got to be used at some point," he said.

The technician also captured text messages and pages between people who do not work for Wal-Mart that were sent with beepers or handheld devices from several miles around the retailer's headquarters, Williams said. Data including certain keywords were routed into a specified file, she said.

Williams said none of the intercepted information involved reporters or public figures.

Wal - Mart Fires Worker Over Eavesdropping (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

NEW YORK (AP)-- Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said Monday it fired a systems technician who allegedly recorded phone conversations between the company's public relations office and a newspaper reporter. The case is now being investigated by federal authorities.

Wal-Mart said the technician, whom it did not identify, also intercepted text messages using his own personal equipment. The retailer said he was acting alone, but declined to say what his motive may have been.

Wal-Mart said its internal investigation began on Jan. 11 after an unidentified party alerted the company. That led to the discovery that the technician had monitored and recorded phone conversations between Wal-Mart's public relations staffers and a New York Times reporter between September 2006 and January 2007. Wal-Mart said it notified The New York Times earlier Monday.

A New York Times spokeswoman, Diane McNulty, identified the reporter as retail writer Michael Barbaro. She said the newspaper does not plan "to take any legal action at this time."

During the investigation, Wal-Mart said it discovered that, in separate instances, the same technician had intercepted text and pager messages, including communications that did not involve Wal-Mart employees.

The eavesdropping by an employee is only the latest controversy for the world's largest retailer, whose stock has been battered in recent months as sales growth stalled. The company also has been targeted by union-back groups about its health care benefits and wages. It also is fighting a class action lawsuit that accuses it of gender discrimination.

Wal-Mart spokeswoman Mona Williams said the technician "acted alone" and used his own personal equipment to intercept the text messages. "I can't speak for why he did what he did," she said.

Williams declined to identify who the targets were besides the Times reporter, but said they did not include the company's union-backed critics like WakeUpWalmart.com or Wal-Mart Watch. No other journalists' calls or messages were tapped, she said.

But Chris Kofinis, a spokesman for WakeUpWalmart.com, questioned that assertion, saying "we're deeply concerned that our privacy was violated."

Williams said the technician gave Wal-Mart some indication about why he targeted the New York Times reporter, who has been covering such issues as the company's labor rescheduling program and wage capping, but couldn't go into detail now that the investigation has been turned over to federal authorities.

Barbaro declined comment.

Wal-Mart said it would never authorize the interception of text messages and pages that do not involve Wal-Mart associates, the company's name for its workers.

Wal-Mart said it notified its audit committee of the allegations on Jan. 12 and on the next day, attorneys for the company notified the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Arkansas.

The company kept the U.S. Attorney updated during its internal investigation. Last Thursday, the U.S. Attorney notified Wal-Mart that it would conduct its own investigation.

"We are looking at this to determine if there has been a violation of federal law in our jurisdiction,'' said U.S. Assistant Attorney General Deborah Groom Monday. "That's really the only comment I can make at this time."

FBI officials in Washington said Monday the agency is reviewing the information "to determine if there was a violation of federal law and if the FBI has jurisdiction."

The company said it believes the unauthorized recording of telephone conversations by the systems technician did not violate any applicable federal or state laws because Wal-Mart policies subject all employees communications to possible monitoring or recording.

However, Wal-Mart said it records associate phone calls only in "compelling circumstances and with written permission from the legal department." The company said that the threshold for this permission is "high and limited to cases of high risk to the company or its associates, such as suspected criminal fraud or security issues."

In addition to firing the technician, Williams said it also fired the technician's direct supervisor and has taken disciplinary action against a management associate for failure to carry out their management duties.

Wal-Mart announced that it has taken a number of steps to strengthen its policies and controls surrounding the monitoring of recording of communications, effective immediately. It has also physically removed the recording equipment and any related hardware from the system.

"The company believes that these pager intercepts and the recordings of these telephone calls were wrong and has taken a number of actions to further strengthen our policies and controls," said Williams in a statement.

Associated Press writers Hope Yen in Washington and Peggy Harris in Little Rock, Ark. contributed to this report.

N.J. Man Accused Of Defrauding Cisco Of More Than $10M (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, AP Technology Writer

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- A computer technician working for the city of Newark, N.J., was arrested on charges he defrauded technology giant Cisco Systems Inc. of more than $10 million by cheating one of the company's programs for replacing broken or defective parts.

Michael Kyereme, 40, of Piscataway, N.J., was arrested Friday on a charge of mail fraud and made his initial appearance in Newark federal court on Monday, according to the FBI. He will remain in custody at least until a bail hearing Thursday.

Kyereme worked as independent contractor for Newark, assisting city employees when their computers needed troubleshooting, the FBI said. When he could not resolve a problem without outside help, he was authorized to contact Cisco for technical assistance and to order replacement parts.

According to the criminal complaint, Kyereme ordered about 280 parts from Cisco since August 2002 _ some worth more than $250,000 _ and made false claims that they were replacements for Cisco parts in the city's computer system that were "dead" or "not responding."

Kyereme is accused of cheating a Cisco program that requires the company to immediately replace broken or defective equipment without customers having to send in the problem parts first.

Investigators said Kyereme ordered replacements for pricey equipment that the city never had or didn't need replaced, sold the new gear to an out-of-state computer reseller, and pocketed the profits. He often didn't send back the parts he claimed were defective, and in some cases sent back the wrong parts that were worth less than the defective hardware, the FBI said.

A search of Kyereme's home on March 2 uncovered more than $3 million worth of parts that he ordered under false pretenses, the FBI said.

According to the criminal complaint, Kyereme told investigators that he was offered an "overwhelming" amount of money by the unidentified computer reseller to procure the Cisco parts and that "I knew what I was doing was wrong and that it was stealing."

A call to Kyereme's lawyer by The Associated Press was not immediately returned late Monday.

Kyereme's arrest was the second in a week involving a multimillion-dollar scam of Cisco's equipment-replacement program.

Michael Daly, 53, of Danvers, Mass., was arrested Tuesday on a wire fraud charge after he allegedly used false identities in 39 states and ordered replacement parts at least 700 times from Cisco without ever returning the defective items, or in some cases returning worthless parts that weren't covered under the program.

A Cisco spokesman declined to comment, other than to say the San Jose-based company is aware of the investigations and is cooperating with authorities.

Federal Prosecutor In R.I. Goes To New Orleans To Fight Crime There (SCRIPPS)

By Mike Stanton, The Providence Journal

Scripps Howard News Service (DC), March 6, 2007

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- Federal prosecutor Richard Rose makes presentations at schools on a regular basis. He has T-shirts and runs through the names of those killed by gang violence in Providence.

During the past few years, Rose has made a program called Street Smarts his mission as the anti-gang coordinator for the Rhode Island U.S. Attorney's office. He has spoken to more than 3,400 schoolchildren about the dangers of the streets, relating his own experiences as a fatherless black youth growing up in Providence.

The music that accompanies Rose's school presentation of the roll call of Providence dead is a New Orleans funeral dirge, by Wynton Marsalis. The music is part of a larger piece, writes author Stanley Crouch, "moving from a funeral march to a sermon to jubilation as the band comes back from the burying ground with an affirmative prance bent on beating the Devil and death itself."

Now Rose, the man best known for prosecuting ex-Providence Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr., is headed to New Orleans, where death is a near-daily occurrence in the wake of Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

Rose, 48, is part of a federal task force of prosecutors and agents from throughout the country who will spend the next six months in the Crescent City, combating the escalating gun violence. He is among the second wave of federal reinforcements in a program that began last year. On Wednesday, Rose will report for duty at the U.S. Attorney's office there.

"We've got to take the cowboys off the streets," said Rose, in an interview last week. "They had 161 murders last year, in a city of 200,000. Two weeks ago they had seven shootings in nine hours, five of them fatal _ that's a whole year for us!"

Katrina overwhelmed the city's law-enforcement structure, he noted. Floodwaters destroyed evidence and rendered courtrooms useless. Outside of the relatively safe tourist districts, criminals flooded lawless streets, emboldened by the chaos. Rose cried with his daughter as he watched television footage of refugees streaming across a bridge "like survivors in a B-movie where the nuclear bomb is dropped."

"The people with the resources got out," said Rose. The survivors have been left to "fight among the ruins."

Besides talking to students, Rose is part of a national effort by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to make gang and gun violence a top priority, second only to terrorism. While programs such as Street Smarts represents "the carrot," Rose also wields "the stick" by preaching zero tolerance. In the courtroom, he uses stiff mandatory minimum prison sentences to prosecute gun and drug crimes that the federal authorities would have ignored a few years ago.

Rose, who has been a federal prosecutor for 12 years, doesn't know what to expect in New Orleans. Federal drug and gun arrests are up. Last week, a man was indicted on federal charges of possession of a handgun at a Mardi Gras parade. A woman is charged with giving her 17-year-old son a gun that he allegedly used to kill another 17-year-old who had beaten him up.

Rose has read the online guidebooks that describe neighborhoods with soaring crime rates and streets still littered with debris. He will live in the Warehouse District, near the Mississippi River.

"There aren't many professions where you can do this," said Rose. "I have a great job and a great career, and now I have a chance to go down there and help a community in desperate need. Maybe I can learn some things that I can bring back and apply to Street Smarts."

Gang Peacemaker's Death Imperils Truce In Boston (USAT)

By Rick Hampson, USA TODAY

BOSTON — Two hooded strangers walked out of the darkness at the end of the street.

Jahmol Norfleet and his sister Teah, standing in front of their apartment house that night last November, stopped talking. On Holworthy Street, an unfamiliar face could mean danger — even since Jahmol, a leader of the notorious H Block gang, helped arrange a truce four months earlier in the city's bloodiest street war.

In the 18 months before the truce, about two dozen people were shot. Jahmol himself was an inch from death; there was a crease where the bullet grazed his scalp. After that he took a gun to school, got busted and spent a year in jail.

Then the gangster turned peacemaker. At a secret summit, H Block and its rival gang, Heath Street, agreed to a truce. When word finally leaked out, Boston was enthralled. Perhaps the truce could spread across the city, maybe even across a nation where gang violence was helping jack up the crime rate for the first time in 15 years.

So as the two strangers came down Holworthy, Teah would recall, she fought the impulse to run. After all, it was peacetime. Suddenly, the guys reached under their sweatshirts, pulled out pistols, charged through the parked cars and opened fire.

When it was over, Jahmol lay dead on the sidewalk.

The next day, Mayor Thomas Menino praised the young man for trying to "change his neighborhood from a place of violence to a community of peace." But now, three months after his death, it's unclear whether the gang truce is a national model, or even if it still exists.

National surge of violence

America has had street gangs almost as long as it's had streets. But gangs are turning up in more places, including towns, suburbs, even agricultural areas — "spreading like a virus," according to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Kevin O'Connor, an associate deputy U.S. attorney general, said at a conference on gangs last month that there was "a resurgence of gang violence in several U.S. cities." The Justice Department is surveying about 20 communities to determine how bad the problem is.

The National Youth Gang Center estimates the national number of gang members rose to 760,000 in 2004, the most recent year figures are available, up from 731,000 two years earlier. Los Angeles alone has about 40,000 gang members; the police say violent gang-related crime rose 14% last year.

Law enforcers are trying many strategies — midnight basketball leagues, gun buybacks, neighborhood sweeps, "start snitchin' " campaigns. None has approached the success a decade ago of what Newsweek hailed as "the Boston Miracle."

In the mid-1990s a coalition of law enforcers, social workers and inner-city black ministers imposed a gang cease-fire with a carrot-and-stick promise to gangsters: Keep fighting and face tighter probation checks, arrests on outstanding warrants, federal prosecution; stop and have a chance at a summer job, tutoring, a break in sentencing.

Its organizers drifted to other jobs or causes — including exporting the program to other cities — and some of its tactics were abandoned.

Jahmol Norfleet became enmeshed in an attempt to recapture and update that miracle. It was a risk, but, as he told Miniard Culpepper, a government lawyer and part-time pastor who became his mentor, he thought peace was worth it.

A tough beginning

Jahmol grew up poor. His parents split up, and he was raised by his grandmother in Roxbury, one of the city's toughest neighborhoods. In one thing he was lucky: He first hit the streets in the mid-'90s, during the Boston Miracle.

From 1990, when Jahmol was 5, to 1999, when he was 14, annual homicides in Boston dropped from 152 to 31.

He made it to his freshman year at Burke High School without incident. People liked 'Mol — the smile, the personality, the charm. "He'd always greet you — 'Hi Mr. B, how you doin?' " recalls Roscoe Baker, the dean of discipline.

Then he began to hang with kids like Yorki Lipscomb, whom police would later describe as a member of a gang named after a cluster of "H" streets — Humbolt, Holworthy, etc.

Heath Street, the rival gang, was based less than a mile away, in the big Bromley-Heath public housing project. The gangs shot it out over minor drug deals, turf, respect — all just a few miles from where tourists trod the Freedom Trail.

Although Baker and others say they thought Jahmol was good enough to play college basketball, he dropped off the school team. Soon his rap sheet had arrests for possession of marijuana and assault.

When he saw Jahmol at the basketball court, Culpepper would talk to him as long as he could. After the boy reached high school in 2001, the talks got shorter and shorter. Finally, Culpepper lost track of him altogether.

Jail and reform

Jahmol and some other H Block members were on the street one night in December 2004 when other youths began shooting, grazing Jahmol on the head, according to his relatives. His grandmother remembers him in the hospital, crying. For the first time, he seemed scared.

His family says that's when he began carrying a handgun wherever he went. On Feb. 8, 2005, he was taking his coat out of his school locker when the gun fell onto the hall floor. He got a mandatory year prison sentence for gun possession.

For most gangsters, jail is a criminal confirmation ritual; for Jahmol, it was aversion therapy. In letters and calls home, he professed his hatred for the routine, the boredom, the confinement.

The worst came that April, when his friend Lipscomb was shot. He died on the street, in the rain, a gun in his pocket.

There were no arrests. Out of hatred of the cops or fear of the perps, witnesses to gang shootings often refused to cooperate — to "snitch." Those seeking justice or vengeance were left to help themselves.

"These kids (Lipscomb's H Block mates) are on the warpath," Lipscomb's father later told The Boston Herald. "If the police don't get someone, it's going to get worse."

It did. On Nov. 28, 2005, Carl Searcy, a member of Heath Street, was shot to death as he rode his bike from a friend's house.

In a letter home, Jahmol wrote: "I don't want to live like this, and I don't want to die for violence. I want to die grey and old."

On the phone, he told his sister Teah, a year younger than he, the same thing.

"He said he wasn't gonna carry a gun anymore," she says. "He said he didn't care if they were gonna come shoot him down. He wasn't carrying a gun anymore."

Jahmol was released from prison on Feb. 9, 2006. He got a job and started studying for his GED. Baker, the high school dean, was startled by the transformation. "He seemed to have grown up. … You could see it in his face, his body, his gestures, his conversation. It was not the same Jahmol."

Deric Quest, an employment counselor, also was surprised. Gang leaders were jumpy, surly, uncooperative. This guy was on the front of his seat, all eye contact. "He was proud to have a certain street rep, but he didn't have a threatening bone in his body," Quest says. "He didn't seem like a gang leader as much as the leader of his friends."

Culpepper, meanwhile, had been spending time with H Block, trying to defuse the feud with Heath Street. By now — early 2006 — the Boston Miracle was a memory. The city had 75 murders in 2005, the most in a decade.

Culpepper had an idea he called "Adopt-a-Gang," in which ministers would work one-on-one with gangs to turn them from violence. H Block, however, didn't want to be adopted. Culpepper needed to find a leader to hook into. Then, one day at the basketball court, there was Jahmol.

After they got reacquainted, Culpepper made his pitch: H Block would establish a truce with Heath Street and get GED tutoring and job counseling. There'd be perks like a basketball tournament at the park, Celtics tickets, a fishing trip.

In the Boston Miracle, peace had been imposed for a time by superior outside force; now, gangs themselves would make peace, face to face, because they wanted to. Truces had been tried elsewhere, but they never lasted. This one could, Culpepper told H Block: "You need peace. You need something better than a gun."

Since leaving jail, Jahmol had realized how much he couldn't do, how many places he couldn't go, because of "the problem."

"OK, Rev," he said. "We'll do it."

Culpepper also had been bugging Jahmol without success to come to church. Then, one Sunday morning in June, the gang leader walked in and sat in the last seat in the last pew.

Over the next few months, he gradually moved up the aisle, until he was third from the front. A few of his tough-looking friends began to come, too — proving that H Block would follow him anywhere.

The peace summit

That was a secret. He and his boys had been frisked for weapons, relieved of their cellphones and told only that they were going to a "peace summit" with Heath Street.

The summit was the result of weeks of shuttle diplomacy by Jeffrey Brown, a minister who'd been involved in the Boston Miracle. He and other members of the old Miracle team had worked with Heath Street, using the carrot and stick; Culpepper focused on H Block, using mostly carrot.

Finally the van moved onto a peninsula in Boston Harbor and to the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library, which had hosted antagonists from battlefields such as Belfast and Gaza. Culpepper had to smile at the thought of it: for Jahmol, who had rarely ventured outside the 'hood, it might as well have been the moon.

The gangsters sat across from each other, six on a side, at two rectangular tables about 5 feet apart. Moderators, including Rufus Faulk, a social worker who grew up on H Block turf, sat in between. This is like the United Nations, he thought. Where we come from, this doesn't happen.

The gangs agreed they could go on each other's turf — each side had girlfriends living behind enemy lines — if they behaved respectfully. In case of an incident, there'd be no immediate retaliation. A minister would be called and the incident quickly investigated.

Pizza and soda were served. Only 45 minutes after the conference began, it was over.

On the ride home, Jahmol was euphoric, "like a weight was lifted off his shoulders," Faulk recalls.

There were ominous signs, however. Not everyone shook hands at the end of the meeting; some, Faulk noticed, weren't ready. And the grievances underpinning the feud had not been aired. "It seemed like it would have been beating a dead horse," Faulk says.

In November The Boston Globe, citing anonymous sources, broke the story of the gang summit and truce. The paper said that crime in general was down on the gangs' turf and that other gangs had asked for similar talks.

Mayor Menino, eager for a second Boston Miracle, praised the truce. Jack McDevitt, a Northeastern University criminologist and government consultant, said it could be a model for other cities; if H Block and Heath Street could make peace, anyone could.

On Nov. 28, seven days before his 21st birthday, Jahmol sat down at the church with Quest, the jobs counselor. He seemed relaxed — maybe too relaxed, Quest says: "He looked awfully comfortable, like he'd hit the Megabucks or something. That scared me, because he didn't appear to be on his guard. I wondered, 'Is the other side as relaxed as Jahmol?' "

Two hours later, the peacemaker was dead.

Detectives noted the date: a year to the day since Carl Searcy, the Heath Street member, had been shot to death.

The next day the mayor praised Jahmol for wanting to "change his neighborhood from a place of violence to a community of peace."

Jahmol's legacy

In his eulogy at the funeral, Culpepper said that Jahmol died for a purpose, echoing Christ's words at the Last Supper, "Jahmol says that I leave you my peace — this is my peace."

A week later, police announced the arrest of Jerome Brody, 19, who was stopped while driving a car containing the two guns that, according to ballistics, were used in Jahmol's murder. But Brody was not charged in the shooting itself — and he was not a member of Heath Street.

The day Jahmol was shot, another H Block member, Danny Hairston, got out of jail. Two months later, on Jan. 27, his body was found dumped in a backyard. He'd been shot once in the head.

Police have made no arrests and reported no leads in the Hairston and Norfleet murders.

Gang members from both sides refused — some personally, some through intermediaries — to speak to USA TODAY. But Teah Norfleet says she believes that Heath Street never took the truce seriously.

She says that some H Block members returned from the Kennedy Library summit unconvinced of Heath Street's sincerity; that some muttered insults out of the organizers' earshot; and that two of the Heath Street leaders did not attend. (Brown says they simply were late and missed the van.)

Is the truce holding? On Feb. 9, Boston Police Commissioner Edward Davis called it "an example of a collaborative process that uses innovative thinking and works."

Brown says that Heath Street denies responsibility for the Hairston and Norfleet murders, and that Jahmol's slaying on the anniversary of Searcy's might just have been coincidence. He and Culpepper both say the truce is holding.

Some question how it was implemented. "Where we've learned some lessons here is that these are very fragile things," says McDevitt, the Northeastern professor who had hailed the truce. "A truce is a piece of the puzzle. It's not the whole thing."

There was no airing of specific beefs at the summit; no follow-up meeting between the gangs afterward; no recognition of the approaching anniversary of Searcy's murder. Culpepper says he hasn't gotten over Jahmol's death. "I hated to lose that kid," the minister says, a catch in his voice. "He was gonna be the key to so much."

But since Jahmol's death, his sister Teah, his girlfriend and four members of H Block have gotten baptized. And people are spreading the story of the gangster-turned-peacemaker.

Culpepper thinks about something Jahmol wrote in jail: "I sit back and think, God left me here for a reason. He has something planned for me."

Inquiries Leave Officials In Limbo (AZREP)

By Billy House, Washington Bureau

Arizona Republic, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - There has been a long list of recent Justice Department investigations announced or leaked to the media targeting current and former members of Congress.

In many of those cases, the public has been left for months, or longer, to wonder about whether lawmakers will be charged or what, if anything, the investigations revealed. That air of uncertainty, which may never be wiped away, could ultimately tarnish reputations or destroy careers.

That includes the so-called preliminary inquiry and assessment launched last fall by Paul Charlton, then U.S. attorney in Arizona, regarding activities of Rep. Rick Renzi, R-Ariz., and former Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., respectively.

In the months since, nothing has surfaced about either case. Both Renzi and Kolbe have denied wrongdoing. Meanwhile, Justice Department officials in Phoenix and Washington, after initially confirming the existence of both inquiries, have declined to give additional comment. At times, the Phoenix and Washington offices don't seem to have a handle on who is in charge, referring inquiries about the matters to each other.

Charlton was one of half a dozen top prosecutors forced out of office last year by the Justice Department. Some lawmakers say the move was related to investigations of politicians. Hearings will be held in Washington today.

Ex-Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., was linked in published news accounts in January 2006 to at least four other members of Congress reportedly under federal investigation in Virginia in connection with the influence-peddling scandal surrounding convicted former D.C. lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Hayworth, who lost his re-election bid in November, has denied wrongdoing. Only one of the five lawmakers cited, former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, has been convicted in the Abramoff scandal.

There has been no word since about where the inquiry involving Hayworth has led.

And there probably won't be, federal officials say.

"A lot of that is up to the discretion of the U.S. attorney. In some cases, they issue a statement clearing them," said Bill Carter, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington.

"In some cases, they say nothing at all," Carter said. "Or they send a letter to the individual, if requested."

But at what point does the government have an obligation to announce a "no finding" or "cleared" result when such inquiries lead nowhere but may leave public doubt forever hanging over lawmakers and former politicians?

For instance, a cloud that may have contributed to Hayworth's re-election defeat.

"There may never come such a point," said Atlee W. Wampler III, a former U.S. attorney for the southern district of Florida and now president of the National Association of Former United States Attorneys.

"The next time you hear anything, you either get a target letter (stating that you have an opportunity to tell your side of the story to a grand jury) or the case just fades because of the statute of limitations," he said.

Federal investigators rarely want to absolve anyone or shut the door on the possibility new evidence might emerge at a later date. And sometimes, investigations take time because of manpower issues.

"Some of these things have to be run down," Wampler said. "And that can take awhile when there are other things that the FBI and other investigators might also have to do, some with higher priority."

More Lawmakers Take A Stand Against Death Penalty (LAW)

By Vesna Jaksic, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, March 6, 2007

A perfect storm of problematic executions, wrongful convictions and recent court rulings against the practice of lethal injection has led a growing number of states to challenge the death penalty through lawsuits and legislative action.

Adding still more to the momentum are a public backlash against the cost of capital cases and the development of more effective defense techniques, such as mitigation specialists who humanize death row inmates.

Eleven states have halted some or all executions -- including Florida and Maryland in December -- and more lawmakers have been speaking out against the death penalty.

Last month alone, Maryland's governor urged legislators to replace the death penalty with life without parole, North Carolina's governor said executions should be halted until issues surrounding lethal injection are solved and Montana's Senate voted to abolish the death penalty.

Court decisions have also continued to come down, such as a Delaware judge granting class action status on Feb. 22 to all death row inmates based on a case challenging lethal injection. Jackson v. Danberg, No. Civ. 06-3000-SLR (D. Del.). "It's probably the strongest momentum since the death penalty was reinstated in the mid-1970s," said John Holdridge, director of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) Capital Punishment Project, which advocates against the death penalty.

The Death Penalty Information Center recently listed the following 11 states as those that have stopped some or all executions: Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Tennessee, according to Richard Dieter, executive director of the nonprofit Washington, D.C.-based organization, which opposes capital punishment.

North Carolina's officials were in talks last week in hopes of resolving the situation, and the state's attorney general hinted on March 1 that a solution may be imminent. The executions have stopped either through government-issued moratoriums or judges' rulings, and have had varying effect.

In South Dakota, for example, Gov. Mike Rounds on Feb. 23 signed legislation that clarifies the mixture of drugs to be used in executions, which is an issue that has delayed just one execution, said his press secretary, Mitch Krebs. The law goes in effect on July 1, and Krebs said other executions are expected to resume as scheduled.

Meanwhile, in New Jersey, executions have been on hold since January 2006, when the state Legislature appointed a commission to study the issue. This January, the group recommended the death penalty be abolished. Reverend M. William Howard of Bethany Baptist Church in Newark, N.J., who chaired the 13-member New Jersey Death Penalty Study Commission, agreed with speculation that the state could become the next to abolish the death penalty.

"I don't think that's a wild idea at all," he said, pointing out that Gov. Jon Corzine has pledged to sign such legislation into law.

'A CHANGING TIME'

Most of the 38 states that have the death penalty use the same lethal injection protocol to execute death row inmates. The method has come under fire recently, with lawsuits pending in several states questioning everything from the way the drugs and painkillers are administered to whether the procedure is cruel and unusual punishment.

Kelly Culshaw, assistant public defender in the Ohio Public Defender Office who is representing death row inmate Richard Cooey in a case pending in the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, said lethal injection is fraught with problems. Cooey v. Taft, No. 05-4057 (6th Cir.).

"The inmate is suffering excruciating pain during the execution process but is paralyzed so there is no way for you to see or know what's happening," she said. "Other issues have also been coming to the forefront, such as the training and experience of the people who execute people in Ohio."

A request for comment to the state attorney general's office, which is defending former Ohio Gov. Robert Taft in the suit, was not answered.

Because the same concerns have been expressed in many states, Dieter, the Death Penalty Information Center official, said it is possible that more states will halt executions, but he added that it is difficult to predict which ones. However, he and others agreed that conservative states such as Texas -- which easily leads the nation with 383 execution since 1976 -- are least likely to stop executing.

It is possible, moreover, for states with temporary moratoriums, such as Florida, to lift these bans and resume their executions soon, Dieter said. He also did not rule out the possibility of the U.S. Supreme Court hearing the issue. Late last week, a Florida commission recommended that death row inmates be completely sedated before being injected with lethal chemicals. The commission submitted its final report and recommendations to Gov. Charlie Crist, but he took no immediate action.

"It's a changing time right now for the death penalty," Dieter said. "Around the world the death penalty is slowly becoming eradicated, and I think the U.S. is coming to sort of a similar conclusion, not necessarily that it's wrong but that it just isn't working."

Dieter said one of the reasons the death penalty is under attack now is that many lawsuits only recently worked their way through the system to reach higher courts. In addition, a number of death row inmates were exonerated in recent years thanks to DNA evidence, putting the issue under a national spotlight, he said.

Holdridge, from the ACLU, said that while many inmates still have inadequate defense counsel, defense lawyers have improved in recent years and are increasingly using mitigation specialists to explain factors that are common in many defendants' lives, such a history of abuse and mental illness. All of that has helped humanize death row inmates and made more people question execution, he said.

Another reason behind the momentum is financial, Holdridge said, explaining that many taxpayers have only recently learned about the costs of the death penalty.

In an editorial last week against the death penalty, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley said that according to a judge, it costs $400,000 more to process and imprison a death penalty defendant than it does to keep someone serving a life sentence in prison, meaning the state spent about $22.4 million more by sentencing 56 people to death since 1978.

In New Jersey, the Office of the Public Defender testified in front of the New Jersey Death Penalty Study Commission that, given its caseload of 19 cases as of August 2006, elimination of the death penalty would result in savings of $1.46 million per year. And the state Department of Corrections estimated that eliminating the death penalty would save the state about $1 million per inmate.

The political climate has also contributed to the issue, the ACLU's Holdridge said, pointing out that Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine won election in November despite opposing the death penalty in a state that has the second-highest number of executions.

And David Elliot, communications director for the Washington-based National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, predicted that New Jersey and Maryland will be the next to abolish the death penalty, partly because the two states' governors have recently voiced opposition to it.

Finally, several recent botched executions also helped raise concerns. In California, officials took 12 minutes to find a vein in the muscular arm of the co-founder of the Crips gang, Stanley "Tookie" Williams, who was executed in December 2005. In May, similar problems occurred in Ohio, where Joseph Clark's execution took about 90 minutes. Also, this past December, Florida inmate Angel Diaz had to be given a second dose of drugs and needed 34 minutes to die.

Elliot said controversy regarding lethal injection has been building for years, but a lot of information regarding the procedure emerged only recently, as cases made their way past the discovery phase. More is known now, he said, about problems that can arise during executions, the level of pain suffered and the effectiveness of painkillers used.

"Sometimes you reach a tipping point and it could be that we're at the tipping point," Elliot said, "not just with the lethal injection but with the death penalty in the United States." Proponents of the death penalty acknowledged recent defeats, but stressed that most death penalty states still allow executions. Furthermore, some states have been trying to broaden it, such as Virginia, where the Legislature recently proposed that more murder accomplices also be eligible for execution. In Georgia, a lawmaker has proposed allowing a judge to impose the death penalty even if as many as three jurors vote against it.

Michael Rushford, president of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a Sacramento, Calif.-based nonprofit organization that supports the death penalty, said that states are simply trying to ensure their procedures can survive all criticism. "We need to have more medical professionals tell us this is the most humane way to deal with these murderers and make sure the scientists saw it, and that will eliminate the need for lawsuits in the area," he said.

Despite the flurry of activity against the death penalty, some states have said that it will not affect their executions.

"The Texas Department of Criminal Justice does not have any immediate plans to change its execution protocol," Michelle Lyons, the department's spokesman, said in an e-mail statement.

MISSOURI HOLDS ITS GROUND

In Missouri, where a case against lethal injection is pending in the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, officials have stood by their procedures.

"We continue to say that our lethal injection process has been quick, it's been humane and it's constitutional," said Brian Hauswirth, a spokesman for the Missouri Department of Corrections.

Hauswirth said he could not discuss the case specifically because it is ongoing. Taylor v. Crawford, No. 06-3651 (8th Cir.). In this case, death row inmate Michael Taylor has said that Missouri's three-chemical lethal injection process violates the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Chet Pleban, a partner with Pleban & Associates in St. Louis, who is one of Taylor's attorneys, said the case has been slowed down by a number of procedural issues. But he added that it illustrates the current view toward the death penalty.

"The pendulum perhaps is starting to swing the other way now," he said. "It's just a matter of time before we recommend as an orderly society that putting people to death is not where we want to be." A message seeking comment from the spokesman for the Missouri attorney general's office, which is representing the governor in the case, was not returned.

The American Bar Association, meanwhile, has been calling for executions to be halted for years. It established the ABA Death Penalty Moratorium Implementation Project in 2001.

The report on Indiana, the latest state that was assessed, was released in February. It said that executions should stop until the administration of death penalty cases improves. The report found a number of problems similar to the other four states that were already assessed -- Alabama, Arizona, Florida and Georgia -- such as the poor qualifications of, and lack of funding for, defense counsel and a racially disproportionate application of the death penalty, said Stephen Hanlon, who chairs the project.

Analyst's Wallet Not Stolen, Son Says (WP)

By Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

The assailants who shot an expert on Russian intelligence in Prince George's County last week did not, as law enforcement sources said, take his wallet, the victim's adult son said yesterday, showing the billfold to a reporter.

The disclosure, which contradicts a report in The Washington Post yesterday, adds to the allegations and theories about the shooting, which left Paul Joyal, 53, critically wounded in his driveway Thursday night.

During a brief interview at the family's home in the Adelphi area, Alex Joyal said his father was in critical but stable condition. He declined to say whether the family has a theory about the crime. "We're not going to speculate right now," he said.

The timing of the shooting -- four days after Paul Joyal said on "Dateline NBC" that the government of Russian President Vladimir Putin was responsible for the poisoning death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko -- raised the possibility that Joyal might have been targeted in retaliation for his comment.

"We really have no idea what the reason was," Elizabeth Joyal, Paul Joyal's wife, told the Associated Press yesterday, adding that "it could easily have been a random act of violence."

Several news outlets, including The Post, have cited anonymous law enforcement officials as saying that the shooting appeared to have occurred during a botched robbery. The claim that a wallet and briefcase had been taken from Paul Joyal was seen as offering additional support for the theory that he was targeted in a robbery or perhaps a failed carjacking.

A source in The Post's report said yesterday that the wallet and briefcase were initially thought to have been taken but that the wallet was found in Joyal's car. The location of the briefcase was unclear last night.

Wife: Wounded Russian Expert Not Robbed (WP/AP)

By Stephen Manning, The Associated Press

ADELPHI, Md. -- The wife of an expert on Russian intelligence who was shot last week challenged reports Monday that her husband had been robbed.

In a brief interview at the couple's suburban Washington home, Elizabeth Joyal said reports that Paul Joyal's wallet and briefcase were taken were false. She didn't know of any motive for Thursday's shooting outside their home in what she said was a normally safe area.

"We really have no idea what the reason was," said Elizabeth Joyal, but added that "it could easily have been a random act of violence."

The shooting came days after Paul Joyal, 53, accused the Russian government of involvement in the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko and of trying to silence its critics. The FBI was assisting in the shooting investigation.

Joyal and Litvinenko were acquaintances.

A law enforcement official familiar with the investigation said the wallet was found in Paul Joyal's car and that the briefcase has been accounted for. The official requested anonymity because the probe is ongoing.

Law enforcement officials speaking on the condition of anonymity had told several media outlets, including The Associated Press, that the crime appeared to be a robbery gone bad.

Elizabeth Joyal said her husband's prognosis was good. Joyal was still under sedation, though, and authorities have not interviewed him, said Cpl. Stephen Pacheco, a Prince George's County police spokesman.

Joyal works for National Strategies, a Washington-based government consulting firm. He also has lobbied for the former Soviet Republic of Georgia.

Questions Arise Over Nevada Governor's Defense Fund (AP)

By Brendan Riley, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 6, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - A legal defense fund set up for Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons in November, when he was dealing with brewing legal cases including a woman's claim he assaulted her, wasn't sanctioned by a House Committee even though Gibbons was still a congressman.

But representatives of the governor, who now has two high-priced lawyers handling an FBI probe into his associations with a longtime friend who's a wealthy federal contractor, say the fund was created properly. They add that the fund shouldn't run afoul of a state law limiting contributions during legislative sessions.

Gibbons spokeswoman Melissa Subbotin said Monday that a U.S. House committee's approval of the defense fund wasn't sought in November because Gibbons, a Republican who served five terms in the House, was seeking election to a state office and not a federal office.

"We are being thoughtful in our review of all the laws to ensure that we are in full compliance," Subbotin added. "We have nothing to hide."

Attorney Michael Pagni, who helped to set up the defense fund, said the federal rules didn't come up for discussion at the time. He added that such rules generally "don't apply to a candidate for state office even if he's a federal officeholder at the time."

Pagni also said Gibbons is "erring on the side of caution" and plans to provide details of the defense fund contributions in a filing this week with the secretary of state's office.

Subbotin said she didn't think the exact amount of Gibbons' debts to his attorneys would be public, but added that any leftover money would be donated to the Nevada Patriot Fund, set up to help families who lost a soldier in the Iraq war.

The U.S. House rules state that legal expense funds can be set up to handle expenses stemming from campaigns for federal office or from a House member's official duties, but must be authorized by the House Ethics Committee.

The rules also state that the funds can be used to defray "a criminal prosecution; or a civil matter bearing on the individual's reputation or fitness for office."

If the legal defense fund had been set up under House rules, quarterly reports on contributions would have been required, and the first report would have been due Jan. 30. There are no state laws requiring such disclosures.

While Gibbons maintains the defense fund was set up properly, there may be some practical problems created by the state law limiting political contributions a month before, during and a month after Nevada's legislative sessions.

The law, which applies to the governor, lieutenant governor and all members of the Legislature, prohibits soliciting or accepting contributions or commitments for contributions "for any political purpose." It covers a period from early January to early July this year.

But Pagni said his reading of the state law is that it wouldn't conflict with the purpose of the legal defense fund, which "would come under personal use."

Attorneys Don Campbell of Las Vegas and Abbe Lowell of Washington, D.C., currently are helping Gibbons deal with FBI questions about his associations with Warren Trepp. Gibbons has denied that he accepted payments or gifts from Trepp in exchange for helping the wealthy Reno software contractor get defense contracts while Gibbons was a member of Congress.

Trepp, a former chief trader for convicted junk-bond dealer Michael Milken, also has denied any wrongdoing.

Gibbons had asked the House Ethics Committee in November for an opinion about whether he improperly reported private jet flights and a Caribbean cruise paid for by Trepp, whose company has classified federal software contracts with the Air Force, U.S. Special Operations Command and the CIA. That request apparently was shelved after he left the House.

Lowell has defended many high-profile clients, including now-imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Campbell, a well-known Nevada criminal defense lawyer, helped Gibbons when he was accused just before the November elections by Chrissy Mazzeo of assaulting her. Authorities decided against filing charges in that case.

Gibbons also faced allegations that he and his wife Dawn had employed an illegal immigrant as a nanny. The nanny, Martha Patricia Sandoval, was represented by an immigration attorney when the issue, which dated to the late 1980s and early 1990s, came up late in the 2006 campaign season.

Criminal Case Must Link Positionon Council To Illicit MLGW Gain (MCA)

By Trevor Aaronson

Memphis Commercial Appeal, March 6, 2007

City Councilman Edmund Ford will take his seat at the dais today for the first time since Memphis Light, Gas and Water Division president and CEO Joseph Lee admitted the politician received special treatment.

But Ford's actions as a public official -- including during his tenure as chairman of the council committee that oversees MLGW's spending and budget -- are key to elevating the utility scandal to criminal charges.

The crux of the case: Federal prosecutors need to prove that Ford used his position on the City Council to benefit MLGW improperly in exchange for leniency on his more than $16,000 in debt to the city-owned utility.

"It would seem to me that some sort of bribery would be the only type of charge that could apply," said Steve Mulroy, a former federal prosecutor and University of Memphis law professor who was elected to the Shelby County Commission in November.

"For that, they would have to prove Ford did something or agreed to do something in his official capacity in return for the favors provided by MLGW."

The federal investigation of MLGW became public following the delivery of grand jury subpoenas to the utility in mid-February.

"I testified truthfully and honestly and answered all questions posed to me," Lee told reporters in a prepared statement that afternoon.

If the government can document quid pro quo, prosecutors' law of choice could be the Hobbs Act, a federal code that prohibits bribery and extortion, among other crimes, affecting interstate commerce. As a utility company, MLGW engages in interstate commerce. The Hobbs Act allows crimes usually prosecuted in state courts -- from robbery to racketeering -- to be brought to U.S. District Court, which has strict penalty guidelines and no opportunities for parole.

"If there was quid pro quo of some sort, something that was expected in return for the favor, that is both a violation of state law and potentially a Hobbs Act violation," said Randy Alden, a federal public defender in Memphis.

Federal prosecutors in the Bluff City have historically chosen the Hobbs Act as a tool to build public corruption cases.

Former state senator Edgar Gillock was convicted of extortion under the Hobbs Act in 1982. The act was used in some of the Tennessee Waltz charges. More recently, in August 2006, the U.S. Attorney's Office employed the Hobbs Act against three Memphis police officers on charges of drug conspiracy and civil rights violations.

If prosecutors can construct a bribery case against Ford, they might have enough to charge MLGW employees as well.

"To the extent there was any kind of quid pro quo bribery situation, the statute involving bribery makes the briber just as guilty as the bribee," Mulroy said. "In terms of this hypothetical scenario in which MLGW and someone agree to give this benefit in the power bill in exchange for some official action, it would be bribery on MLGW's side."

Even without Lee's public admission, prosecutors already have enough evidence to show Ford received special treatment.

Documents subpoenaed by the federal government reveal the City Council member's business water account was improperly included in On Track, a special program for low-income customers that protects their service from disconnection due to unpaid bills. What's more, according to March 2006 e-mail, Lee told Washington that, despite unpaid bills, he did not want Ford's service cut off.

L.A. Bridges Anti-gang Effort Scrutinized (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

Los Angeles has spent $100 million over the last decade on a gang-prevention program, even though it doesn't track how many youths it keeps out of gangs and has been repeatedly criticized for not adequately coordinating with schools and police.

Unlike anti-gang efforts in other cities that have been held up as models by the federal government, L.A. Bridges lacks a system for determining whether its clients are involved in gangs, so there is no way of knowing whether the program actually works.

The program has come under growing scrutiny at City Hall as L.A. and federal authorities have launched a new gang crackdown. Critics point out that in 2006, gang crime increased 15.7% over the year before, according to LAPD statistics.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa has vowed to increase funding for intervention programs, saying the gang crackdown can't focus solely on law enforcement. But he is limiting funding of L.A. Bridges through September while officials try to assess its effectiveness.

Supporters acknowledge that L.A. Bridges needs to do a better job of working with other agencies, but they maintain it provides a valuable community service and would be more effective if the city expanded it.

The city spends $14 million annually on Bridges, which essentially screens and gives money to community organizations that do the actual intervention. Bridges I is a gang prevention program that provides after-school tutoring, counseling and other services to students from 27 middle schools. Bridges II offers job training to gang members in the hope that employment will get them out of gang life. The contracts range from $227,000 to $1.7 million.

The city funds are provided to the contract agencies by the Community Development Department. John Chavez, the longtime head of L.A. Bridges, was pushed out recently by CDD management.

L.A. Bridges was launched during a crackdown on gang violence in 1997, largely in response to public outrage over the fatal gang shooting of a 3-year-old girl whose family car was ambushed on a dead-end street in Cypress Park.

But almost from the beginning, critics have said the program is ineffective.

In 2000, the city controller recommended that L.A. Bridges be shut down and redesigned, saying that the contractors lacked the required coordination with other gang programs, the police, schools and community groups.

Then-Controller Rick Tuttle also concluded that Bridges agencies were not required to show what effect the program might be having on gang violence and membership.

The mayor at the time, Richard Riordan, agreed with the findings and announced he was cutting off funding to L.A. Bridges. The City Council unanimously voted to overturn his decision.

"They had money coming into their districts," said Malcolm Klein, a UCLA scholar on gang programs, regarding the council vote.

The vote occurred after more than 300 backers of L.A. Bridges, including employees of contractors who were receiving millions of dollars from the program, packed City Hall.

It also helped that many of the contractors themselves were influential in city politics, which led to criticism that the program involved political patronage. Six of the contracts are held by current or former appointees to city commissions.

In addition, 172 political contributions were made to city politicians by executives and employees of 20 of the 26 contractors for L.A. Bridges I and II. The contributions totaled $48,500, including $7,200 to Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and smaller amounts to council members Wendy Greuel, Janice Hahn, Bill Rosendahl, Jose Huizar, Jan Perry, Ed Reyes and Bernard Parks. Those who commented about the contributions said they support the program because it helps young people, not because it provides campaign checks.

"I think it has done some good," Perry said.

Seven years after Tuttle's scathing audit, a new city report produced by attorney Connie Rice made the same criticisms of L.A. Bridges and other city gang programs.

Both studies urged L.A. Bridges to shift to the type of model used by Chicago, Riverside, Mesa, Ariz., and other cities, which emphasizes close coordination between multiple agencies and measurable results.

Those programs were designed under the stewardship of Irving A. Spergel, a sociologist at the University of Chicago.

"The secret of success," Spergel said, is to have probation officers, community organizations, the police and former gang members serving as intervention workers collaborating as street teams in gang neighborhoods.

The programs also have to evaluate how many gang members or wannabes are helped out of the gang life. Spergel said that is done by using police records and conducting annual interviews with youths to determine which ones are no longer involved in gang crime.

In his book, "Reducing Youth Gang Crime," Spergel looked at one anti-gang effort in Chicago during a five-year period and found a 60% reduction in serious violence for 200 young people as well as a 25% drop in gang membership.

Bridges officials said they are trying to work more with police.

Still, some contractors are interacting more than others. The head of one group said his intervention workers just started working with police this year and are in touch with them only once a month. The workers go out on their own instead of teaming with police officers.

"We let them do their work, and we do our work," said Mustafa Fletcher, executive director of Unity Two Inc.

Police Chief William J. Bratton said there is inadequate coordination between intervention agencies and the police.

"The gang interventionists will tell you they don't want to be seen as working too closely, being too closely aligned with the police, because they are fearful that gang members won't work with them then," Bratton said. "But I think there can be better working relationships than we have."

State Sen. Mark Ridley-Thomas (D-Los Angeles), who as a city councilman helped launch L.A. Bridges, said the city's gang intervention and prevention programs need to be more comprehensive and better-coordinated.

"I think it makes sense to incorporate it in a more comprehensive system," Ridley-Thomas said. "But the question people should be asking, given what L.A. Bridges has accomplished, is what would the lives of young people who were part of it be like had it not been implemented when it was?"

He said the problem is Bridges' scope, adding that it should be expanded to every middle school in the city.

Supporters note that while L.A. Bridges doesn't track whether its clients join gangs, it does keep other statistics. Bridges I, for example, reports on the number of youths who improve their grades and attendance.

But some of the numbers presented by L.A. Bridges have given City Hall pause. It found that the majority of middle-schoolers in the program failed to boost either their attendance or their grades.

Another issue has been how well contractors screen employees to determine whether they are still in gangs. At least three employees of Bridges contractors have been arrested in the last two years. The latest was Mario Corona, jobs coordinator for Communities In Schools in Pacoima, who was arrested last week by the LAPD on suspicion of possessing a pound of methamphetamine.

In looking at alternatives to Bridges, Villaraigosa said he is especially impressed with Homeboy Industries Inc., which takes a more comprehensive approach to gang members, providing counseling, tattoo removal and real jobs — not just referrals to job-training programs.

By providing actual jobs, Homeboy is able to track the progress of participants and lay down strict rules about their connections to gangs.

The nonprofit agency, run by Father Gregory Boyle, has accepted only $15,000 out of the $14 million distributed annually by L.A. Bridges.

"We balk at taking part in all that public entity stuff," Boyle said. "They don't know what they are doing."

For Sex Offenders, A Dispute Over Therapy's Benefits (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough And Monica Davey

ATASCADERO, Calif. — During five years of psychotherapy at a treatment center here for sex offenders who have finished their prison terms, Bill Price, a pedophile who admits to 21 victims as young as 3, has constructed a painstaking plan for staying straight.

A requirement of his treatment, the plan catalogs on five single-spaced pages the tactics Mr. Price has learned to stop molesting.

There are 42 so far, including avoiding places where children congregate, abstaining from alcohol, shunning the Internet and sniffing ammonia whenever he has a deviant thought.

"It was just like a hunt for me," Mr. Price, 59, a former Sunday school teacher, said of his sexual crimes. "I kept choosing children because they were easier prey; they were easier to deal with than women."

Treatment plans like Mr. Price's, known as relapse prevention, have been a cornerstone of efforts to reform sex offenders for the past 20 years. Yet there is no convincing evidence that the approach works, or that others do either.

Similar to aspects of Alcoholics Anonymous, relapse prevention has sex offenders own up to wrongdoing and resign themselves to a lifelong day-to-day struggle with temptation. But one of the few authoritative studies of the method, conducted in California from 1985 to 2001, found that those who entered relapse prevention treatment were slightly more likely to offend again than those who got no therapy at all.

Clinicians who work with sex offenders cling to relapse prevention nonetheless, and its durability speaks volumes about the troubled, politically fraught science of treating sex offenders. Not only is relapse prevention of questionable value, but so are the tests to gauge whether sex offenders in treatment still get inappropriately aroused, the drugs used for so-called chemical castration and the methods of predicting risk of reoffending.

Treatment methods have become particularly topical as thousands of sex offenders are confined or restricted beyond their prison terms under civil commitment laws on the books in 19 states. The laws have been found constitutional in part because they aim to provide treatment if possible; New York legislators announced last week that the state would soon allow civil confinement.

On average, the civil commitment programs cost four times more than keeping sex offenders in prison. But too little research has been conducted into how to treat sex offenders, experts say, putting psychotherapists and others working in civil commitment centers at a distinct disadvantage.

"It has never been regarded as a legitimate and recognized topic for research by psychologists," said Robert A. Prentky, director of research at the Justice Research Institute in Boston. "There is a very strong undercurrent of disrespect for this area of research and perhaps even skepticism, frankly."

As recently as the 1970s, research on treating sex offenders was practically nonexistent. Barbara Schwartz, a psychologist with New England Forensic Associates in Arlington, Mass., said that when she wrote her first paper on rehabilitating sex offenders in 1971, "I read everything there was to read, and I had a half of one page of references."

That is partly because sex offenders present major challenges as research subjects. There are far fewer convicted sex offenders than most other kinds of criminals, so sample groups are unreliably small. And sex offenders tend to be so secretive that "it's really hard to get information from them that you can have confidence in," said Ted Shaw, a forensic psychologist in Gainesville, Fla., who has treated offenders since 1982.

Even now, in an advanced phase of California's treatment program for the most persistent sex offenders, Mr. Price says he questions his ability to keep his urges in check. His relapse prevention plan says that if let out, he will seek more treatment at Pure Life Ministries in Kentucky, whose Web site says its goal is "leading Christians to victory over sexual sin."

"I'm very afraid of just being out there," Mr. Price said, sitting near the nasturtiums and petunias he had grown in a courtyard of the Atascadero State Hospital here, which includes a wing for civilly committed offenders. "I'm less dangerous than I was, but I'm definitely in touch with my dangerousness."

Treatment in Phases

During one therapy session, Mr. Price and five other men aggressively tested one another's ability to stay straight, while two social workers moderated. Sitting in a circle in a locked conference room, briefly sealed off from the loud, grim bustle of the hospital halls, they fell into an argument over whether to protect a young new arrival from predatory older residents.

"If I can save this kid from being hustled or taken advantage of," said Paul George, a convicted pedophile who has admitted roughly 100 offenses, "I'm going to at least try to make that effort."

But another man pointed out that Mr. George had habitually groomed child victims by acting as their protector, asking him, "How was that different from this situation?"

At most civil commitment centers around the nation, offenders young and old meet several times a week for group therapy rooted in relapse prevention as well as what are known as cognitive-behavioral techniques. While the former is meant to curb sex offending in particular, the latter are intended to change broader destructive patterns of thinking and reacting, and are commonly used in treating other ailments like anxiety.

Civilly confined men move from one phase of treatment to the next, learning to recognize which situations, thoughts and behaviors have led them to offend, developing skills to avoid them, and applying those skills to their daily lives. They try to learn empathy by writing detailed letters to their victims and even essays in their voices.

"It's a slow business," said David Thornton, the treatment director at Wisconsin's civil commitment center. "You're talking about years of work, two steps forward, one step back."

Dr. Thornton said relapse prevention forced sex offenders to focus too heavily on a concrete list of high-risk situations — sometimes as long as 50 pages — that could overwhelm them and lead to failure. Wisconsin's program rejects relapse prevention and sticks to cognitive-behavioral techniques in an effort to change deep-rooted traits and behaviors.

"It's much less dependent on the guy having some conscious, deliberate self-control plan in his head," Dr. Thornton said. "You're trying to change how he automatically functions."

Instead of helping a sex offender compile a list of specific situations to avoid, therapists in Wisconsin might seize on the fact that he reacts impulsively when something upsets him, teaching him self-regulation skills. Instead of having the offender recount every last detail of his crimes, they might help him correct long-held misperceptions about children (that they enjoy sex), power (that it is best attained by raping or molesting) and so forth.

Some who represent offenders in Wisconsin, though, say that even the new program there has not answered offenders' frustrations about their ability to progress in it and to demonstrate that progress.

"The program has gotten larger, more involved and progressively longer," said Robert W. Peterson, a lawyer in Wisconsin who has worked on such cases since 1998 and says he has seen the state's program shift repeatedly in design and focus.

"Regardless of the structure of the treatment program, the duration of the treatment program, the nature of the treatment program," Mr. Peterson said, "what we basically have is living experiments."

Research Is Sparse

Reliable studies on the treatment of civilly committed offenders do not exist, since so few have been set free. Much of the research into the treatment of sex offenders has come out of Canada, where national criminal history records are easily accessible.

Canadian psychologists have studied not only treatment outcomes but also risk assessment, or determining who is likely to reoffend.

Combining findings from hundreds of smaller studies, R. Karl Hanson, senior research officer for the Department of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness in Canada, has found that roughly 15 percent of convicted sex offenders are caught reoffending after five years and that those driven by deviant sexual interests, like pedophiles and exhibitionists, are the likeliest to do so.

Dr. Hanson's research has also suggested that even lifelong offenders tend to stop, for the most part, by the time they reach their 70s.

He said various studies had shown that "most treatments don't work very well," but that, over all, treatment had a modest beneficial effect. One analysis that he published in 2002 found that 12 percent of offenders who got treatment were caught committing new sex crimes, compared with 17 percent of untreated offenders.

Researchers have found that chemical castration, or using hormonal drugs to curb sexual appetite, can be problematic, too.

Doctors have experimented for decades with antiandrogens, which block the effects of sex hormones like testosterone and are most commonly used to treat advanced prostate cancer. But while some consider antiandrogens crucial for the most predatory offenders, the drugs remain controversial, not least because they are expensive and can cause weight gain, osteoporosis and breast development. It is also hard to ensure that released offenders keep taking the drugs.

More than half of states with civil commitment programs say they allow voluntary antiandrogen treatment, but as of last fall, only California, Illinois, Washington and Wisconsin had more than one offender taking the drugs, which can cost several hundred dollars a month. Dr. Fred S. Berlin, founder of the Johns Hopkins Sexual Disorders Clinic in Baltimore and a longtime critic of civil commitment, said he was troubled by the scant use of antiandrogens.

"I get letters from men around the country, in prison or sometimes civil commitment, asking if I can help them in their efforts to have it made available," Dr. Berlin said, "because the administrations in their facilities are not even willing to discuss it with them."

Here in California, where about 40 civilly committed men took antiandrogens several years ago but only four do now, Jesus Padilla, a clinical psychologist at Atascadero State Hospital, said the drugs did not address the underlying emotional problems that lead to offending, nor even necessarily eliminate sex drive.

"I've had numerous situations where they say they are working just fine," Dr. Padilla said of civilly committed men on antiandrogens, "only to catch them having sex with each other or engaging in deviant sexual fantasies even though their testosterone level was down to zero."

Some doctors see more potential in antidepressant drugs, which can dampen sexual desire while also curbing compulsive behaviors like chronic masturbation, which can preclude offenders from participating in treatment. Some civil commitment programs prescribe antidepressants sparingly or not at all, while others, including South Carolina's and Wisconsin's, have dozens of men taking them.

One approach that civil commitment centers have avoided is surgical castration, though at least one state, California, allows it if the offender pays for the procedure himself.

In Virginia, the General Assembly considered a proposal last year to allow voluntary surgical castration as an alternative to civil commitment, but took no action. One pedophile in Virginia castrated himself in a jail shower with a shoelace and a razor blade as his civil commitment trial approached.

Douglas Carlin, a convicted rapist who completed treatment and was released a year ago from the commitment center in Florida, said he thought a lot of offenders there were deceiving their therapists.

"Most of those guys, they are just faking it to make it," Mr. Carlin said. "They're just waiting to get released so they can go right back to what they were doing."

Tools of Assessment

Therapists can gauge the success of various treatments by observing offenders' behavior, interviewing them and using two instruments. All have serious shortcomings.

One instrument, the polygraph, is routinely used to determine if people continue to offend once conditionally released or have deviant thoughts in the course of treatment. Civil commitment centers also use polygraphs to make sure an offender has admitted all his crimes, a requirement for progressing past the early stage of relapse prevention treatment.

"Usually they will give up lots of information soon after failing a polygraph test," Dr. Thornton, the Wisconsin treatment director, said.

But polygraphy, which measures blood pressure, breathing rate and perspiration while a series of questions is asked, is generally considered so unreliable that its results are inadmissible as proof in court. Some offenders, especially psychopaths who feel no anxiety when lying, can beat it, experts said.

"Polygraph on its own isn't the answer to anything," said Dr. Don Grubin, a forensic psychiatrist at Newcastle University in Britain who has studied the tests. "As part of a bigger package it seemed to have an effect — to help reduce the risk of reoffending."

The other device routinely used at civil commitment facilities is the penile plethysmograph, which measures changes in the circumference of the penis while the offender is shown sexually suggestive pictures of men, women or children.

Some clinicians and offenders say it is easy, particularly in a laboratory, to stifle arousal and thus cheat on a plethysmograph test.

Mr. Carlin, the Florida rapist, said that during one plethysmograph test, "I just stared at a shelf of cleaning products and read the labels."

The field of risk assessment, or determining which sex offenders are likely to repeat their crimes once released, has been equally slow to evolve, even as judges and juries are keeping more men locked up after their prison sentences in the belief that they will be dangerous on the outside.

A cottage industry of professionals who diagnose sexually violent predators has developed in the last two decades, and several hundred psychologists, often with little or no background treating sex offenders, make a lucrative business of recommending who should be committed.

During a recent commitment trial in St. Augustine, Fla., one psychologist with hardly any experience treating sex offenders told a jury he had evaluated 350 candidates for civil commitment and testified in dozens of commitment trials since 2000.

Some in the field question why professional organizations like the American Psychological Association have not set ethical and training standards for the many psychologists entering the civil commitment field.

"I don't think, in my personal experience, that the vast majority of the examiners I've come across have sufficient working knowledge of the empirical literature," said Dr. Prentky of the Justice Research Institute.

But that literature is still of limited use. Most actuarial tools used to predict someone's risk of recidivism consider only unchanging factors, like their number of past offenses and the sex of their victims. Some scientists say that so-called dynamic factors — how much treatment an offender gets, for example, and how old he has grown — should factor heavily into actuarial risk assessment, too.

"Science hasn't gotten there yet," said Eric Janus, a professor at William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul, Minn., who opposes civil commitment.

Professor Janus said he hoped for "an explosion of knowledge" about how to prevent sexual violence before it happened, which he said would prevent far more sex crimes than civilly committing offenders.

That sort of research is unlikely to happen in the United States, Dr. Berlin and other experts said, because so many Americans believe that the only investment in sex offenders should be punitive.

"People need to recognize that these are not just criminal justice problems but also public health problems," Dr. Berlin said, "and the surgeon general as well as the attorney general ought to be supporting research in this area."

Earlier efforts to rehabilitate sex offenders, like Freudian psychoanalysis and electric shocks to the skin, failed definitively decades ago. A recent case in Orange Park, Fla., offered more evidence that relapse prevention treatment is no solution, either.

There, the authorities say, a convicted rapist who had spent 12 years in prison and 5 at the Florida Civil Commitment Center raped and killed a young woman before dawn on Jan. 23 after following her into the veterinary clinic where she worked.

The suspect, Michael Renard Jackson, 37, won release from the commitment center in 2005 after reaching the highest levels of a relapse prevention treatment program, people familiar with the case said.

U.S. Investigates Counterfeiting Of Rare Wines (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Federal prosecutors have uncorked a criminal investigation into counterfeit-wine sales, sending subpoenas to rare-wine collectors and to some of the world's leading auction houses, including Christie's in London and Zachys in New York.

A federal grand jury in New York has begun hearing evidence in the case, and the art-fraud unit of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has conducted interviews, according to people who have been contacted in the course of the probe.

The criminal investigation is focusing, among other things, on whether auction houses, collectors or importers knowingly sold counterfeit wines despite doubts about their authenticity, those close to the case said. Such sales could be prosecuted under federal fraud statutes.

The inquiry comes as wine sales are booming amid a broader surge in the market for luxury goods. Backed in part by robust profits on Wall Street, collectors and speculators increasingly are paying $1,000 or more per bottle, especially for the rare Bordeaux vintages of France.

That's raised new fears about counterfeiting, which is beginning to threaten confidence in the market for rare wines -- except those sold directly from wineries. Wine Spectator magazine recently estimated that as much as 5% of rare vintages sold privately or at auction today may be fake.

Auction houses say they go to great lengths to ensure that the bottles they sell are genuine. "We piece together the history of each bottle of wine, its provenance, ownership and appearance," says Richard Brierley, wine auctioneer at Christie's.

Christie's experts have stepped up their vigilance, he added. "In the past, it was only the most rare vintages. But with more wines falling into the $1,000-plus category, there is more opportunity in counterfeiting."

Jeff Zacharia, who runs Zachys Wine and its fast-growing Web and auction operations, says counterfeiting technology is becoming increasingly sophisticated, forcing the industry to be more alert for fraud. But he says concerns about forgeries haven't kept his business from soaring; Zachys auction revenue was a record $35 million last year, more than double the $15 million it had in 2003. "And this year is shaping up to be the best so far," Mr. Zacharia said.

Christie's, a unit of Christie's International PLC, also had its best year ever in 2006, including wine-auction sales of $58 million in 44 sales from New York and Los Angeles to London and Paris, and its first-ever online bidding.

Both Christie's and Zachys declined to comment on the subpoenas the firms received. Royal Wine Merchants, another New York firm that people close to the case said was served with a subpoena, didn't return calls or emails.

The criminal investigation began in December, after several collectors began pressing auction houses and wine merchants to take some measure of responsibility for the alleged sale of counterfeit wines. The collectors included Russell Frye, a wealthy software entrepreneur, and William Koch, president of closely held Oxbow Corp., a global mining and energy concern. His billionaire brothers control Koch Industries, a $25 billion business empire.

Mr. Koch filed a civil suit last year in federal court in New York, alleging that a German wine merchant, Hardy Rodenstock, forged bottles of wine he claimed had belonged to Thomas Jefferson and had been discovered in a bricked-up cellar in Paris. Mr. Rodenstock also claimed to have other extremely rare wines, including a cache belonging to Czar Nicholas II of Russia, Mr. Koch alleged. Those allegations were detailed in September in a page-one story in The Wall Street Journal.

In a Jan. 19 court motion, an attorney for Mr. Rodenstock denied the claims and deflected responsibility to the merchants who sold them directly to Mr. Koch. The attorney, Birgit Kurtz of New York law firm Alston & Bird LLP, also told the court that the statute of limitations had lapsed because the sales in question had occurred years earlier, and that Mr. Rodenstock, in any case, couldn't be sued in New York.

Whether auction houses and merchants can be held liable for counterfeits provided to them by others could be a big issue in any prosecution arising from the federal probe. A civil suit filed by Mr. Frye in federal court in San Francisco last year names a seller, the Wine Library Inc., of Petaluma, Calif., as a defendant. The firm, which isn't related to an online wine seller of the same name based in Springfield, N.J., denies the claims.

"It's not just Rodenstock," Mr. Frye said. "Counterfeiting is a big problem, especially in the high end. These networks need to be exposed," and merchants must be accountable, he said.

Other incidents of counterfeiting in recent years include a 20,000-bottle cache of bogus Tuscan Sassicaia 1995 and other top wines seized in a raid by Italian government inspectors. France's Chateau Mouton Rothschild and Australia's Penfolds Grange have also been targeted by counterfeiters.

Mr. Brierley, head of Christie's wine department in the U.S., said growing awareness of the problem has made collectors and merchants more cautious. "People should be confident buying from reputable auction houses. It's a public forum that protects buyers."

Wine has become a lucrative business for many auction houses in recent years. As rare-wine prices have risen, sellers have found that public auctions maximize their profits. The rising prices have also helped to fatten auction houses' commissions.

The federal investigation and civil lawsuits could draw in some well-known names in wine. Michael Broadbent, a Christie's board member and author of a widely used wine-tasting reference book, is among those who have vouched for Mr. Rodenstock; the German's tastings are legendary for the rarity of the vintages, and are widely cited in wine books.

Christie's declined to make Mr. Broadbent available for comment and he couldn't be reached. But in the catalog for a glittering wine auction held in New York's Rockefeller Plaza in December, Christie's continued to tout Mr. Broadbent's tasting notes from a Rodenstock dinner. He described a 1934 Petrus Bordeaux as exceptional, "deeply coloured, very rich... where Hardy Rodenstock gets these wines I know not. There are simply no records of production, of stock or sales prior to 1945."

The wine, which was expected to fetch as much as $5,000 a bottle, went unsold.

You Pay G-man's Legal Bills (NYDN)

By William Sherman, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 6, 2007

Taxpayers are footing part of the mounting legal bills for an ex-FBI agent accused of helping a Brooklyn Mafia boss commit four murders, the Daily News has learned.

The Justice Department is helping fund retired agent Lindley DeVecchio's defense, which has cost more than $450,000 since his indictment last year by the Brooklyn district attorney's office.

"It's an expensive litigation," said DeVecchio's lawyer Douglas Grover, who declined to comment further.

It could not immediately be determined how much the department is paying.

"There is a process in place by which employees or former [FBI] employees who are the subject of civil litigation or criminal charges can apply for coverage of their legal costs. The recommendation is forwarded to the Department of Justice, where a final determination is made," FBI spokesman John Miller said.

In a case that rocked New York law enforcement, DeVecchio, 66, was indicted last year for providing information on informants and mob rivals to Colombo family boss Gregory Scarpa before the murders.

DeVecchio, who spent 33 years as an agent, is also charged with receiving payoffs from Scarpa totaling more than $66,000.

Now dead, Scarpa was DeVecchio's top secret informant for more than a decade, beginning in 1982. The murders occurred during the brutal Colombo family wars of the late 1980s and early '90s.

Grover, DeVecchio and numerous agents who worked with him maintain he is innocent of the charges and that the Brooklyn DA's prosecution is baseless and misguided. wsherman@nydailynews.com

Casino Cheats Bet On Midwest Marks (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, March 6, 2007

CHICAGO — Casinos sprouting across the Midwest are attracting sophisticated cheaters from Las Vegas, Atlantic City and overseas who believe they can scam new, unseasoned staff, gambling officials say.

Cheating is often discovered only when casinos' books don't add up, making it difficult to nab culprits, says Joe Diaz of the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation.

"We've had people coming in from out of state trying to take advantage of inexperienced staff or a staff that hasn't got all the bugs worked out," he says. Most casinos' security staffs are aided by state or local police.

Joe Massa, general manager of Iowa's Riverside Casino & Golf Resort, knew scammers might target his casino, which opened in August. He hired experienced pit and security staff, he says, and hasn't detected any out-of-state cheaters.

Nevertheless, casinos in Iowa — where a half-dozen have opened since 2000 — and other states allegedly have been hit by out-of-state cheats:

•Three gamblers from the East Coast, including one from Atlantic City, were charged in Osceola, Iowa, with using shaved coins to trick slot machines into awarding credits.

•A casino in Joliet, Ill., was targeted by a team that included a Nevadan. They were charged with using fake cash vouchers to steal $50,000.

"They have gone from site to site, and they seem to prey on riverboats or smaller venues," says Ernest Yelton of the Indiana Gaming Commission. "They perhaps believe that we are less sophisticated."

Casino security officers in Indiana attend an eight-week training academy that includes three weeks of training in casinos, Yelton says. Other states have similar programs.

Eric Bush of the Michigan Gaming Control Board says many casinos in the Midwest use security measures as sophisticated as those in Las Vegas and Atlantic City.

Many of them, Bush says, have digital cameras covering every inch of the casino floor that can "read the serial number on a bill lying on the table." Detroit casinos, he says, are testing chips embedded with electronic signals that allow every movement to be tracked.

George Joseph, a Las Vegas-based consultant, trains casino workers. Cheats like the Midwest because "there are so many casinos in one area," he says. He tells staff to watch for:

•Cellphones used to photograph and convey poker players' hands to cheaters.

•Ringlike devices that are worn on fingers and have a stem that attaches to bills. The device quickly retracts the bills from slots after the machines validate them.

In 2005, Indian casinos created a national network to share information about cheaters. Members get e-mail notices alerting them to new postings. Many casinos also share information with others in their state.

Diaz says plenty of Iowa gamblers also try to cheat. "We have a lot of local people who will try to add or take chips away when the dealer's not looking," he says.

Employees also steal. Six casino workers were charged in Minnesota with filing phony paperwork to get reimbursed for jackpots they never paid to customers.

Yelton says the latest scam in Indiana is simple: people stealing the vouchers that have replaced coins as payouts from slot machines.

Manufacturing Misdemeanors (NYT)

The New York Police Department has been going fishing. Not content to nab criminals when they break the law on their own, the department has been planting unattended bags in subway stations to see who might take them, at which point waiting officers pounce.

As NY1 News reported last week, 220 people were arrested last year in the sting, known as Operation Lucky Bag. In dismissing one of these cases, a Brooklyn judge said the police “do not need to manipulate a situation where temptation may overcome even people who would normally never think of committing a crime.” This program bothers us for that and many other reasons and should be discontinued immediately.

Civil libertarians have argued that the program is entrapment. That is a legal distinction for the courts to decide, but it certainly looks like that to a layperson. It is clearly a poor use of resources. People wandering off with lost property ranks far down the list of law enforcement priorities.

There is also the question of whether the sting does actual harm. In an era of terrorism, where the police have to rely on the help of average people to notice anything suspicious — including apparently abandoned bags — the last thing New York needs are cynical operations that encourage mistrust between the police and subway riders.

And of course, there is the effect on neighborliness. It is remarkable how many people in this city are willing to track down the owners of lost cellphones, wallets or bags. Arresting good Samaritans is bad enough, but encouraging them not to help in the future through this kind of overly aggressive policing is a downright shame. The best thing to do with this misbegotten program would be to end it.

Aftermath Of A Savage Scene (WP)

It has taken him almost 14 years to put to paper the story of that night in 1993 when Norman Harrell took the lives -- and the hearts -- of Hawkins, who was his ex-girlfriend, and her daughter.

Homicides were everyday occurrences in the District then. The city was in the clutches of a crack war and its impulsive, impersonal violence. But the slayings of Hawkins and Harris were different. They were personal, savage.

And they seized Flynn, then a 36-year-old homicide prosecutor who had just become a father, like no other case had -- or has.

The crime scene at the house in Northeast Washington was like nothing he had ever seen, the killer's rage so evident. Hawkins's heart was left adrift among her innards; her daughter's was gone.

And the sons and daughters, sisters and cousins Flynn first encountered at D.C. Superior Court were like no family he had met. Angry as they were, the victims' family shared a faith in God and a belief in the law and in Flynn himself.

"All of those things . . . made it just a unique experience," he said.

Indeed, after the jurors had listened to him, even after they had convicted Harrell in the summer of 1994, Flynn found himself with more to say -- about Hawkins, her daughter, the incredible strength of the family they left behind and himself.

"The story needs to be told," he said to himself at the time.

Many drafts -- and many murder cases -- later, Flynn's book, "Relentless Pursuit," arrived in stores this month.

It is a true-crime memoir by a prosecutor who took on the biggest trial of his career in the midst of his own family crisis. On the opening day of the trial, his father learned that lung cancer had spread to his brain and that he probably had only months to live.

It is also the story of how, in his own time of need, Flynn says he found a measure of comfort in the company of a family that was wrestling with painful emotions that have never gone away.

Talking in his study, where a framed sketch of him standing before the jury in the Harrell case sits above his desk, Flynn, now 49, still seems awed by the family. "In the midst of what had to be the most agonizing experience of their lives, it was amazing how thoughtful they were, how they extended themselves to me," Flynn said.

Diane Hawkins and her home in the 3400 block of Eads Street NE were the center of the family until the final minutes of May 25, 1993. A mother of six, Hawkins had a son with Harrell. She had filed a claim for child support from him, and Harrell had made it clear more than once that he didn't think the government had any place telling fathers how to support their children.

The night before they were to appear in D.C. Superior Court, Harrell showed up at Hawkins's rowhouse, as he did with some regularity, usually to see his son. That night he apparently had other intentions. When he walked out, Hawkins, 42, was dead, found in the dining room area. Katrina was found in an upstairs bedroom, nearly decapitated and her heart cut out.

The bloodbath left only one survivor, a 22-month-old girl named Kikki who was found in tears, sitting on a bed near Katrina's body. A veteran police official described it as "the most graphic violence I have ever seen." Counselors were brought in to talk to emergency personnel who saw the bodies.

Recounted in unsettling detail in the early chapters of his book, the crime scene sets up Flynn's story of how Harrell was caught and ultimately convicted of first-degree murder, for which he is serving 60 years in prison. Harrell, a truck driver, was an avid hunter, and authorities found a manual in his home about how to gut animal carcasses.

The Washington Post praised "Relentless Pursuit," saying it worked on many levels and was a welcome break from so many tales of police and prosecutorial misconduct. The New York Times loathed the book, calling it "weak" and criticizing Flynn's "myopic view of his importance."

It is certainly a book about Flynn, an assistant U.S. attorney, and his pride in the work that he and other prosecutors do.

He was raised in Annandale and now lives in Great Falls with his wife and their son and daughter. His work has long been in court.

"I am a prosecutor," he writes. "I carry other titles that I cherish more: father, husband, son. But the specifics of my character, good and bad, are best defined by the job title I've held for more than seventeen years. . . . I had an easy familiarity with humanity at its most base and my career had consisted of an extended tour through a veritable museum of amorality and depravity."

"Relentless Pursuit" did not start out as a book built around himself, Flynn said. He intended to write about Hawkins and her family, ordinary people caught up in something terrible. In his early drafts, in fact, Flynn did not appear, he said, for more than 100 pages.

But a first manuscript found no takers when it circulated in 1997 and 1998. He was told the book, at about 450 pages, was too long. He cut it down and shopped it around again. By 2001, he still had found no takers.

A writer and a lawyer who does a lot of work in publishing were asked to look at the manuscript, and they suggested a change, Flynn said. "They said, 'You need to put yourself more up front. The reader needs to see this case through your eyes.' "

Flynn was reluctant. "Philosophically, that was not the book that I had set out to write," he said. He wanted it to remain the family's story. They had embraced him as one of their own. They had prayed with him at the courthouse for his father, who died later that year. Day after day, they had touched Flynn.

But he also wanted the book published, and he knew this would be his best and almost certainly his last chance. "We pretty much thought that was going to be it," he said. So he agreed to make himself a central figure. "It made me sit down and see how I was changed, for the good, by this," Flynn said.

An only child, he had grown into something of a loner when it came to his job. The Harrell case changed that, he said. Since then he's been more inclined to team with other prosecutors. "I got a sense of community that I hadn't necessarily been exposed to, not in my professional life," he said.

G.P. Putnam's Sons signed him to a deal in January 2006, and Flynn set about finishing the book on a leave of absence he had already planned to take. He holed up in his library, surrounded by titles that leaned toward the law and those who've crossed it ("In Cold Blood," "Bundy"). To keep his focus, he worked on a computer that wasn't linked to the Internet.

Some of Hawkins's sisters and children had known for years that Flynn was working on a book, and a few had read an early draft. A lot of time had passed, though, and Flynn wanted to be sure that the whole family -- the brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles and cousins who had flocked to the home the night Hawkins was found and to the courthouse for months afterward -- knew what was coming.

So last month, when the book was finished and the Justice Department appeared ready to approve its publication, Flynn met with the family. The book had taken him back to a painful time in his life and career and, he explained, might take some of them on a similar journey.

Copies of "Relentless Pursuit" began circulating among the relatives, who were generally supportive of Flynn's endeavor.

Shaunta Jackson wanted to read it. She was 15 the night of the slayings and arrived home to chaos -- and a glimpse of her dead mother's leg. She had counseling in the years that followed, and she thought she was ready to reexamine that horrible time so she started reading.

She didn't make it far.

"I couldn't read it," said Jackson, now 30 and the mother of an 11-year-old girl. "It made me sad. I started crying. . . . It just brought back a lot of memories. . . . I thought I could handle it."

It had taken Flynn 14 years to make his peace with what happened.

CIVIL LAW:

Radio Companies To Pay $12.5 Million Payola Fine (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Four of the nation's largest broadcast radio companies have agreed to pay a combined $12.5 million to settle a federal investigation into "pay-for-play" practices and will provide thousands of hours of free airtime to local musicians and independent record labels, sources familiar with the agreement said today.

Details of the settlement are being worked out and the Federal Communications Commission still must approve it. Under terms of the agreement, Clear Channel Communications Inc., CBS Radio Inc., Entercom Communications Corp. and Citadel Broadcasting Corp. would pay one of the largest fines ever levied by the FCC. The companies allegedly received money, airline tickets, clothing and other gifts from major record companies to play certain songs.

The under-the-table payments, known as payola, have been illegal since a series of pay-for-play scandals in the early days of rock 'n' roll in the 1950s. Any payment in exchange for airtime must be disclosed by broadcasters.

The $12.5-million fine to be paid by the four companies is in line with settlements two of the companies reached with former New York Attorney General Elliott Spitzer. CBS Radio agreed to pay $2 million in October and Entercom agreed to a $4.45 million fine two months later.

But the proposed FCC fine pales in comparison to big settlements Spitzer got from major record companies. Universal Music Group, for example, agreed last year to pay more than $12 million to settle payola allegations. The FCC's jurisdiction, however, is limited to broadcast radio stations.

FCC Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein, an amateur musician who helped broker the deal, said the fines and airplay agreements were significant.

"I think it's a real breakthrough in the battle to wipe payola off the airwaves," he said. "If you take payola out of radio then music gets heard on the basis of merit, not on the basis of who's got wads of cash backing the artist. That's likely to make radio fresher and restore its vitality."

In a separate agreement, the radio companies have agreed to set aside 8,400 half-hour segments of free airtime over the next three years for local and independent artists. The segments would have to air between 6 a.m. and midnight.

"It's a watershed moment in our industry," said Peter Gordon, president of Thirsty Ear Recordings, an independent record label based in Connecticut. He helped negotiate the airtime provisions as a board member of the American Association of Independent Music.

"The independent sector has a chance to have a voice once again on commercial radio," Gordon said. "I think you're looking at the airwaves being refreshed."

Stations Agree On Anti-payola Settlement (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 6, 2007

Radio listeners weary of hearing the same songs over and over may have something to cheer about: Broadcasters have tentatively agreed to anti-payola settlements that could shake up music playlists at some of the nation's largest radio chains.

Four major broadcast companies would pay the government $12.5 million and provide 8,400 half-hour segments of free airtime for independent record labels and local artists, The Associated Press has learned.

The agreement is aimed at curbing payola — generally defined as radio stations accepting cash or other consideration from record companies in exchange for airplay. The practice has been around as long as the radio industry and was made illegal after scandals in the late 1950s.

Two Federal Communications Commission officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because final language has not been approved by the full commission, said the monetary settlement is part of a consent decree between the FCC and Clear Channel Communications Inc., CBS Radio, Entercom Communications Corp. and Citadel Broadcasting Corp.

The settlement was reached at the same time as a separate deal designed to lead to more airtime for smaller record companies and their lesser-known artists as well as local musicians.

The American Association of Independent Music, a group of independent record labels, has received a commitment from the same four broadcasters for the free airtime, the officials said.

In addition to airplay, the broadcasters and the independent labels have also negotiated a set of "rules of engagement" that will guide how record company representatives and radio programmers interact.

The free airtime would be granted to companies not owned or controlled by the nation's four dominant music labels — Sony BMG Music Entertainment, Warner Music Group, Universal Music Group and EMI Group.

Payola, or "pay-for-play," can be difficult to track.

In recent years, independent record promoters have acted as middlemen to deliver payments to radio stations in exchange for airplay. Other forms of inducement include lavish prizes meant for listeners that wind up going to station employees, promises by record companies of concerts by well-known artists in exchange for airplay, and payments for promotional expenses and station equipment.

Under the FCC consent decree, broadcasters would agree to closer scrutiny in their dealings with record companies, including limits on gifts, a promise to keep a database of all items of value supplied by those companies, the employment of independent compliance officers to make sure stations are following the rules and a new "payola hot line" for employees to report infractions.

Broadcasters would admit to no wrongdoing under the three-year settlement, which would end an FCC investigation into payola practices.

Under the separate agreement, the new "rules of engagement" are aimed at requiring equal access to radio music programmers for all record companies as well as transparency in their dealings, said Peter Gordon, who has been leading the negotiations on behalf of the independents.

Gordon is president of Thirsty Ear Recordings, an independent record label, and has been in the music business for 31 years.

"It's absolutely the most historic agreement that the independent community has had with radio," he said. "Without a doubt, nothing else comes close."

Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein, himself an amateur musician, has been in the forefront of the payola fight and has been credited with working out the settlements. "I love music and I want radio to sound fresh, dynamic and real. But payola gets in the way of authenticity because money drives the music, not its quality," he told the AP.

Pay-for-play scandals have not been a high priority for the FCC. The last time it took action was March 2000 when Clear Channel-owned stations KHKS-FM in Denton, Texas, and WKQI-FM in Detroit, Mich., were assessed fines of $4,000 each.

Most of the recent headlines regarding payola have been generated by former New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, now governor, who has criticized the FCC's inaction. He made settlement deals with the four major record labels totaling $30.1 million, as well as with two broadcasters, CBS and Entercom, for another $6.25 million.

Federal law and FCC rules require broadcasters to inform listeners if a station is being paid to play a song. The FCC can fine its licensees, but any criminal investigation would be undertaken by the Department of Justice.

When finalized, the consent decree will result in the second-largest fine ever issued by the FCC — if a recently reported $24 million settlement with Univision Communications Inc. regarding children's television obligations is also approved.

The broadcasters represent four of the six largest radio firms in the U.S. and own a combined total of 1,653 stations. The cash breakdown on the settlement is Entercom, $4 million; Clear Channel, $3.5 million; Citadel, $2 million; CBS, $3 million.

Representatives of the companies could not immediately be reached for comment Monday.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin was widely credited with pushing through the large cash settlement. Speaking generally, FCC spokeswoman Tamara Lipper said of the payola issue that "the whole point is that people should know when they're being influenced and by whom."

In a statement Monday, Commissioner Michael Copps said pay-for-play "cheats radio listeners and will not be tolerated." Radio, he said, is "supposed to be our pipeline to exciting, local undiscovered acts — not more nationalized pablum from big media companies."

Big Radio Settles Payola Charges (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Radio listeners sick of hearing the same tunes again and again may soon encounter surprising new voices, thanks to a $12.5 million settlement pending against major broadcasters accused of taking record companies' bribes.

The four broadcast conglomerates, which together own more than 1,500 stations, have agreed to pay hefty fines and to provide air time for local artists and independent record labels, government and industry officials said yesterday. The negotiated settlement is meant to end a probe into the practice of what is known as "payola," in which large record companies quietly give cash or other benefits to radio station employees who agree to play music by the companies' artists.

"This is the largest collective fine in the history of American broadcasting," said Jonathan S. Adelstein, one of the five members of the Federal Communications Commission. "It wipes payola off the radio dial," he said, and gives lesser-known musicians a chance to reach a wider audience.

For years Adelstein, a Democrat, has railed against pay-to-play practices. But he said the government was making little headway until New York attorney general Eliot L. Spitzer (D) -- now the state's governor -- conducted a major investigation. "He brought us the evidence we needed," Adelstein said in an interview.

Under the pending agreement -- reported yesterday by the Associated Press and confirmed by Adelstein -- Entercom Communications will pay $4 million in fines, followed by Clear Channel Communications ($3.5 million), CBS Radio ($3 million) and Citadel Broadcasting ($2 million). Adelstein said he expected a majority of the commissioners to approve the settlement this week.

Small record companies say payola limits the breadth of radio playlists because big labels pay to have their artists aired repeatedly. It is illegal for stations to accept such payments without publicly disclosing them.

Andy Levin, Clear Channel's executive vice president, said in a statement that his company has "devoted tremendous resources" to preventing payola at its stations. "While no violations were found," he said, "we are pleased to announce that Clear Channel has agreed to settle this longstanding payola investigation with the FCC. We believe it is time to close the door on this ongoing inquiry and move forward."

The other three companies declined comment or did not respond to requests for interviews.

Aside from paying the fines to the FCC, the four companies have agreed to give about 4,000 hours of air time to small record companies and local artists. "This is a new opportunity for fresher, newer artists to be heard on the radio," Adelstein said.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a Republican, said in an interview that he supported the settlement, which he said would "hopefully set a strong tone for the enforcement of the rules" regarding radio play.

Previous investigations have targeted the giver rather than recipients of payola. In 2005, music producer Sony BMG agreed to pay $10 million and Warner Music Group agreed to pay $5 million to settle Spitzer's allegations of offering payola to radio stations.

4 Radio Firms Commit Airtime To Indie Labels (WT)

By Kara Rowland

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

Kill Rock Stars, Appleseed Recordings and Fatboy Records may be coming to a station near you.

Four major radio companies have agreed to set aside more than 4,000 hours of free airtime to independent record labels, representatives from the broadcasters and labels said yesterday.

In a separate deal, Clear Channel Communications Inc., CBS Radio, Entercom Communications Corp. and Citadel Broadcasting Corp. also reached a $12.5 million tentative settlement with the Federal Communications Commission, according to company and FCC officials.

The agreements, first reported yesterday by the Associated Press, are intended to deter what is commonly known as "payola" or "pay for play," in which a radio station provides airtime to a record company in exchange for money or other goods.

Payola has been around for decades and was outlawed in 1960, when Congress passed a law making it punishable by a $10,000 fine and a year in prison. The term itself is a contraction of "pay" and Victrola, an early record player.

The monetary settlement with the FCC is part of a consent decree that has yet to be voted on by the full commission, sources said. It was reached at the same time broadcasters committed to providing 8,400 half-hour segments of airtime to small record labels and unsigned artists.

Broadcasters do not admit fault under the FCC deal, which calls for stricter oversight of their interactions with record labels. Some of the new requirements would include a limit on gifts from record companies; a special hot line for employees to report violations; and a fleet of compliance officers to monitor stations, which would list all items of value received from record companies in a database.

Of the four broadcasters involved, Clear Channel and CBS Radio own stations in the Washington area.

"While no violations were found, we are pleased to announce that Clear Channel has agreed to settle this long-standing payola investigation with the FCC," said Andy Levin, Clear Channel's chief legal officer. "Separately, the company is pleased to announce we are reaffirming our commitment to new and emerging artists by committing a significant amount of airtime to music performed by unsigned artists."

Clear Channel owns several local stations, among them WIHT-FM (99.5) and WASH-FM (97.1). CBS Radio, whose roster includes WJFK-FM (106.7) and the new WTGB-FM (94.7), declined to comment.

"It's one of those little miracles," Peter Gordon, president of independent record label Thirsty Ear Recordings, said of the airtime deal. Mr. Gordon, who acted as a chief negotiator for the American Association of Independent Music, said the parties have yet to hammer out the details of implementation but noted, "We have an understanding in principle."

In addition to airtime, broadcasters and the independent record companies agreed to new "rules of engagement" aimed at providing equal access to radio station programmers.

"Hopefully we'll hear more dynamic music on the radio," said FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein, a Democrat who has led the charge against payola, which he said puts smaller labels with less money at a disadvantage. "Everybody wants to turn the page and put payola behind us."

Many credit former New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who is now the state's governor, for exposing payola scandals. After opening an investigation three years ago, Mr. Spitzer reached settlements with the big four record labels -- Sony BMG Music Entertainment, Warner Music Group, Universal Music Group and EMI Group -- amounting to $30.1 million.

The FCC can regulate licensed radio stations but has no authority over record companies. Federal law allows radio stations to play songs in exchange for money as long as they disclose it.

During his tenure as attorney general, Mr. Spitzer also settled with Entercom and CBS Radio for a total of $6.25 million in agreements that are legally binding only in New York. Afterward, the FCC opened its own investigation.

Tom Taylor, editor of Inside Radio, warned that implementing the private agreement between labels and radio broadcasters "could be really sticky."

"The devil is in the details," said Mr. Taylor, a radio veteran. "People listen to songs because they like them. You can't turn it into a hit if it's not a hit."

Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat who has authored payola legislation, said he is withholding judgment on the decree until it is official. However, he said: "The apparent lack of acknowledgment of wrongdoing sends the wrong message. Whatever the final settlement says, it is clear that we need continued oversight both internally and by the FCC to make sure the changes in the industry's practices are not just on paper."

An FCC official said the agreement could be made public as early as this week.

Broadcasters Agree To Fine Over Payoffs (NYT)

By Jeff Leeds

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Radio broadcasters have long been accused of corrupting the public airwaves by accepting bribes from corporate music giants.

But in a pair of agreements disclosed yesterday, the broadcasters moved to resolve accusations that they had auctioned off the airwaves by agreeing to pay a landmark penalty and pledging to play more music from independent recording artists.

Under a tentative settlement with the Federal Communications Commission, four of the largest radio station owners have agreed to pay a total of $12.5 million to resolve claims that they accepted cash and other incentives in exchange for playing songs — a practice popularly known as payola.

If approved, the settlement would rank as the biggest penalty ever imposed at one time by the F.C.C. — at least until the agency levies another proposed fine, $24 million, against Univision, the Spanish broadcasting giant, which is accused of sidestepping its obligations to supply educational programming for children.

The new penalty, which would come as part of a consent decree with the radio companies — Clear Channel Communications, CBS Radio, Entercom Communications and Citadel Broadcasting — would reflect perhaps the toughest F.C.C. enforcement of the decades-old regulations that prohibit broadcasters from taking secret payments in exchange for playing specific songs. Critics have accused the agency of lax enforcement.

The agency chairman, Kevin J. Martin, said, "I hope it sends a strong message to the industry that we will be enforcing these rules."

The F.C.C. started formal investigations of the radio companies last year after disclosures that radio programmers accepted gifts, luxury trips and other enticements surfaced as part of an inquiry led by Eliot Spitzer, then the New York attorney general.

Mr. Spitzer reached a series of settlements with the four major music conglomerates — the Universal Music Group, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, the EMI Group and the Warner Music Group — totaling more than $30 million. CBS Radio and Entercom settled cases with Mr. Spitzer's office for a combined $6.25 million.

The settlement with the F.C.C. comes at the same time as a separate arrangement in which the broadcasters agreed to devote more time to playing artists who are not signed to contracts with the four big record companies.

The deal, negotiated by the American Association of Independent Music, provides that the radio companies will broadcast the equivalent of 8,400 half-hour segments of music from such artists. The segments can run any time from 6 a.m. to midnight any day of the week, according to people briefed on the deal.

Representatives for the broadcasters declined to comment on the proposed settlements in detail.

Andrew W. Levin, Clear Channel's executive vice president and chief legal officer, said: "While no violations were found, we are pleased to announce that Clear Channel has agreed to settle this longstanding payola investigation with the F.C.C. We believe it is time to close the door on this ongoing inquiry and move forward."

Mr. Spitzer's inquiry disclosed how such payments had become widespread as label executives pressed to obtain exposure for stars. In some cases, label executives offered payoffs directly; in others, they hired middlemen known as independent record promoters, to funnel gifts or other enticements to radio station personnel.

Many terms of the proposed consent decree mirror those in the settlements with Mr. Spitzer's office. Under the three-year term of the F.C.C. deal, the broadcasters would tighten their policies governing the contact of their programmers with record labels, including limits on gifts they could receive.

As for the independent labels, Peter Gordon, who negotiated the separate arrangement on behalf of the independent labels, said radio programmers had been making decisions in a "climate of fear" after Mr. Spitzer's inquiry, adding fewer new songs and all but shutting out small independent labels.

Mr. Gordon said that under a set of "rules of engagement" planned as part of the separate agreement with stations, programmers could now listen to lobbying efforts by certain independent promoters working on behalf of independent labels.

Smaller labels should be permitted to lobby for access using "proper professional honorable working relationships," said Mr. Gordon, owner of an independent label called Thirsty Ear Recordings.

Some industry officials were skeptical that the new arrangements would result in a noticeable change for either artists or listeners.

Paul Porter, a former radio programmer who now runs Industry Ears, a Washington-based media research organization, said that compared with the settlements extracted by Mr. Spitzer, the F.C.C. settlement "basically lets the four biggest companies off the hook for peanuts."

Mr. Porter said he did not believe that the separate pledge to broadcast more independent music would amount to much.

"It sounds great, but it's business as usual," Mr. Porter said. "Only a fool would believe differently."

Prescription For Trouble (WSJ)

By Scott Gottlieb

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Inside the federal agencies that oversee parts of the health-care system, there is a palpable view that doctors can no longer be trusted to do the right thing.

The Food and Drug Administration, Medicare and even the Justice Department all believe they cannot rely on many doctors to heed safety warnings, wisely weigh new medical information, or follow treatment approaches that maximize health benefits or lower costs. So in recent years, these agencies have hatched rules that dictate when treatments should be delivered and even how they can be administered -- especially when it comes to new drugs.

The result is increasing federal regulation of medical practice that constrains health-care providers and limits the choices patients have. It might get worse. New legislation offered by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.,) and Michael Enzi (R., Wyo.,), intended to make drugs safer, would raise this regulatory burden by reducing a physician's discretion to exercise clinical judgment and erecting barriers that will exacerbate disparities in access to care.

The legislative proposal extends the FDA's ability to restrict which physicians can prescribe a medicine, and which pharmacies can dispense it, through risk-management plans that would accompany the approval of many new drugs. These "RiskMAPs," as they are called inside the FDA, already guide the use of about 30 marketed drugs as part of "voluntary" arrangements with drug companies.

Right now, pharmaceutical companies propose the plans to better balance the risks and benefits of their drugs, in order to secure FDA approval. But these plans impose burdens, especially on patients who already face difficulty obtaining the specialist care that many RiskMAPs require for the dispensing of new drugs. Thus the FDA and the pharmaceutical industry have mostly confined RiskMAPs to drugs with unpredictable and potentially deadly risks, such as anaphylaxis or rapid organ failure.

That sense of restraint is lifting. New proposals by Congress and the Institute of Medicine advocate RiskMAPs for mitigating a wider set of less-serious problems and to constrain the off-label prescribing of new drugs, even though such prescribing is the standard of care for many diseases. The proposals are gaining traction. Once the FDA is granted the authority to simply impose these RiskMAPs on drug companies, there will be a lot of political pressure on the agency to constrain prescription writing in the name of drug safety.

What would this mean? Consider the RiskMAP recently imposed by the FDA on the use of the diabetes drug Symlin. The new medicine can help very serious diabetics control swings in blood sugar and is one of the few drugs that promote weight loss. But Symlin has a narrow therapeutic margin and can sometimes cause dangerously low blood sugar. The FDA did not trust ordinary generalist doctors -- who treat most diabetics, especially poor or rural patients -- to properly prescribe the medicine or to limit its use to the labeled indication. So Symlin's RiskMAP tries to keep the drug out of generalist hands by, among other things, limiting promotion to doctors specializing in diabetes and who are also supported by certified diabetes educators.

Reflecting this pervasive mistrust of medical practitioners, Medicare is increasingly tying payments to the choices doctors make, compensating doctors more to follow certain cookie-cutter treatments or practice guidelines that are promoted by the agency because they are believed by government experts to maximize benefits or reduce health-care costs.

The Drug Enforcement Administration is also intruding into medical practice. Waging a campaign to cut down on prescription-drug abuse, the DEA has sought legislative authority that would give it a role in limiting the approvals of new pain products -- even though the agency has no ability to appreciate the public health considerations that create a medical need for better drugs to treat serious pain.

Meanwhile, the Department of Justice's war on off-label promotion by drug companies ends up criminalizing the exchange of truthful, non-misleading medical information with doctors on new uses for medicines. This even includes information derived from studies funded by other arms of the government such as the National Institutes of Health. Such was the case in the litigation DOJ recently waged and won against information exchanged on promising new anti-cancer uses for the osteoporosis drug Evista -- some of those uses are now standard care.

All of these approaches harm patients because they impose one-size prescriptions in an area of science that is marked by variation. Furthermore, parameters on the prescription of new drugs, like those imposed on the use of Symlin, create obstacles for patients who already face significant problems getting access to the latest drugs or the specialists who are ordained by FDA's RiskMAPs to prescribe them.

Medicare's treatment guidelines are not the right answer for everyone, because there is a need for judgment in medicine that attunes treatments to individual variations and preferences. DOJ's restrictions on the exchange of medical information deny doctors updated data on the most cutting-edge and specialized uses of new treatments.

Ultimately, we need a better system for accumulating new information about the risks and benefits of treatments, and for communicating this information to providers and patients so people can make more informed choices. The key to improvement is not direct regulation of patient care, but better tools and approaches for evaluating the pros and cons of the many choices patients confront.

Doctors share some blame for inviting this kind of regulation. Agencies have plenty of data showing that some doctors do not heed safety warnings or follow sound advice. Professional societies like the American Medical Association, the various medical journals, and even licensing boards have grown self-interested and have failed the first tenet of an autonomous profession: the ability to regulate itself.

The solutions to any of the health-care problems that government is trying to mitigate will not rest in Washington's constraining "fixes," but with these organs of medicine working with agencies to promote practice standards and safety measures that do not sacrifice medical autonomy and patient choice.

FBI Plans Probe Of Teen's Death (BSUN)

By Greg Garland And Gadi Dechter, Sun Reporters

The Baltimore Sun, March 6, 2007

Medical examiner rules case at juvenile facility a homicide

On the same day the state medical examiner ruled that the death of a student at the Bowling Brook Preparatory School was a homicide, the FBI said it is conducting an independent investigation into the incident.

At a joint news conference Monday in Westminster, federal officials said their investigation into the death of 17-year-old Isaiah Simmons was ordered last week by the Justice Department. Local officials said they would present evidence already gathered by the Carroll County sheriff to a grand jury to determine whether criminal charges should be brought in Maryland.

Simmons died Jan. 23 after being physically restrained for three hours by counselors at Bowling Brook, a privately run residential program for juvenile offenders.

Officials stressed that the medical examiner's ruling of a homicide -- meaning the death was the result of actions by another person or people -- does not necessarily mean a crime was committed. That will be decided by the grand jury next month, said David P. Daggett, Carroll County deputy state's attorney.

"I have no doubt in my mind that nobody intended to kill this young man," Daggett said. But he said the medical examiner had made clear Simmons did not die of a pre-existing medical condition. "They are ruling out any health issues [as causing] the death," he said. "They did say there were certain health issues, but that they were not the cause of death."

The examiner used broad language in describing the cause of Simmons' death as "sudden death during restraint." Medical examiners sometimes use the term when they suspect more than one factor might have contributed to death, such as asphyxia and heart failure.

Simmons' mother, Felicia Wilson, and four other family members sat in the front row of the county government meeting room where the news conference was held.

Faced with a phalanx of television cameras and microphones, Wilson briefly lost her composure and dissolved into tears. She said she was relieved, however, to hear of the homicide ruling.

"I'm just happy to hear of the news that they found out what really happened to my son," she said.

Simmons' sister, Danielle Carter, said she was glad to learn of the FBI's separate investigation.

"The family feels that it's always good to have several sets of eyes on an investigation, to make sure everything is done in compliance," she said. "We feel confident that the FBI and all other parties will get to the bottom of this and that justice will be served."

Witnesses have told The Sun that Bowling Brook workers sat on a struggling Simmons until he passed out and died.

Under pressure from state officials, Bowling Brook announced last week that it will close Friday after five decades in operation. Simmons was placed there by the state Department of Juvenile Services after being found responsible in juvenile court for the robbery of another youth at the Inner Harbor.

The Carroll County Sheriff's Office has been investigating the death. Daggett said the grand jury will be asked to determine whether evidence supports any criminal indictments.

The state medical examiner's office has not released a report about Simmons' death but briefed county investigators. Daggett said he decided to present the case to a grand jury to get the benefit of the collective wisdom of a panel of citizens who will review the evidence and determine whether indictments are warranted.

He said a key question in such cases is whether the death was due to "gross negligence" or simple negligence. A finding of "gross negligence" could lead to criminal sanctions.

As an example, Daggett said, a motorist could be prosecuted for manslaughter if he were drunk or drove in an especially reckless way, but might not be prosecuted if he were simply negligent -- such as losing control while changing a radio dial.

Queen Anne's County State's Attorney Frank Kratovil Jr., who heads the Maryland Association of State's Attorneys, said cases like Simmons' death can pose a difficult challenge for prosecutors.

"Not every tragic event is a criminal matter," Kratovil said. "The question is going to be: 'Was this a grossly negligent act that is the functional equivalent of an intentional act?' "

He said it is common for prosecutors to take such cases before a grand jury. Some Maryland counties bring all felony cases before a grand jury, he said.

"As a prosecutor, it gives you some feedback on what the issues are in the event you decide to indict," he said. "When you have a case where there are real questions about either the facts or the law, then a grand jury is a very valuable tool."

In announcing the findings of the medical examiner, the sheriff's office said it had collected more than 100 pieces of evidence and had interviewed dozens of staff members and students. Some student witnesses have told The Sun that they were interviewed only while held at Bowling Brook, not outside and away from the school's staff where they could speak more freely.

Kevin R. Lewis, the assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Baltimore office, said at the press conference that federal authorities began monitoring the Simmons' case several weeks ago at the request of the sheriff's office.

"You've got a young person's loss of life at an institution, and that gets our attention," he said.

Last week, the U.S. Department of Justice asked the FBI to formally launch a separate investigation to determine whether federal civil rights laws were violated, Lewis said.

The investigation will "be starting right away," he said, and the results will be reported to the Justice Department.

An FBI spokeswoman, Michelle Crnkovich, stressed that the investigation is not an indication that the federal government lacks confidence in Carroll County's probe.

"Absolutely not. We have every confidence in them," she said.

The death at Bowling Brook marks the third time in the past four years that federal authorities have investigated Maryland's troubled system for dealing with juvenile offenders.

A federal investigation of the state-run Charles H. Hickey Jr. School in Baltimore County chronicled deplorable conditions. The state addressed the issue by shutting down most of the school in 2005.

Federal officials also have investigated dangerous conditions at another program run the state, the Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center, which often has been crowded and understaffed.

Maryland's newly appointed Juvenile Services secretary, Donald W. DeVore, said Monday there is no question Maryland's system is badly in need of reform.

DOJ_NMG_0140615

"Today's ruling by the state medical examiner highlights the critical need to reform our Department of Juvenile Services so that all children in state custody are safe," DeVore said. "That is our mission, and failure is not an option."

The Fresno Bee, March 6, 2007

The U.S. Justice Department said Monday it planned to monitor municipal elections in four Southern California cities to ensure they comply with federal voting law.

Federal observers on Tuesday will visit polling places in Azusa, Gardena, Paramount and Rosemead.

Last year federal investigators visited polling places in the region and determined that Azusa and Paramount failed to fully translate election materials into Spanish, as they are required to do under the federal Voting Rights Act. Authorities also said Rosemead failed to offer all voting materials in Spanish, Chinese and Vietnamese.

The Voting Rights Act requires cities to provide election materials in any foreign language that is spoken by a substantial number of people within their boundaries.

Azusa, Paramount and Rosemead each signed federal consent decrees last July requiring them to fix flaws in their election procedures.

Gardena, which has a large non-English speaking population, said on its Web site that it planned to provide ballots and polling place officials who can speak in English, Spanish, Japanese, and Korean.

Federal Monitors Will Oversee Gardena Election (TORDB)

By Gene Maddaus

Torrence (CA) Daily Breeze, March 6, 2007

The Department of Justice won't say why polling in the South Bay community will be receiving special attention on Tuesday.

The U.S. Department of Justice will monitor Tuesday's election in Gardena to ensure that the city complies with the federal Voting Rights Act.

In announcing the decision Monday, federal authorities did not explain why Gardena had been selected for special attention.

The other three cities chosen for election monitoring — Azusa, Rosemead and Paramount — are all subject to federal consent decrees related to ballot translations. But Gardena, which prints ballots in English, Spanish, Japanese and Korean, has not been cited for translation problems in the past.

"It's not a sign of censure," said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson. "It's routine. We want to do this to ensure compliance with the law."

Federal observers will be on hand at polling places in the city throughout the day. An attorney from the Civil Rights Division will coordinate the office's activities.

Election monitors can be deployed based on requests from local officials or complaints from the public. Magnuson said the department does not disclose the nature of the complaints.

City Attorney Ed Lee said he had received a call from the Justice Department last week informing him of the monitoring.

"They wouldn't tell me why they selected Gardena, whether it was a random choice or what," Lee said, adding that he believes it was random.

The City Council race has seen its share of allegations of misconduct, though it is impossible to know whether any of them got the attention of federal election monitors.

On Feb. 23, challenger Tasha Cerda filed a complaint with the state Fair Political Practices Commission, in which she asserted that Gardena police officers had been harassing her campaign workers. She claimed the officers had been writing down license numbers at her headquarters and stopping motorists nearby for no apparent reason.

Detective Russ Temple, president of the GPOA Political Action Committee, called the allegations "ridiculous," adding that no officer would risk his career over a City Council campaign.

In her complaint, Cerda objected to the use of Gardena officers to escort ballots from the precincts to City Hall.

Opponents of Medrano have accused him of repeatedly violating the city's sign ordinance, and many suspect Medrano illegally mailed an anonymous flier attacking challenger Dan Medina — a claim that Medrano denies. Medrano is also sharing a headquarters with the GPOA, an unusual situation that raised questions about a potential violation of city campaign financing law.

Johnson said she had heard complaints from residents that the multiple translations made it difficult for voters to navigate the sample ballot. The city has long provided Spanish and Japanese translation, but has only recently added Korean. But Johnson said she had not heard of any formal complaints related to that issue.

None of the candidates contacted Monday had been informed of the federal monitoring, or had any idea why it had been ordered.

"I guess it's for the better," Medina said. "If it's something that has to be done, then obviously it'll avoid some kind of hanky-panky."

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, March 6, 2007

Justice Department officials are expected to spend the next few days in Seattle as part of an ongoing federal investigation, touring the King County Jail and interviewing staff members.

In October, the department sent a letter to King County officials announcing that it would be investigating the main jail in downtown Seattle. Primary concerns were occurrences of sexual misconduct by corrections officers, suicides, and controlling the spread of infectious diseases.

Federal investigators made their first visit in December. A final report could take six months to a year.

KING 5 Seattle, March 6, 2007

SEATTLE - The Department of Justice will begin a three-day tour of the King County Jail Tuesday as part of an intensive investigation into possible civil rights abuses inside the Seattle facility. The D.O.J. plans to spend at least three days inside the adult jail focusing on sexual abuse of inmates as well as allegations the jail isn't doing enough to prevent suicide or the spread of infectious diseases.

Jail Director Reed Holtgeerts told KING 5 News he welcomes the investigation and has already begun providing the requested documentation into jail safety and procedures. Holgeerts is meeting this afternoon with the Department of Justice and union representatives for corrections officers and others who work in the jail.

Video

Allegations include sexual misconduct

Two former jail guards were recently convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates and a third is awaiting a retrial.

"The message has been sent very clearly that there is zero tolerance (for sexual misconduct)," said Holgeerts. "If we find it, you're gone and you're going to be charged."

Health issues

During a KING 5 investigation in the fall of November, 2005, corrections officers said that they were being exposed to serious diseases such as MRSA (Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus Aureus) and that the jail wasn't doing enough to prevent the spread of the highly contagious disease. Some guards told KING 5 they had contracted MRSA and passed it on to their spouses and children.

"Nobody wants to go home and be infected," said Holtgeerts. "We have added some sinks, improved training and ordered new mattresses. The more we learn, the more we do," he said.

The American Civil Liberties Union toured the jail late last month and says that while some improvements have been made, more needs to be done to stop the spread of MRSA. "We found cracked mattresses which can harbor the MRSA bacteria and problems with laundry not being exchange frequently enough," Doug Honig, Communications Director, said today.

LAPD Cops Object To Financial Disclosure Policy (CBS2)

CBS 2 Los Angeles, March 6, 2007

(CBS) LOS ANGELES Up to 600 Los Angeles Police Department anti-gang and narcotics officers have threatened to retire or transfer to other units if they are required to provide personal financial information, as mandated by a federal consent decree, police union representatives said Monday.

Los Angeles Police Protective League officials are considering a lawsuit to block the disclosure requirement, which was imposed following the Rampart Division corruption scandal, in which gang officers were caught stealing drugs and framing suspects.

The U.S. Justice Department's consent decree with the city requires future gang officers disclose their finances so supervisors might more easily tell if they were illegally profiting from police work.

"We have seen the LAPD repeatedly allow gang members and others to manipulate the system to target officers," Bob Baker, president of the league said.

"We have little confidence that information will be safeguarded once it has been released," Baker said. "The simple fact is that the financial disclosure rules that the LAPD is about to implement open the Pandora's box, once somebody's financial information is available and public, there is no way to turn back and make it private again."

In May, U.S. District Judge Gary Feess extended the five-year consent decree for another three years.

The LAPD has delayed implementation of the financial disclosure requirement while trying to modify the consent decree. Last year, Feess directed the department to move ahead with the plan.

LAPD officials have negotiated with the police union on how to implement the mandate, but talks have reached an impasse and the department could impose the requirement as early as this week.

"This still has to go before the Police Commission and the mayor and I have been working with the Department of Justice, the (consent decree) monitor and the federal judge to satisfy all parties," Police Chief William Bratton said in a statement.

Former Akin Gump Attorney Accuses Firm Of Age Discrimination (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 6, 2007

The old guard has been getting its dander up. First there was Sidley Austin, where partners are challenging the firm's mandatory retirement policy.

Other lawyers have followed, and just last week one Washington attorney filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia alleging that he was fired from one of the city's largest firms because he was too old.

Donald Gross, who is in his 50s, says he was let go from Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld in October 2004, not even a year and a half after he was hired as senior counsel in the Korea practice. Before his termination, Gross alleges that his practice group's head, Sukhan Kim, "reiterated to him that Akin Gump was terminating him not because of any defects in his performance, but because he was 'too senior' because of his age and, therefore, 'not a good fit.'"

Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman partner Christine Kearns, who is representing Akin Gump, says the firm treated Gross fairly. "The firm certainly denies the allegations of age discrimination," she says.

Gross' case differs from some of the other suits that allege more systemic problems or forced retirements. But it paints a picture of the trouble an older attorney had acclimating to life in a law firm.

According to the complaint, Kim was skeptical of Gross' age from the start. "You seem very old to be starting out in a major law firm," Kim allegedly told Gross before he was hired. (Before joining Akin Gump, Gross had worked at the State Department and National Security Council and practiced law in South Korea.)

Troubles grew worse, Gross states, after he took three weeks off for heart surgery in March 2004. When he returned, Gross alleges, Kim sidelined him and forced him to report to a much younger partner. The complaint says another partner, Michael Quigley hinted that Gross' experience "made him 'perfect' for a job with a policy think tank" but that he was too old to continue with the practice group.

Then, despite positive evaluations of his work, Gross also says, Kim came up with a "60-day exit strategy" for Gross.

Reached by phone, Kim declined to go into details but said, "I can just tell you that that is totally and actually false." Gross, who is represented by Bruce Fredrickson and Jonathan Puth at Webster, Fredrickson & Brackshaw, is asking for his job back and unspecified compensation for back pay and damages.

Two Officers Speak To Grand Jury On Killing Of Unarmed Black Man (NYT)

By Al Baker And Colin Moynihan

Two of the five police officers involved in the killing of Sean Bell, an unarmed black man who died in a hail of 50 police bullets, testified yesterday before a grand jury in Queens that is weighing evidence in the case.

The two officers, Detective Paul Headley and Officer Michael Carey, testified voluntarily without immunity from prosecution in the case, officials said. Union officials and lawyers for the men said they had been eager to talk about what occurred on Nov. 25, when they and their colleagues opened fire on Mr. Bell's car outside the Club Kalua strip club in Jamaica, Queens.

Yesterday's events were noteworthy because city police officers who are the focus of grand juries sometimes stay silent about their roles in such shootings. And the first public appearances by the officers — more than three months after the shooting of Mr. Bell — made for a day filled with emotions.

In the morning, Detective Headley, 35, was surrounded by about a dozen people, including his lawyer and union officials, when he strode toward the office building in Queens where the grand jury is seated. He wore a blue suit, stepped confidently and appeared to be at ease. He testified for about two hours and then left the building about 2:30 p.m., again surrounded by supporters.

Officer Carey, 26, arrived later, about 3:30 p.m., also wearing a business suit but appearing tenser as he kept his expression fixed, his eyes set straight ahead. He testified, then left the building about 5:20 p.m. with supporters, including Patrick J. Lynch, the president of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, by his side.

Separately, each officer declined to discuss his testimony. But union officials and their lawyers spoke for them. "My client is relieved that he had the opportunity to answer the questions the grand jury posed to him," said John Arlia, the lawyer for Detective Headley. "He is relieved he had the opportunity to speak to them and tell his version of the events."

Stephen C. Worth, the lawyer for Officer Carey, said, "This officer stood there and answered all of their questions." He said his client testified for about an hour and a half.

Each lawyer declined to discuss whether he had asked the grand jurors to hear additional witnesses, an option in such matters.

Mr. Bell, 23, and his friends were celebrating his bachelor party just hours before his scheduled wedding when the shooting occurred. Two of his friends, Trent Benefield and Joseph Guzman, were wounded. Mr. Benefield, who is black, and Mr. Guzman, who is Hispanic, testified before the grand jury last week.

Of the five officers who fired the 50 shots, three are black and two are white. Detective Headley, who is black, fired one bullet and Officer Carey, who is white, fired three, officials said. On Wednesday, Detective Marc Cooper is expected to testify, as is the 28-year-old detective who fired the first of the 50 shots and who has not been officially identified by the authorities because of his undercover status.

It remains uncertain whether Detective Michael Oliver, who fired 31 of the shots, will testify before the grand jury. Michael J. Palladino, president of the Detectives' Endowment Association, said he expected Detective Oliver to testify on Friday.

When the grand jury will finish its work — to determine whether any of the five officers who opened fire on Mr. Bell's car will face criminal charges — is unclear, but officials said it could be as early as the end of this week or sometime next week.

Yesterday, Mr. Palladino said that the actions of the officers did not rise to the level of criminality.

"I hope the grand jurors see these officers for who and what they are," Mr. Palladino said. "All of the officers involved are sincere, humble individuals and the actions that they took that night were during the performance of their duty and they were acting in good faith."

He added: "There was no criminality in their hearts, nor in their minds, when they took the actions they took."

Mr. Lynch said he was happy that Officer Carey could finally speak about the shooting, to "put some facts to some of the fiction that ran in the street."

"We're pleased that today has come where we have the opportunity for this police officer to go out and tell his side of the story: the thoughts he had at the time, the facts that he dealt with out in the street that night," Mr. Lynch said.

Officer Charged In Teen Beating (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

A 41-year-old LAPD officer was charged today with unlawful use of force and filing a false police report for allegedly choking and punching a 16-year-old boy in the Central Division station in December.

Officer Sean Meade's actions were recorded by a hidden camera that had been installed after some chairs at the station had been vandalized. Police Chief William Bratton and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa both expressed outrage at the incident. Bratton immediately called for the arrest of Meade.

Department sources who viewed the video said it appears to show Meade choking the boy, then removing his handcuffs and challenging him to a fight.

The teenager was arrested on suspicion of a curfew violation in Chinatown, and Bratton said the attack was without provocation. The boy was picked up about 1:30 a.m. while walking with a teenage girl. Police called the girl's parents, who picked her up, then took the boy to Central Division.

Officers were not informed cameras had been installed in the detective room, where the beating allegedly occurred. Technicians enhanced the original video, which was grainy.

Meade was to be arraigned today.

Court Reaffirms Colo. Redistricting Plan (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, March 6, 2007

The Supreme Court on Monday ruled against Colorado voters challenging a congressional redistricting plan favorable to Democrats.

In a unanimous decision, the justices said that three Republican voters were not entitled to sue in an effort to replace a redistricting plan ordered by a court with one passed by a Republican-controlled state legislature. The three voters were joined by a former Democratic state legislator who often voted with Republicans.

A Democratic state judge drew up the first redistricting plan in 2002, while the Republican Legislature drew one up in 2003.

The court plan had been put in place when a divided Colorado General Assembly was unable to agree on one in time for the 2002 election.

In their lawsuit, the challengers said the court-imposed map violates a right of citizens under the U.S. Constitution to vote for congressional candidates in districts created by state legislatures.

In an unsigned opinion, the justices said that the only injury the voters allege is that the Elections Clause had not been followed.

"This injury is precisely the kind of undifferentiated, generalized grievance about the conduct of government that we have refused to countenance in the past," the court stated.

The Colorado case is the Supreme Court's latest foray into congressional redistricting battles. Last year, the justices addressed a messy redistricting fight in Texas, ruling that the Constitution does not bar states from redrawing political lines in mid-decade when one party or the other senses an advantage.

The decision grew out of a court review of a Texas redistricting plan orchestrated in 2003 by Tom DeLay, who was a Republican congressional leader at the time.

In the Colorado case, a panel of federal judges last August dismissed the Republicans' lawsuit, saying the same issue had already been decided in an earlier lawsuit brought by the Colorado attorney general.

In that case, the Colorado Supreme Court ruled against the Republican legislative plan in 2003, saying the state constitution restricted congressional redistricting to once per decade and that the legislature's plan was the second plan.

New Scrutiny Of 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' (CSM)

By Gordon Lubold

The Christian Science Monitor, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

"Don't ask, don't tell" – the 14-year-old policy that keeps openly declared gays from serving in the military – is coming under new scrutiny.

Overturning it remains an unlikely prospect in the near term, given the political explosiveness of the issue. But the needs of war – and a fresh push by gay advocates in the courts and Congress – is pushing the policy back into the limelight. For example:

•In a January op-ed, a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said the policy no longer made sense in a time of war, when young men and women were needed no matter what their sexual orientation. "I now believe that if gay men and lesbians served openly in the United States military, they would not undermine the efficacy of the armed forces," retired Army Gen. John Shalikashvili wrote in The New York Times.

•In Congress, Rep. Martin Meehan (D) of Massachusetts is reintroducing legislation with more than 100 cosponsors to lift the ban. With a new Democratic Congress, there is a growing sense that the issue can be seriously debated once again.

•On Wednesday, 12 former service members released from service under "don't ask, don't tell" will argue their case before the federal First Circuit Court of Appeals in Boston. They want the court to overturn a lower-court ruling that didn't allow them to make a case as to why the ban on gays is unconstitutional.

"I think we are finally making progress," says Representative Meehan. "It will be an uphill climb, but the November election can only mean good things for my bill."

Nearly 11,000 military personnel have been discharged under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy, according to a Government Accountability Office report in 2005, including about 750 personnel in jobs critical to the war on terrorism, like translators. Thousands more are thought to have voluntarily left the military – or never joined – because of the policy, gay and lesbian advocates said.

Policy created in '93

The policy was created in 1993 to calm the waters after President Clinton's initial attempt to force the military to accept homosexuals serving openly. General Shalikashvili, who then headed the Joint Chiefs, supported the policy at the time. But after discussions last year with several gay and lesbian service members, he says he's changed his mind.

A Zogby poll of more than 500 service members released late last year found that 73 percent of military members are "comfortable" with lesbians and gays and 23 percent "know for sure" that someone in their unit is homosexual.

Supporters grow but still a minority

An annual poll begun in 2003 by the independent Military Times newspapers has shown a yearly increase in support for homosexuals serving openly in the military. Nevertheless, in its latest poll, only 30 percent of a sampling of 6,000 of subscribers approved of the idea.

Advocates say the current generation of recruits are from the "Will and Grace" generation, people who have been exposed to homosexuality in pop culture and for whom sexual orientation is not considered as important as it is to other generations.

"Within the last two years, it has been truly remarkable how many service members who are openly gay or lesbian are ... serving without incident," says Steve Ralls, a spokesman for the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, an advocacy group based in Washington, D.C., for gay service members.

But supporters of "don't ask, don't tell" doubt that it will be changed. The apparent momentum for the legislation Meehan introduced is "manufactured," says Elaine Donnelly, president of the Center for Military Readiness, based in Washington.

Think tanks and advocacy agencies aren't the ones who will sway Congress one way or another. Ultimately, it's the rank and file who will have to be convinced and, in some quarters, that will not come anytime soon.

One soldier who likes to say he joined the military "back when the Army used to be an Army," 31 years ago, said he doesn't understand where these polls saying there is increasing acceptance of homosexuals in the military are coming from.

"Who are they asking? I'm not seeing anything near what the supposed poll data was proclaiming," said the soldier, who asked not to be identified because he had not been cleared to discuss the policy by his senior commander. He said he believes gays are "morally wrong," and has conducted some informal polling in his unit in Georgia to determine its views. No one he has talked to believes homosexuals should serve, he said.

"I'm from a Christian background and I believe what the Bible says," he said. "Automatically, you have to love the sinner, but you don't have to love the sin."

Who's Wrong When Rights Collide? (WSJ)

By Suzanne Sataline

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

For 15 years, John Nemecek was a respected business professor and associate dean at Spring Arbor University, an evangelical college in Michigan. But after he started wearing makeup and earrings and asked friends to call him Julie, he was demoted, then fired, and told that his womanly appearance violated "Christian behavior."

Prof. Nemecek is contesting the dismissal under federal discrimination laws, presenting a test in a growing clash between religious and employee rights. The case is the latest of a number of conflicts pitting two constitutional principles against each other: the freedom of religious organizations to operate without government intrusion versus the rights of workers to be free of discrimination based on race, religion, sex or nationality.

Prof. Nemecek's complaint to the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, scheduled to be heard today, charges that the university, which is affiliated with the Free Methodist Church of North America, violated federal and state civil-rights laws by ordering the professor to groom and dress like a typical male. The school also violated Michigan's law protecting the disabled, the complaint says, because it allegedly treated Prof. Nemecek as if he had a disability that prevented him from doing his job. Spring Arbor declined to comment on the specific allegations in the EEOC complaint.

Since Congress passed the Civil Rights Act in 1964, courts have recognized that churches enjoy a "ministerial exception" allowing them to discriminate to uphold their beliefs. This right is recognized when it comes to selecting clergy, such as allowing Catholics to exclude women priests, but courts have not settled on the sweep of this exception -- and whether it would cover teachers of secular subjects at religious institutions, says Eugene Volokh, a professor at the University of California Los Angeles School of Law.

Civil-rights groups said they have received a growing number of complaints from gay and transgender employees dismissed for religious and other reasons. St. Anselm College in Manchester, N.H., settled last year with a former computer worker who sued the Catholic school alleging discrimination when he was fired him after announcing he would become a woman. A youth counselor is suing the Kentucky Baptist Homes for Children Inc. in U.S. District Court in Louisville, saying the home, which received state funding, illegally let her go because she's a lesbian.

Federal courts have also issued mixed decisions on whether people changing their sex are protected by civil-rights laws, disagreeing over what constitutes discrimination based on sex. Prof. Nemecek's lawyer is basing her argument on a 1989 U.S. Supreme Court opinion. The justices found that Price Waterhouse engaged in gender stereotyping by illegally denying Ann Hopkins a partnership because of her "macho" behavior.

That ruling formed the backbone of a 2004 decision in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati. The judge ruled that Salem, Ohio, illegally fired a transsexual firefighter because the U.S. Civil Rights Act protects someone who does not "act and/or identify with his or her gender."

Michigan is in the same federal circuit as that case. Some experts say Prof. Nemecek faces a higher hurdle than the firefighter because of the special federal treatment for religious employers. "This will be a major case because of that religious wrinkle," says Julie Greenberg, a professor at Thomas Jefferson School of Law School in San Diego, who has written on transsexuals' rights.

Ms. Greenberg says the court will be forced to determine the difference between religious belief and prejudice. "Are we going to make religions codify everything in order to make them prove it's part of their religious practices?" she asks. "Does it mean they can never validly claim this is their right? It's very complex."

Spring Arbor faculty must agree to a community covenant affirming biblical principles and "model Christian character to our students," though they are not required to be Free Methodists, says Gayle D. Beebe, university president. "It's an expectation they will be acting out the Christian faith both in the way they teach and in the way they live." The school's 1,400 students are not required to be Christian.

An ordained minister with the conservative Baptist General Conference, Prof. Nemecek started as an adjunct teacher in 1990 and rose to assistant dean for adult education. Prof. Nemecek taught religion and business.

Prof. Nemecek, married for 35 years and the father of three, says he suffered from uncertainty about his sexuality since childhood. In 2004, a doctor diagnosed "gender-identity disorder," in which sexual identity differs from one's body. Prof Nemecek, now 55 years old, began wearing looser clothing, manicured his nails and started hormone therapy, in time developing breasts. The professor has not had gender-altering surgery.

The professor and wife, Joanne, a nurse, decided to stay together. "I feel like Julie's condition doesn't negate my marriage vows," Ms. Nemecek says. They told Prof. Nemecek's superiors about the diagnosis in fall 2005. Soon after that, Prof. Nemecek says, the school took away responsibilities -- including running orientations for new students and helping at graduation.

In a new contract signed last April, the university revoked the dean's post and reassigned Prof. Nemecek to a non-tenure-track role, working from home, teaching online, and taking an $11,000 pay cut to about $45,000. Under the agreement, when visiting campus, Prof. Nemecek would be barred from wearing makeup and female clothing or exhibiting any outward signs of femininity. "We felt through a job reassignment we could give him the space to work on this issue," says Mr. Beebe, who declined to answer other questions, citing a "legal proceeding."

Prof. Nemecek signed the contract. "Because it was so late in the academic year, it was almost impossible to move," the professor says. A school official sent a written warning in October listing four violations of the contract, two that concerned the professor's visits to campus in makeup and earrings, which the professor acknowledges. Another violation concerned the professor wearing a university T-shirt while in makeup, which Prof. Nemecek also admits.

The professor filed his EEOC complaint in October. University officials said in December they would not renew the contract and barred Prof. Nemecek from teaching in February.

"Essentially they're saying they can define who is a Christian," says Prof. Nemecek, whose Baptist church also asked him to leave the congregation. "I don't agree our biology determines our gender."

College Conservative Settles Over Firing (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

DENVER -- Anson Rohr is known as an outspoken critic of global terrorism. Ordinarily, that wouldn't be enough to get a person fired.

But Mr. Rohr says that's what happened after he hung an anti-terrorism poster at his work space, urged a religion professor to present a balanced view of Islam and generally made no secret of his conservative views at Front Range Community College.

After he was fired last year from his job as an administrative assistant, Mr. Rohr sued college officials for violating his free-speech rights. Last week, he agreed to accept an undisclosed financial settlement.

In return, Mr. Rohr, 50, is prohibited from working again at the Westminster, Colo., college. Although he misses the flexible schedule and paycheck, he said, saying goodbye won't be a problem.

"It was pretty awful to work there because of the radical-left bent," said Mr. Rohr. "I was the token conservative."

Front Range Vice President Andrew Dorsey declined to respond, saying he was unable to comment on personnel matters.

Mr. Rohr, who was employed at the college for five years, has a long history of conservative dissent.

He wrote letters to the campus newsletters responding to left-wing articles. He criticized an anti-war presentation at the college. He sent an e-mail to a religion professor asking for information about a course on Islam after hearing that the course presented an unbalanced view.

The last straw, however, was his decision to hang a poster at his desk depicting a scene from the school massacre at Beslan, Russia, where Muslim terrorists killed 334 students and adults in 2004. The print showed a man carrying a dead child.

A faculty member, Julie Voss, saw the poster and wrote an e-mail to administrators asking for its removal, saying she was "deeply offended," according to court documents.

Dean of Instruction Therese Brown called Mr. Rohr and ordered him to remove the picture, but he refused, citing his First Amendment rights. He also argued that other college employees were permitted to display signs with political messages.

Mr. Rohr cited a bumper sticker with the slogan "Bush Lied, People Died" on one administrator's office door. One hallway near Ms. Voss' office had graphic pictures of Vietnam War victims, Holocaust survivors and Civil War carnage, he said.

Mr. Rohr, who had regularly received positive job reviews, said he hung up on the dean after she continued to berate him. She denied the accusation in court documents.

He was placed on administrative leave later that day and fired upon his return the next month. In his letter of termination, administrators said he was guilty of insubordination for hanging up on Ms. Brown.

Mr. Rohr has called the whole incident "a big setup." He said he was prohibited from revealing the amount of the financial settlement, but said he was "satisfied" with the outcome.

"I was happy with the results," he said. "As soon as I get my check, I'm going to e-mail them and say, 'Maybe next time, you'll think about the First Amendment first.' "

Editorial: Justice Served (RTD)

Richmond Times-Dispatch, March 6, 2007

An adage teaches that justice delayed is justice denied. In the case of those killed during the fight for civil rights in the mid-20th century, the tardy justice promised by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller is important nonetheless.

Spurred by a string of successful prosecutions of murders dating to the civil-rights era, the Department of Justice and FBI announced they will open investigations into 12 additional unsolved cases. In all, Gonzales and Mueller expressed an interest in 40. To individuals who up to this point "have quite literally gotten away with murder," the FBI director spoke with clarity: "You've not gotten away with anything. We're still on your trail."

Every murder is heinous, and all perpetrators should answer for their crimes. Yet those killed in the cases the DOJ and FBI have reopened often died only because they had dark brown skin. These victims deserve the special attention Washington will now focus on them. Society deserves the attention, too. The prosecutions serve a penitential function.

If the individuals who committed these crimes are still alive, they should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law, no matter how elderly the assailants or their conspirators. This rights a specific wrong, and it sends a proper message about the rule of law to the communities these crimes were calculated to intimidate. In these instances justice delayed is justice served.

Free To Vote In Florida (NYT)

Florida is notorious for running elections badly, but its new governor is trying to fix one of the state's most unjust and undemocratic practices. He has called for tearing down the barriers that prevent as many as 950,000 ex-offenders from voting.

The United States stands alone in the free world when it comes to laws that strip convicted felons of the right to vote — sometimes for life — even after they complete their sentences and go on to crime-free lives. Of the more than five million citizens who were barred from the polls in the last presidential election, virtually all would have been free to vote in nations like Canada, France or Britain.

Northern and Midwestern states are gradually backing away from voting bans for ex-offenders. But these antidemocratic laws remain entrenched in the Deep South, where they were enacted in the late 19th and early 20th centuries as part of a broad effort to restrict the political influence of African-Americans. And Florida has the most restrictive laws and the highest number of disenfranchised ex-offenders of any state in the country.

As it stands now, Floridians who want their voting and civil rights restored must apply to a slow-moving state clemency board that meets only four times a year and has an enormous backlog of cases. The state attorney general recently suggested enlarging the overall staff and having the clemency board meet more frequently, but more substantial action is needed.

Gov. Charlie Crist has a better idea: automatically restoring voting rights to felons who complete their sentences. In a recent speech, Mr. Crist pledged to lead the movement for the restoration of voting and civil rights for ex-offenders in Florida and hinted that he might do so by issuing an executive order.

That's an excellent proposal. It would take the restoration issue out of the hands of a sluggish bureaucracy that has clearly failed to do its job and vault Florida to the forefront of a national movement that aims to extend democracy to ex-offenders. It would also help put an end to one of the most shameful episodes in American electoral history.

ANTITRUST:

Intel May Have Lost Emails (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

AMD Suit Suffers Possible Fresh Blow; Sales Outlook Dims

Intel Corp. said it may have lost many internal emails that it is obliged to produce for rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and other plaintiffs in high-profile antitrust litigation.

The disclosure -- which could further complicate AMD's antitrust suit against Intel -- comes as AMD warned that it expects to miss its first-quarter revenue target amid an intensifying battle with Intel, its far larger competitor.

An Intel spokesman said it couldn't yet estimate the number of missing emails, expressing optimism that it will be able to recover most of them. Richard Horwitz, a lawyer representing Intel, wrote the judge overseeing the litigation that the company "very much regrets this happened."

AMD sued Intel in June 2005, accusing the company of using a variety of improper tactics to maintain a monopoly in sales of microprocessors that provide the calculating power for most personal computers and server systems. Private antitrust suits on behalf of Intel shareholders followed. Intel has insisted that its tactics are fair and legal. The AMD suit against Intel was filed in U.S. District Court in Delaware.

The wide-ranging cases touch on Intel's dealings with many computer makers, retailers and other companies. Chuck Mulloy, the Intel spokesman, said the company has already produced 17 million pages of documents to plaintiffs as of last week.

Mr. Horwitz's letter, and a court filing by AMD, point to a series of foul-ups in saving documents. Among other things, Intel continued to operate a system that automatically deleted employees' emails every 35 days. Employees designated as likely to have relevant documents were asked to identify and move them to avoid the automatic document purge. The company in October 2005 also began creating backup tapes of emails once a week from those employees as a last resort if there were lapses in individuals' data-retention efforts.

A number of problems arose, Intel said. For example, some employees failed to move emails that they created from their "sent" folders, so those documents were automatically deleted. The company said it also failed to notify all of slightly more than 1,000 employees on a timely basis about their duty to retain documents.

AMD, in its filing, attacked the underlying "honor system" of allowing employees to police what could be potentially incriminating communications, adding that "Intel executives at the highest level failed to receive or to heed instructions essential for the preservation of their records." The filing adds: "Everything that could have gone wrong did go wrong."

AMD's filing stops short of accusing Intel of deliberately destroying evidence. But Ned Fryer, an attorney for Bryan Cave LLP who specializes in document-retention issues, notes that the U.S. Supreme Court in December issued strict new rules that could severely penalize litigants who aren't able to show they took "reasonable diligence" in preserving documents.

Fines can range up to tens of millions of dollars, Mr. Fryer said, and juries may be instructed to assume that missing files constitute negative evidence, hurting a company's chances of winning a favorable verdict. He declined to comment on the facts of the Intel-AMD flap, but suggested that courts may consider it "unreasonable to continue any policy of automatically deleting or purging emails."

The letter from Mr. Horwitz says Intel is adopting new software that will preserve emails received and sent by the employees who were previously asked to retain their documents.

Separately, AMD said it won't achieve sales of $1.6 billion to $1.7 billion in the period ending March 31, as projected. On average, analysts polled by Thomson Financial had forecast first-quarter revenue of $1.66 billion.

The Sunnyvale, Calif., company, which had grabbed about a quarter of the microprocessor market by the fourth quarter, has faced much stiffer competition from Intel since summer. Hector Ruiz, AMD's chief executive, said at a Morgan Stanley conference that AMD overestimated demand from big computer makers.

Intel Admits Lapse In Document Preservation (CNET)

By Tom Krazit, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, March 6, 2007

E-mails related to Advanced Micro Devices' antitrust case against its chipmaking rival might be lost forever because of human error.

Intel disclosed Monday that it has failed to preserve some documents related to Advanced Micro Devices' antitrust suit against it--and AMD pounced on the admission.

Santa Clara, Calif.-based Intel said human error allowed documents--mainly e-mails--to slip through the cracks of a document-retention system put in place after AMD sued Intel in June 2005. AMD alleged that the larger chipmaker used the selective distribution of rebates to prevent certain customers from using AMD's chips.

"Intel is taking this matter very seriously. It very much regrets this happened," the company said in a letter to U.S. District Court Judge Joseph Farnan, who is overseeing the case. Intel and AMD are scheduled to attend a status conference on the case later this week, and will discuss the issue.

"The paradoxical result in a lot of these situations is that the company is worse off than what the document would have shown, because people assume the worst."

--Marc Ostrau, antitrust attorney

AMD was quick to respond to Intel's disclosure. "Through what appears to be a combination of gross communication failures, an ill-conceived plan of document retention and lackluster oversight by outside counsel, Intel has apparently allowed evidence to be destroyed," AMD said in a filing Monday with the U.S. District Court in Delaware.

The day after AMD filed suit, Intel preserved the data on its network, and later sent notices asking about 600 employees to retain specific information, the company said in its letter to Farnan. However, it did not instruct those employees to preserve e-mails from their "sent" folders, and since Intel automatically erases e-mails older than a few weeks or months--depending on the employee--those messages could be gone.

The company also failed to send document-retention notices to employees identified in 2006 as additional targets for the document-retention policy, despite having put them on such a list. And despite having preserved data on its network after the complaint was filed, the company has identified "a small number of backup tapes" in its Munich offices that were erased.

Intel thinks it can assemble some of the missing documents by combing through other documents it has already preserved, said Chuck Mulloy, an Intel spokesman. For example, sent e-mails likely received a reply that was preserved in the sender's inbox, or other Intel employees on the list might have been copied on the sent e-mail and it would have appeared in their inbox.

Also, many of the e-mails in question might have been preserved on weekly backup tapes set up in October 2005 to capture documents from several hundred employees. However, not all the employees on the list were migrated to a special e-mail server set up for that purpose, and some of the tapes have been "recycled," Intel said in its letter.

AMD called on the judge to require Intel to produce a full accounting of its document retention policy and errors, and to investigate possible remedial action.

"Although Intel has agreed to restore all data captured in the thousands of backup tapes it made and preserved, no one can say with any degree of confidence that this will put Humpty-Dumpty back together again, particularly as to the documents of the one-third of custodians who were never placed on any type of retention until last month," AMD said in its court filing.

Because most antitrust cases are about the effects of certain behavior, and not necessarily the behavior itself, it's unlikely that AMD's case would hinge on a single document or e-mail that might be missing, said Marc Ostrau, co-chair of the antitrust practice at the Mountain View, Calif., law firm Fenwick & West. But it sure does look bad, he added.

"The paradoxical result in a lot of these situations is that the company is worse off than what the document would have shown, because people assume the worst," Ostrau said. "When in fact it may be that the documents are completely innocuous, no one can completely be sure."

Problems such as lost documents are generally rare, but occur more and more in the electronic record-keeping era, Ostrau said. "The fact is that complying with your document retention policies is really hard in this day and age," he said. In fact, Fenwick & West has a group of lawyers and technology professionals dedicated solely to managing electronic records.

Wireless Carrier Alltel Reportedly Wooing AT&T, Others (SAEN)

By Sanford Nowlin, Express-News Business Writer

San Antonio Express-News, March 6, 2007

Wireless communications provider Alltel Corp. reportedly is shopping itself to AT&T Inc. and other potential buyers, but it's unclear how likely it is to reach a deal, analysts said.

Alltel, based in Little Rock, Ark., has talked with AT&T, Verizon Communications Inc. and private equity firms about a buyout, the Wall Street Journal reported Monday. Talks for a sale of the nation's fifth-largest wireless carrier still are in early stages, the paper said, citing people familiar with the negotiations.

However, Alltel's $22 billion market value could be a significant obstacle to the deal, analysts said. Based on the company's current stock price, a bidder would need to spend $30 billion or more to close a transaction.

"It's an expensive piece of property," Frost Bank telecom analyst Le Keough said. "A company like AT&T could take that same amount of money and buy spectrum and start offering their own service in those markets. There are always going to be spectrum auctions."

An official with San Antonio-based AT&T declined comment on the Journal report.

AT&T also could have other reservations about buying Alltel, experts said.

The nation's largest phone company has expanded aggressively with a string of big buyouts. However, AT&T closed its $86 billion takeover of BellSouth Corp. late last year amid intense regulatory scrutiny and may not think another big deal would pass antitrust review.

What's more, Alltel uses a different wireless technology than AT&T, meaning the acquiring company would need to replace equipment and handsets to convert customers to its system.

Even so, analysts said, a takeover of Alltel isn't without appeal for AT&T and its largest wireless rival, Verizon. Many expected Alltel to seek a buyer once it spun off its landline phone business last year.

Alltel serves 12 million customers, mainly in small cities and rural areas, meaning one of the larger wireless companies could use it to fill in its networks. Verizon already has a deal with Alltel that allows its customers to call from its service territory without paying large roaming fees.

AT&T and Verizon also might pursue Alltel to prevent an easy purchase for a competitor, Stifel Nicolaus analyst Christopher C. King said.

"We believe neither party would want the other one to walk away with Alltel without a strong fight, thus leading to the potential for a bidding war for the asset," he said.

Memo: Microsoft Threatened To Shut Down Mac Office (COMPWRLD)

Computerworld, March 6, 2007

The threat came in 1997, as Apple struggled to regain its footing

March 05, 2007 (Computerworld) -- Microsoft Corp. threatened to dump the Macintosh version of Office 10 years ago during talks with Apple Inc. because the move would "do a great deal of harm" to its rival, according to a memo made public in a recently-settled antitrust case.

The 1997 memo from Ben Waldman, at the time the head of Microsoft's Macintosh development group, to then-CEO Bill Gates, urged Mac Office 97's release. The suite, which in June 1997 had not yet reached beta, was eventually released as Office 98 in March 1998.

But Waldman understood that the next Mac Office was a stick that could be used against Apple. "The threat to cancel Mac Office 97 is certainly the strongest bargaining point we have, as doing so will do a great deal of harm to Apple immediately. I also think that Apple is taking this threat pretty seriously," Waldman said in his e-mail to Gates.

Less than six weeks after Waldman's e-mail, Microsoft and Apple announced a deal under which the former bought $150 million of Apple stock. As part of the pact, Microsoft promised to release the next version of Office and was allowed to bundle Internet Explorer with the Mac OS. The two companies also agreed to a patent cross-licensing deal.

At the time, Apple was struggling. Steve Jobs had returned to the company only months before, and share prices were at all-time lows. The Microsoft-Apple agreement was seen by many as a bail-out of Apple by its long-time rival.

Later, the U.S. Department of Justice included the bundling of Internet Explorer among the charges it brought against Microsoft in its antitrust case. "Microsoft, by threatening to cease development of its Office for Macintosh productivity suite, coerced Apple into making Internet Explorer the default browser on all Macintosh operating systems and to disadvantage competing browsers," the federal agency charged in 1998.

Waldman also wrote in the memo -- which was revealed in the recently-settled Iowa antitrust case against Microsoft -- that keeping Mac Office alive was a good idea because the suite's users could be used as guinea pigs to test new features.

"Because Mac Office is so much less critical to our business than Windows, we have the flexibility to test out new things in the product before we try them on Windows," wrote Waldman. "I've personally also found the Mac market interesting because I've seen so many trends appear there first and eventually become important on Windows."

Waldman cited examples ranging from hard disk and memory use to user concerns over bloat in the suite.

AP, March 6, 2007

Chicago Mercantile Exchange and CBOT Shares Rise After Upgrades to "Outperform"

NEW YORK (AP) -- Shares of Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. jumped Monday, as a CreditSuisse analyst upgraded the two commodities exchanges.

Analyst Howard Chen upgraded both stocks to "Outperform" from "Neutral." CBOT, which operates the Chicago Board of Trade, accepted an $8 billion buyout offer from CME in October. Shareholders will vote on the deal April 4. Chen said the future CME Group Inc. will benefit from recent market volatility due to its diverse products.

CME is the world's largest exchange trade, while CBOT is the main U.S. bond market. The Department of Justice is reviewing the deal.

"We expect continued market uncertainty surrounding the health of the emerging markets, sub-prime consumer credit worries and domestic inflation to drive near-term upside in U.S. futures volumes," Chen said.

Chen added that CBOT has improved its earning power since the deal was announced, but that the improvement has not been priced in. He raised his price target for CBOT shares to $190 from $169, and for CME shares to $650 per share from $580.

CME shares rose $19.71, or 3.7 percent, to $560 in afternoon trading, and CBOT shares gained $5.30, or 3.3 percent, to $165.80. Both exchanges trade on the New York Stock Exchange.

Areva Gets European Antitrust Approval On Repower Bid (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Brian Mcgee

Bloomberg, March 6, 2007

March 5 (Bloomberg) -- Areva SA, the world's biggest maker of nuclear power plants, won European Union antitrust approval for its 600 million-euro ($786 million) bid for German wind turbine-maker Repower Systems AG.

The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, announced the approval today after reviewing the transaction under a simplified procedure.

Suzlon Energy Ltd., India's biggest builder of wind turbines, on Feb. 9 offered 1.02 billion euros ($1.34 billion) for the German company, or 20 percent more than Areva's earlier bid. Repower's management is ``interested'' in the offer, Suzlon said March 2. Alstom hasn't raised its price.

Tulsi Tanti, Suzlon's chairman, is ``quite confident'' that the bid will be successful, he said on a conference call last week. The offer is being made together with Martifer, a unit of Portuguese builder Mota-Engil SGPS SA that already owns a quarter of Repower. Areva would be a ``fitting strategic partner,'' the German company said on Feb. 19 without endorsing either offer.

Shares of Areva closed down 34.4 euros, or 5 percent, at 648.5 euros today in Paris, while Repower fell 2.28 euros, or 1.7 percent, to 134 euros in Frankfurt. Stock markets across Europe extended last week's declines today amid concern a four-year rally in equity markets is endangered by slowing U.S. economic growth.

Suzlon stock closed down 63.5 rupees, or 6 percent, at 988.25 rupees today on the Bombay Stock Exchange.

One Careful Owner: Why Daimler Is Keeping Its Options Open As Rivals Eye The Troubled Chrysler (FT)

By John Reed And Bernard Simon

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

For the three weeks since DaimlerChrysler raised the prospect of decoupling the Detroit end of the US-German carmaker, merger talk, fevered rumours and even conspiracy theories have proliferated in an industry that has seen no large-scale tie-ups or dramatic partings since General Motors and Fiat severed their alliances in 2005.

The Stuttgart group's revelation that, after nine years, "all options are on the table" for Chrysler was accompanied by the disclosure of a $1.4bn (€1.07bn, £728m) loss at the US unit last year - and the decision was not sudden. People familiar with the situation have told the Financial Times that DaimlerChrysler made the announcement on its lawyers' recommendation, because of advanced talks on Chrysler's future.

JPMorgan Chase had already been advising on options that are said to include a sale in full or part, or a flotation. It also emerged that the bank had contacted several private equity houses, which are in discussion with others including Wolfgang Bernhard, former Chrysler chief operating officer, about a possible consortium bid.

Perhaps most intriguingly, Fritz Henderson, GM's chief financial officer, has assembled a task team to explore a possible alliance between the world's largest carmaker and its crosstown rival. According to people close to the process, DaimlerChrysler has considered the idea of accepting a stakeholding in GM as payment for part or all of Chrysler.

If implemented, the solution would be financially expedient for the cash-strapped GM. It would also be politically smart for DaimlerChrysler, which would not want to be seen as having dumped its US unit unceremoniously.

Details of the links between Chrysler and GM or the topics discussed remain sketchy, as neither company will even confirm publicly that they are in contact. Dieter Zetsche, DaimlerChrysler's chief executive, told investors in London last week he hoped the strategic exercise at Chrysler, on which he did not elaborate, would be concluded quickly.

However, there are reasons for scepticism that any investor - whether GM, another industry player, the public markets or even deal-hungry private equity - would want to take on Chrysler's sprawling North American business and related baggage, including unfunded healthcare liabilities of around $18bn.

GM is immersed in its own restructuring programme and some Wall Street analysts think it has too many brands of its own to concentrate on already. Rod Lache, analyst at Deutsche Bank, notes that GM has recently sold off stakes in its GMAC finance arm, Fiat, Suzuki, Isuzu and Subaru and is focusing its business. Acquiring more brands and unionised workers "would appear counter-productive", he says.

A writer on GM's FastLane blog was more emotional last week, begging: "Please don't waste more precious product development money and timeon acquiring another failingcompany."

After Daimler's own vexed efforts to extract value from its relationship with Chrysler, many industry insiders are baffled or amused by the notion of another big-time car alliance. Several companies, including Fiat, Volks-wagen and Hyundai, have publicly disavowed any interest in Chrysler. Still, the reports are causing excitement in an industry where executives yearn for a quick fix for rising costs and intensifying competition. The topic is likely to dominate this week's Geneva International Motor Show, one of the automotive industry's biggest events.

Nor has the lack of concrete information on what is being discussed stopped analysts from running the numbers. A potential full-blown combination of GM and Chrysler would enjoy about a 36 per cent US market share for light vehicles - comparable to what GM enjoyed in the late 1990s and probably enough to permit it to defend its position against the expansive Toyota as the world's biggest carmaker.

It would create obvious cost savings in the white-collar jobs that could be cut by merging the two nearby head offices. It would be palatable for US public opinion and would probably pass muster with antitrust regulators, given Chrysler's and GM's diminishing US market share. "There are significant synergies, particularly over three to five years, that could make this company stronger," says John Hoffecker of AlixPartners, a Detroit-based consultancy.

Together, the two companies would enjoy greater leverage with the United Auto Workers union, allowing them to bargain for cuts in the labour costs that impair their ability to compete with foreign "transplants" - the American factories operated by groups such as Toyota. With closely watched talks on labour contracts expected to start this summer, the prospect of Chrysler being taken over by GM or others has turned up the heat on the UAW to give ground. Chrysler has estimated that its healthcare bill alone adds $1,400 to the cost of producing each US vehicle.

If a potential buyer can be shielded from Chrysler's un-funded healthcare liabilities, Chrysler could be "the cheapest car company in the world", concludes Adam Jonas, a Morgan Stanley analyst. He cites Chrysler's flexible assembly plants, lean workforce and iconic Jeep brand among its attractions; Chrysler also has a valuable financing arm. At Citigroup, John Lawson calls GM "a natural Chrysler acquirer" and estimates GM could create $9bn in value by extending its current turnround plan to include Chrysler assets should it take over the unit for free and stripped of its liabilities. "Chrysler commands a significant part of the US vehicle market," says Mr Lawson. "The question for new owners is whether they can turn around the business faster than incumbent management, or extract better concessions from the workforce."

There are many reasons to doubt that GM, at least, could. It is hard to see what Chrysler, with more than 90 per cent of its sales in North America, would offer the bigger company at a time when it is seeking to lower its dependence on the domestic market. Perhaps the biggest task would be rationalising their dealerships - 10,000 in all, selling 11 different brands. Toyota has roughly the same market share as Chrysler but fewer than half the number of dealers.

GM and Chrysler, like the rival Ford Motor, are trying to pare their dealer networks. But rationalisation is costly, as GM learnt five years ago when it discontinued the Oldsmobile brand and many states restrict the closing or merging of dealerships. Many dealers are wealthy and well-connected entrepreneurs and they are known for their political clout.

Uniting the two companies would also require some painful and costly choices about vehicles: with a handful of exceptions, Chrysler's model line-up offers little that GM does not already have. Chrysler's biggest drawcard for GM would be its minivans, which are leaders in a segment that GM itself is discontinuing. However, GM's Chevrolet Silverado and Chrysler's Dodge Ram pick-up trucks are each company's top-selling model and compete directly in this crucial segment: a combined company would find it hard to rationalise production of these without jeopardising the brand or upsetting dealers.

Both companies are also in the throes of updating an iconic muscle car, the Chevrolet Camaro for GM and the Dodge Challenger for Chrysler. "Overlap is good for the back office, but it's not good for products," notes Chris Hibbs, head of the UK automotive practice for PwC, the consultants.

For all these reasons, a GM-Chrysler deal - if it comes off at all - may be a co-operation agreement on one or more products rather than a full-fledged merger or group-wide alliance. Indeed, the industry norm these days is for ad hoc partnerships based on individual cars, components, or technologies (see below left).

DaimlerChrysler might prefer to cut a deal with private equity, which is already transforming the automotive parts industry. A group led by Appaloosa Management and Cerberus Capital Management is, for example, likely to emerge as the biggest shareholder at Delphi, America's leading motor components maker.

Cerberus, which was among those contacted by JPMorgan about Chrysler, has been taking an active role in talks with the UAW and other unions to whittle down Delphi's employee costs. The funds' interest in the automotive sector is clear, as they have recruited several prominent former car industry executives to their ranks.

In an industry where national pride or pressure from unions or political interests can constrain management, private equity investors would be more unsentimental and could thus, in theory at least, generate better returns. "Having a private equity infusion would probably cause better discipline and waste to be eliminated in order to make the company profitable, says Neil De Koker, president of the US Original Equipment Suppliers Association. "We need healthy customers to survive."

Few doubt that private equity firms could raise the money to buy Chrysler, whose value stripped of its employee-benefit deficits is estimated by analysts at between $3bn and $7bn. The bigger question is whether they or anyone else want a US-focused carmaker with all its problems, led by a heavily unionised workforce and a product line-up skewed heavily towards large gas-guzzling vehicles.

Some in the industry speculate that Daimler's February 14 announcement was intended primarily to pressure the UAW (and possibly Chrysler's own management) into making the unit a leaner operation. On the other side of the Atlantic, they add, Mr Zetsche may also have been seeking to placate shareholders and German unions frustrated with the group's losses in America.

Daimler does indeed appear to be keeping all options open, including that of continued life as a merged company. It is taking charges of €1bn on its 2007 earnings for the "recovery and transformation plan" that will see Chrysler reduce its staff by 13,000, or about 16 per cent, over the next three years, and benefit from an investment of $3bn in new engines, transmission and axles.

A leaner and better-run Chrysler will, by its own account, be ready for a "product offensive" of more than 20 new and 13 refreshed vehicles by 2009.

This would leave Chrysler looking good, even if it stays under the Daimler wing, says Cit-i-group's Mr Lawson. "By the end of 2008, Chrysler could have the most youthful line-up of all the volume players in the US market, the transplants included."

Microsoft Attacks Google On Copyright (FT)

By John Gapper In New York

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Microsoft on Tuesday launches a fierce attack on Google over its “cavalier” approach to copyright, accusing the internet company of exploiting books, music, films and television programmes without permission.

Tom Rubin, associate general counsel for Microsoft, will say in a speech in New York that while authors and publishers find it hard to cover costs, “companies that create no content of their own, and make money solely on the back of other people’s content, are raking in billions through advertising and initial public offerings”.

Mr Rubin’s remarks, presaged in an article in Tuesday’s Financial Times, come as Google faces criticism and legal pressure from media companies over services allowing users to search online for books, films, television programmes and news. Viacom, the US media group, instructed YouTube, which Google owns, to remove 100,000 clips of copyright material.

The Authors Guild and a group of publishers backed by the Association of American Publishers have separately sued Google for making digital copies of copyrighted books from libraries without permission.

Mr Rubin will tell the AAP’s annual meeting that Google’s decision to take digital copies of all books in various library collections, unless publishers tell it not to, “systematically violates copyright, deprives authors and publishers of an important avenue for monetising their works and, in doing so, undermines incentives to create”.

He will say Google is breaching copyright law because it has “bestowed upon itself the unilateral right to make entire copies of copyrighted books”. Google thinks it is acting legally because it publishes only “snippets” of copyrighted works unless it has the publisher’s permission.

But Mr Rubin will say in Tuesday’s speech: “Google is saying to you and other copyright owners: ‘Trust us, you’re protected. We’ll keep the digital copies secure. We’ll only show snippets. We won’t harm you, we’ll promote you’.

“But . . . anyone who visits YouTube . . . will immediately recognise that it follows a similar cavalier approach to copyright.”

Microsoft is trying to differentiate itself from Google by portraying itself as more sympathetic to copyright holders than Google, and has sent a letter to executives of big media conglomerates, offering to work with them to eliminate piracy from Soapbox, a new video service on MSN.

Patricia Schroeder, AAP president, said it had agreed to work with Microsoft and others to develop principles on responsible book search.

Google said it believed it was acting legally and ethically in providing snippets of in-copyright books and added that it removed books promptly when contacted by publishers. It said it generated more than $3.3bn of advertising revenues for other internet sites last year, which showed that it did not simply exploit the content of others.

Citigroup Pursues Control Of Nikko Cordial (WSJ)

By Andrew Morse

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

TOKYO -- Citigroup Inc. was poised to announce a tender offer to acquire more than 50% of Nikko Cordial Corp., a person familiar with the situation said. The prospective deal, which could be valued at as much as $5 billion, would be the biggest acquisition of a Japanese brokerage company by a foreign company.

Though the sides were close to an agreement, terms of a deal hadn't been finalized, the person said.

Such a move would come as Tokyo-based Nikko Cordial looks to shore up its business, which has been hurt by an accounting scandal that erupted last December. An internal investigation by the brokerage firm, Japan's third-largest by revenue, revealed that it had inflated its earnings for two years, prompting an exodus of clients.

In a statement, Nikko Cordial said "negotiations [with Citigroup] are being carried out from various perspectives."

New York-based Citigroup and Nikko Cordial have long-standing ties. Citigroup recapitalized Nikko Cordial in 1998 and the two companies formed a joint venture investment bank, Nikko Cititgroup Ltd., which handles mergers-and-acquisitions advice and equity and debt underwritings. Citigroup still owns a little less than 5% of Nikko Cordial.

Taking control of Nikko Cordial would give Citigroup a huge presence in Japan, the world's second-largest economy. Nikko Cordial has a network of 109 branches across the country.

Owning the brokerage might also help polish Citigroup's reputation with individual Japanese. While Citigroup retail banking operations are flourishing here, it stumbled in 2004 when regulators pulled its private banking license amid a host of compliance problems.

Nikko Cordial shares jumped 14.3% to 1,347 yen ($11.52) amid speculation a bid was imminent.

Blackstone Buys Madame Tussauds Chain (WP)

By David Cho

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Private-equity giant Blackstone Group said yesterday that it had created the world's second-largest theme park group, behind Walt Disney Co., with its $1.9 billion buyout of Madame Tussauds waxworks museums.

Madame Tussauds will be managed by Merlin Entertainments Group, which is controlled by Blackstone. The combined company said it will operate 50 theme parks throughout the world, including Legoland, Sea Life and the London Eye. They drew more than 30 million visitors in 2006, second only to Disney's parks.

The move by Blackstone is part of an aggressive push into the theme park business that began two years ago with its acquisition of Merlin, an international theme park company, for $187 million. It then backed Merlin's purchase of the Legoland chain later in 2005 and Gardaland, Italy's biggest theme park, last fall.

Blackstone, one of the largest private-equity firms in the world, also was a member of the group that bought Universal Studios in Orlando and is an investor in Six Flags theme parks. Last month Blackstone made a huge splash by closing the biggest buyout deal ever when it purchased Equity Office Properties Trust for $39 billion.

Merlin executives said they planned to focus on expanding the wax museum company, which has 14 million visitors a year and operates six museums around the world, as well as other theme parks, hotels and a castle in Europe. It recently bought the London Eye, a giant observatory in that city and one of England's most popular attractions.

"The combined group . . . has the resources and expertise to focus on accelerating current expansion plans for all the brands, particularly in North America," Merlin's chief executive, Nick Varney, said.

A new Madame Tussauds wax museum is scheduled to open this October in the old Woodward & Lothrop department store building on the corner of 10th and F streets NW. The $16 million project will include replicas of the Constitution and Declaration of Independence as well as likenesses of presidents and other newsmakers. Visitors also will be able to visit a replica of the Oval Office and be greeted by a wax version of Abraham Lincoln.

Another new museum is slated to open in Hollywood in 2008.

Tussauds, a private company, was purchased for $1.5 billion in May 2005 by Dubai International Capital. Dubai International will receive just shy of $2 billion in cash in the deal and retain a 20 percent stake in the company.

A&P Reaches Pathmark Deal (PHI)

By Harold Brubaker

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 6, 2007

The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. Inc., the owner of Super Fresh, said yesterday that it had agreed to buy rival Pathmark Stores Inc. in a deal worth up to $1.3 billion, including the assumption of debt. The cash and stock portion of the deal was $689.7 million.

The combined company would have 54 stores in the eight-county Philadelphia region with more than $1 billion in annual sales, making it the third-largest supermarket chain here behind Acme Markets Inc. and ShopRite Group P.L.C.

The Pathmark banner - which has a strong presence in urban neighborhoods - will remain, said executives at Great Atlantic, which is best known for its A&P stores.

"We don't plan to eliminate any stores. Their stores are highly productive," Christian Haub, executive chairman of A&P, of Montvale, N.J., said during a conference call with analysts. Pathmark is based in Carteret, N.J.

The deal is subject to review by the Federal Trade Commission and shareholder approval.

A&P said it expected the merged companies to cut $150 million in annual expenses within two years, but industry observers were skeptical about the combination of the two struggling chains.

"It will be a challenge, given that neither one has a leadership position," said Richard George, a professor of food marketing at St. Joseph's University, whose Haub School of Business is named after Erivan K. Haub, Christian Haub's father.

Christian Haub was optimistic that the proposed deal would pass a review by the FTC, which examines mergers from an antitrust perspective.

Dutch company Royal Ahold N.V. tried to buy Pathmark in 1999, but backed out after the FTC demanded the sale of a large number of stores to maintain competitive markets.

"The market has changed so dramatically in the past eight years," Haub said. "Food is not predominantly bought in just supermarkets anymore," he said.

Haub cited the emergence of Trader Joe's Co. Inc. and Whole Foods Market Inc., the proliferation of dollar stores, and the merger of drugstore chains as factors that have changed the market. Furthermore, he said, the region served by A&P and Pathmark is one of the few where all three major warehouse clubs - Sam's Club, Costco Wholesale Corp., and BJ's Wholesale Club Inc. - compete.

An antitrust expert said he was confident that the FTC would look at the proposed acquisition carefully. "The FTC will want to know what new chains or additional food retailers have come into Long Island and North Jersey," said James Fishkin, a partner in Dechert L.L.P.'s Washington office who worked at the FTC for 15 years before entering private practice in 2002. He worked on the FTC review of Ahold's proposed purchase of Pathmark.

Karen Short, an equity analyst with Friedman Billings Ramsey Group Inc., estimated that A&P might have to sell 25 to 35 stores to gain antitrust approval. She said the focus would be on North Jersey and Long Island.

The merged company would become the largest operator of supermarkets in Philadelphia, with 14. That would surpass ShopRite, which has 11, and Acme, which has 10.

Overall, the deal forms a chain with $11 billion in sales and 550 stores, mostly from Connecticut to Washington. Pathmark shareholders will receive $9 a share in cash and 0.12963 shares of A&P for each Pathmark share. A&P is also assuming or retiring Pathmark debt, bringing the total value of the acquisition to $1.3 billion, the company said.

Shares in both companies rose yesterday. Pathmark's shares gained $1.21, or 10.8 percent, to $12.46, while A&P's shares were up $1.64, or 5.3 percent, at $32.50.

Last year, A&P bought six Clemens Family Markets Inc. and converted them into Super Fresh stores, marking the chain's first growth in the region in about a decade. "They've slowly been picking up," said Eric Claus, A&P's president and chief executive officer.

Alaskan Bridge Projects Resist Earmarks Purge (NYT)

By William Yardley

Long after Congress removed about $450 million in budget earmarks for two bridges in the Alaskan exurbs, the fight over whether to build them is not dead.

Mocked as “bridges to nowhere” by critics who saw them as the epitome of Congressional excess, preparations for the projects have been slowly moving forward even as big questions remain over whether the bridges will be built.

When Congress removed the earmarks for the bridges in 2005, it still gave the state the money, but it allowed Alaskan officials to decide how to spend it. The state reserved about $200 million for the proposed bridges, far less than the construction costs but enough to show that there was serious intent to complete the projects. Some environmental and planning work has already been done.

Supporters of one of the bridges, the Knik Arm Crossing, are expected to get the proposal included in Anchorage’s long-range city transportation plan in April.

The agency charged with building the bridge, a private-public partnership, is courting private investors for a toll-driven, for-profit venture. If built, the Knik bridge — which has been discussed since before statehood in 1959 — could cost about $1 billion beyond the approximately $110 million the project has received from Congress.

"If we can't sell this to Wall Street, then we're just going to pack up and go home," said Gordon Keith, director of the central region for the Alaska Department of Transportation and Public Facilities and a board member of the agency trying to build the Knik Arm Crossing.

Five hundred miles away, on the remote, spruce-spiked island of Gravina in southeast Alaska, construction is set to begin this summer on three and a half miles of roads that are intended to connect the island's airport and its 50 residents to the other proposed bridge, a 200-foot-high arc over the Tongass Narrows to the city of Ketchikan.

That bridge could make the current route to the airport, a five-minute ferry ride, obsolete. For now, the road and causeway construction are continuing, at a cost of $26 million, even as the bridge budget has ballooned to nearly $400 million and its prospects remain uncertain. The money for the road construction was included in an earmark that was not cut.

Representative Mark Steven Kirk, a Republican from Illinois who last year sponsored a measure to strip all federal financing for the bridges, said "Whoa!" when told of the money being spent on the Gravina road work. "Our work to end taxpayer support for this isn't finished yet," Mr. Kirk said. His bill passed the House but was not adopted by the Senate.

"The jury has decided that this is not an appropriate use of federal funds," he said. "In the end, I don't think there's a good way to spend the money in Alaska. In the long run, this is money that could go to other projects around the country, nearly all which would serve more than 50 people."

Regardless of the ridicule about the bridges as a pork-barrel binge, there are political facts that have kept hope alive for those who believe the projects are necessary for Alaska to grow economically.

To direct the federal financing to other projects, for example, would require action by Gov. Sarah Palin, a Republican, and the State Legislature. It would also mean undoing the work of the powerful Congressional delegation, led by Senator Ted Stevens and Representative Don Young, both Republicans, who secured the money for the bridges.

"No way in the world am I going to put myself in that position," said Mayor Joe Williams of Ketchikan Gateway Borough. "These guys were put through the wringer."

He added, referring to Mr. Young, "I may talk about it 10 years after he's dead and gone, but no way in the world am I going to do that now. I'm supporting that man because he supported us. That would be like going to Dad and talking about something Dad asked us to do and we didn't do it. That's not a good idea."

Mr. Williams said he believed the state overestimated the cost of the Gravina bridge because it would rather build other projects, including some closer to Juneau, the capital.

Mal Menzies, director for the southeast region of the state transportation department, noted that Ms. Palin had not included more money for Gravina in her proposed budget and that state planners were simply dealing in reality.

"I think the community is starting to see that the money for this project is not there," Mr. Menzies said. "They could be open to smaller bridges, but the problem is we don't even have the monies for the smaller bridges yet."

In Anchorage, some express a similar view about the Knik Arm Crossing.

"Originally it was a gift," said Jon R. Spring, a transportation planner with the Anchorage Traffic Department. "It was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity because we had these powerful congressmen. Well, that's no longer a rationale. Now it's a question of does it still make sense?"

The project has plenty of critics who worry it will add congestion to downtown Anchorage and encourage sprawl around Point MacKenzie, the largely empty area across the water to which the bridge would lead. Opponents also worry that the efforts to secure private financing will fail and that supporters will seek more government help, potentially undercutting financing for projects like a downtown highway link.

In Ketchikan, many people could not care less whether they get a new bridge. Yet the preliminary work planned for Gravina, part of an earlier earmark that was not removed, stirs hope for those who say they worry about the future in a region where people have been departing ever since the timber industry began to fade. In 2005, the borough population was 13,262, down from 14,070 in 2000.

“The bridge to nowhere is the bridge to the future for our kids,” Mr. Williams said, “because it is developable property and it is available to the borough for families to buy property and build their own home.”

But even without a bridge right away, the new roads on the island could help lure a large manufacturer or a residential developer, he said. “One day in the future,” Mr. Williams said, “we’ll have to have a bridge, to accommodate those folks.”

Global Warming Labeled A 'Scam' (WT)

By Al Webb

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

LONDON -- With a packet of claims that are almost certain to defy conventional wisdom, a television documentary to be aired in Britain this week condemns man-made global warming as a myth that has become "the biggest scam of modern times."

The program titled "The Great Global Warming Scandal" and set for screening by TV Channel 4 on Thursday dismisses claims that high levels of greenhouse gases generated by human activity causes climate change. Instead, the program suggests that the sun itself is the real culprit.

The documentary, directed by filmmaker Martin Durkin, is at odds with scientific opinion as outlined in a United Nations report in February, which blames mankind for global warming.

In his program, Mr. Durkin rejects the concept of man-made climate change, calling it "a lie ... the biggest scam of modern times."

The truth, he says, is that global warming "is a multibillion-dollar worldwide industry, created by fanatically anti-industrial environmentalists, supported by scientists peddling scare stories to chase funding, and propped up by compliant politicians and the media."

Channel 4 says that the program features "an impressive roll-call of experts," including nine professors, who are experts in climatology, oceanography, meteorology, biogeography and paleoclimatology.

It also says the experts come from prestigious institutions such as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Pasteur Institute in Paris, the Danish National Space Center and universities and other schools in London, Ottawa, Jerusalem, Alabama, Virginia and Winnipeg, Canada.

"It's very rare that a film changes history," says Martin Durkin, "but I think this is a turning point, and in five years the idea that the greenhouse effect is the main reason behind global warming will be seen as total bunk," he says.

"Al Gore might have won an Oscar," says Mr. Durkin, in a preview of the documentary, "but the film is very misleading, and he has got the relationship between [carbon dioxide] and climate change the wrong way around."

One of the filmmaker's experts, paleontologist professor Ian Clark of the University of Ottawa, says that global warming could be caused by increased activity on the sun, such as massive eruptions, and that ice-core samples from Antarctica show that, in fact, warmer periods in Earth's history have come about 800 years before rises in carbon dioxide levels.

Mr. Clark's findings appear to contradict the work of other scientists, who have used similar ice-core samples to illustrate that raised levels of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere have accompanied the various global warming periods.

"The fact is that [carbon dioxide] has no proven link to global temperatures," says Mr. Durkin. "Solar activity is far more likely to be the culprit."

Scientists in the Channel 4 documentary cite what they claim is another discrepancy involving conventional research, saying that most of the recent global warming occurred before 1940, after which temperatures around the world fell for four decades.

Mr. Durkin's skeptical specialists view this as a flaw in the official view, because the worldwide economic boom that followed the end of World War II produced more carbon dioxide, and therefore should have meant a rise in global temperatures -- something he says did not happen.

"The Great Global Warming Swindle" also questions an assertion by the U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change's report, published last month, that it was backed by some 2,500 of the world's leading scientists.

Another of Mr. Durkin's professors, Paul Reiter of Paris' Pasteur Institute, an expert in malaria, calls the U.N. report a "sham" because, he says, it included the names of scientists -- including his own -- who disagreed with the report and who resigned from the panel.

"That is how they make it seem that all the top scientists are agreed," he says. "It's not true."

Mr. Reiter says his name was removed only after he threatened legal action against the panel. The report itself, he adds, was finalized by government appointees.

Yet another expert in the Durkin documentary, Philip Stott, professor emeritus of biogeography at the School of Oriental and African Studies in London, is more circumspect.

"The [climate] system is too complex to say exactly what the effect of cutting back on [carbon dioxide] production would be or, indeed, of continuing to produce [carbon dioxide]."

"The greenhouse effect theory worried me from the start," Mr. Stott says, "because you can't say that just one factor can have this effect."

"At the moment, there is almost a McCarthyism movement in science where the greenhouse effect is like a puritanical religion, and this is dangerous," he says.

Austin American-Statesman, March 6, 2007

Fourteen People Face Federal Charges

Austin police say 14 members of a heroin-trafficking organization have been indicted after a nearly two-year investigation.

Police said in a written statement that in mid-2005, the department's Organized Crime Narcotic Conspiracy Unit began investigating three brothers — Henry Castro, 30, Rene Gaitan Castro, 35, and Randy Gaitan Castro, 24, for suspected heroin trafficking.

The Drug Enforcement Administration and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms later joined in the investigation, and Austin police said officers "made repeated seizures of heroin packaged within balloons for distribution, as well as seizures of 'black tar' heroin that had not been processed for distribution."

On Feb. 20, a federal grand jury indicted 14 members of the organization on a charge of conspiracy to distribute one kilogram or more of heroin, police said.

On Feb. 28, the three brothers were arrested along with five other people, police said. The other six people named in the indictments were already in custody, police said.

The investigation comes on the heels of another major heroin trafficking case, police said. In November, a federal judge sentenced 17 members of the so-called "Celedon" heroin trafficking organization. Fifteen received prison terms, while two received probation. Louis Celedon Jr., 31, received a 20-year prison sentence.

"These two long-term, time-intensive investigations provided information that the Castro and Celedon organizations were responsible for a significant amount of the heroin that is distributed within Austin and the surrounding areas," police said.

14 Indicted, Arrested In Austin Heroin Trafficking Probe (KVUE)

By Rudy Koski, KVUE News

KVUE-TV, March 6, 2007

Fourteen people face charges of trying to sell heroin. Austin police say the group was an organized crime ring.

Some of the seized heroin was found in balloons.

In late 2005, a drug operation based in Southeast Austin was shut down. Investigators say that success opened the door for the Castro brothers. At that time undercover agents were wrapping up a crackdown on the Celedon drug family. That is when, according to investigators, three young brothers decided to move in and take over what the Celedon family lost. The group, police say, was lead by Henry, Rene and Randy Castro.

"They may have been low level distributors, prior to the arrest of the first family, and when that first family got tagged, they just moved up and take over their territory." Said APD Commander Harold Piatt.

According to Piatt, who runs APD's Organized Crime Division, a local and federal operation was launched targeting the Castro family. As part of several undercover operations, officers obtained a large amount of heroin.

According to a federal indictment, the Castro drug business from Mexico to North Texas. According to Cmdr. Piatt. "They dealt in marijuana, heroin, cocaine, you pretty much name it, they were doing it."

According to investigators, the Castro operation did not last very long. Along with the brothers, 11, others were taken into custody.

Austin's Biggest Heroin Dealers Busted (KTCB)

KTCB-TV, March 5, 2007

AUSTIN -- Austin Police say the city's biggest heroin dealers are out of business and behind bars. The bust is a result of a long term joint operation with the federal government.

Police say 14 people were involved with selling and distributing black-tar heroin or heroin from Mexico. APD's Organized Crime Narcotic Conspiracy Unit started investigating 30-year-old Henry Castro and his two brothers for heroin trafficking activities back in 2005.

The Drug Enforcement Administration and the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, and Firearms were also part of the investigation. As a result, a federal grand jury indicted James Lara and 13 other members of the Castro organization last month. Police say the Castro members came into power after another lengthy joint operation busted

"Once we knock down a major supplier, then somebody else pops up into the picture and just picks up where they left off. They already got a ready made base of clientele," said Cmdr. Harold Piatt with APD's Organized Crime Unit.

By Nicholas Confessore And Serge F. Kovaleski

ALBANY, March 5 — Eleven people accused of playing a role in a nationwide illegal prescription drug ring were arraigned here on Monday, part of what prosecutors said was a broadening investigation into the recreational use of steroids and human growth hormone.

Four of the 11 were owners or executives of Signature Pharmacy of Orlando, Fla., who were arrested in a raid last Tuesday. P. David Soares, the Albany County district attorney, described them as the "drug dealers" of the network and said it is now believed that Signature earned more than $40 million selling prescription drugs over the Internet.

The other suspects worked at three Florida companies that Mr. Soares said served as distributors, connecting Signature with customers in Albany County and across the country, and were arrested in recent days.

All 11 suspects have pleaded not guilty.

"We were able to take down one of the country's largest pharmaceutical, steroid and human growth hormone distribution centers," Mr. Soares said on at a news conference on Monday.

Mr. Soares named two other men as unindicted co-conspirators in the case. One of them, Victor Martinez, 33, won the Arnold Classic bodybuilding competition on Saturday. His prizes included a check for $130,000 and a $20,000 Audemars Piguet watch. Mr. Soares said he was linked to the Anti-Aging Centers, a clinic in Nanuet, N.Y., an alleged distributor for Signature's drugs.

"We are now living in a very competitive environment when you're talking about the world of sports — a competitive environment that is fostered by incredible economic reward," Mr. Soares said. "This is what is fueling this industry."

He added, "If you see Victor Martinez, please let him know that the Albany County district attorney would like to talk to him."

Reached Monday night by telephone, Mr. Martinez said that he had bought testosterone from the Anti-Aging Centers after the clinic told him he had low testosterone levels, and that the company had later tried to "to lure me into becoming a partner."

"Nothing was ever signed; nothing was ever agreed upon," said Mr. Martinez, who said he had already met with investigators. "I didn't trust them, and other people were warning me not to do business with them."

Mr. Soares confirmed that professional athletes were among the drug ring's customers and that he had agreed to meet with representatives from Major League Baseball and the National Football League.

According to a law enforcement official familiar with the investigation, two people affiliated with Anti-Aging Centers are expected to surrender to the authorities on Tuesday.

Meanwhile, two of the principals of Applied Pharmacy Services Inc. in Mobile, Ala., were in Albany late last week to make themselves available to investigators. Law enforcement officials have said that the two men had been named in sealed indictments handed up by an Albany County grand jury.

But according to a person familiar with the situation, Mr. Soares's office told a lawyer for the two company officers last week that it would contact them when it was prepared to do so.

Michael L. Koenig, an Albany lawyer representing the men, would say only, "My clients are fully prepared to voluntarily turn themselves in if and when they are asked to do so."

Mr. Soares said that the investigation had unearthed dozens of other potential suspects, but whether they would be prosecuted "will depend entirely on those people and their desire to come forward and assist the people in eradicating this problem from our state and from the rest of the United States."

Eleven Plead Not Guilty In Online Steroids Ring (AP)

ALBANY, N.Y. — Eleven people connected to a Florida pharmacy at the center of a nationwide investigation into the illegal sale of steroids pleaded not guilty Monday, a growing case that has linked the online drug network to doctors and health care centers in at least three states.

Robert Stanley Loomis and wife Naomi, the owners of Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, were arrested last Tuesday during a raid in which police confiscated truck loads of drugs and other evidence. Both are registered pharmacists in Florida. Robert Loomis' brother, pharmacist Kenneth Michael Loomis, and Kirk Calvert, Signature's marketing director, also were charged.

The four are charged with 20 counts each of criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud.

Each posted bail of $30,000. All four shuffled into court, dressed in jail jumpsuits, handcuffed and shackled.

"We hope to have them home as soon as we can so they can be with their kids," said Dawn Tingley, the Florida lawyer representing the Loomises and Calvert.

Claire Denise Godfrey, a doctor at an anti-aging clinic in Orlando, pleaded not guilty to 10 counts related to the criminal sale of a controlled substance. She posted $20,000 bail.

Godfrey's name was mentioned in an indictment filed two weeks ago in a federal case charging the owner of a New Jersey pharmaceutical company with health care fraud, conspiracy and illegal drug distribution. The documents say Godfrey received a $2,350 payment in August from the pharmacy owner.

Godfrey declined comment Monday.

Later Monday, Gary Brandwein of Boca Raton, Fla., a 44-year-old osteopath and principal in the Florida company MedXLife was arraigned on six counts related to the criminal sale of a controlled substance. He pleaded not guilty and posted $10,000 bail.

Brandwein's lawyer, Terence Kindlon, acknowledged the doctor had a business relationship with Signature.

"He's always been a very dedicated and self-sacrificing healer," Kindlon said.

MedXLife owner Gregory Trotta and an employee, Brian Schafler, later pleaded innocent to six counts related to criminal sale of a controlled substance and were released after posting $10,000 bond.

After Brandwein was arraigned, Palm Beach Rejuvenation co-owner Glen Stephanos and his brother, George Stephanos, both of Palm Beach, Fla., entered innocent pleas to a seven-count indictment charging them with illegally selling steroids and hormones. A doctor employed by the company, Dr. Robert Carlson of Sarasota, Fla., also was arraigned and pleaded not guilty. All three men posted $1,000 bail.

Carlson's lawyer, Charles Holloman, said he first saw the indictment Monday.

"We're not at war with the district attorney's office," Holloman said. "We're trying to understand what happened ... and trying to restore my client's good name."

Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares, who ran the investigation, said Signature filled prescriptions, in some cases from unlicensed doctors, knowing they had not examined patients. His office said at least $250,000 in illegal and controlled substances were sold directly into Albany County, and New York State sales exceeded $10 million.

People in three states have been arrested so far and as many as 24 could face felony charges.

Soares has said his focus is on shutting down drug distributors and physicians writing illicit prescriptions instead of buyers.

Major league baseball players Gary Matthews Jr. and Jerry Hairston Jr., former slugger Jose Canseco and former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield reportedly were on a customer list at Applied Pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., one of the two pharmacies raided.

The NFL is looking into reports that a Pittsburgh Steelers doctor, Richard Rydze, was on the customer list of Signature Pharmacy in Florida, whose owners have been indicted by a grand jury in Albany. Records showed Rydze used his personal credit card to buy about $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone.

B'KLYN KINGPIN'S REIGN OF CARNAGE (NYPOST)

The New York Post, March 5, 2007

John "Bloody Hatchet" Hatcher, the brother of a minister, has admitted to involvement in more than 80 shootings - including 30 homicides - while operating a notorious gang that made tens of millions of dollars selling crack, cocaine and marijuana.

During a two-decade reign of terror, Hatcher and his gang, The Rugby Boys, littered the streets in the heart of Brooklyn with victims and bodies, authorities said.

"He was the crack epidemic," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York Office, comparing him to murderers Lorenzo "Fat Cat" Nichols and Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff and infamous Harlem druglord Nicky Barnes.

But unlike the others' brief reigns as crack and heroin kingpins, Hatcher's ring flourished like no other, before the DEA finally mounted a six-year operation buying $10 bags of crack that snared him.

Veteran federal agents and hardened homicide detectives were left slack-jawed with disbelief as Hatcher methodically detailed a litany of murder and mayhem that took him an astonishing four months to tell.

"There were times when we actually had to stop him and say, 'That's enough for today,' " DEA Special Agent John Profetti said, recalling a particularly grim session when Hatcher described an assault in which one of his henchmen was stabbed, shot, choked, set on fire and then doused with a pail of urine.

The victim survived, after pretending he was dead, and gave an interview to detectives and Star Jones, the former co-host of ABC's "The View" who was then a Brooklyn assistant district attorney.

When the man was released from the hospital, Hatcher paid two hit men $5,000 to finish him off.

Hatcher's brutality and sophisticated criminality belied his upbringing by loving parents who owned a record store in Canarsie and raised three other children, including a minister and a U.S. Naval Academy officer.

But by age 12, Hatcher was showing his propensity for crime, running with a crowd that committed robberies and burglaries and were tied to fearsome Jamaican drug dealers.

His fledgling talents were noticed by a local "Fagin-like" hood, who recruited him.

"It was like Oliver Twist with a gun," said Daniel Anderson, DEA associate special agent in charge in New York.

Added Profetti, "He was a natural, starting with pick-pocketing and escalating into robberies and burglaries."

By the end of high school, Hatcher was forming a gang of his own. He recruited kids, dubbed Rugby Boys, who played football and basketball when they were not selling drugs. One fearsome teen, Tyrone Hunter, was made Hatcher's deputy.

Coupling a businessman's acumen with an iron fist, Hatcher established control over several key crack dens in Bedford-Stuyvesant and East New York and skillfully built an empire with scores of workers in the heart of the city's most populated borough.

If a rival tried to poach his territory, someone would be pay. "He shot people just to make a point, leaving them wounded in the stomach and legs," Profetti said.

Hatcher lived large. He had a spacious apartment in Park Slope, hoards of women, "Superfly" clothes and flashy luxury cars and treated himself and his crew to lavish Caribbean trips.

But in 1991, he was with a couple of his henchmen and mistook undercover cops for rival dealers. One of his crew opened fire, grazing an officer.

Hatcher was the only one caught. He did not rat and spent eight years in prison.

When he was released, he quickly reclaimed his throne.

But two seemingly unrelated criminal matters - a murder in East New York and a credit-card scam in Alabama - ultimately toppled his empire.

On Jan. 27, 2000, a city bus driver made the mistake of being a go-between in a Colombian heroin deal with Hatcher, who shot and killed him and stole his drugs.

Seven months later, in Alabama, Thomas' nickname, "Boo," and his Brooklyn phone number showed up on a piece of paper linked to a ring ordering hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of merchandise from Home Depot.

The DEA joined U.S. Postal Inspector James Buthorn and NYPD detectives in early 2001 and starting with $10-bag buys, launched their probe that snared a "weak-link" lieutenant in Hatcher's operation. Fearing "Bloody Hatchet," the lieutenant cooperated, and Hatcher finally was scooped up in a massive roundup May 13, 2002.

Hatcher started spilling the beans, saying, "I am not going to do anyone else's time. They will do their own," referring to his eight-year stint in prison over the cop-wounding case.

With a treasure-trove of cases to cherry-pick from involving Hatcher - some which had already been attributed to others by the NYPD - Assistant Brooklyn U.S. Attorneys Christina Dugger and Scott Morvillo and the federal agents zeroed in on five killings.

"It took six years to peel back layer after layer to unveil these horrific crimes," Gilbride said.

Investigators dug up old witnesses and other evidence they used during a three-week trial that ended last month with the racketeering and murder conviction of the final bosses of Hatcher's gang: Hunter and Adrian Payne.

Hatcher, who testified for two days, is being held in federal prison and, along with Hunter and Payne, is awaiting sentencing in May. He is expected to receive what amounts to a life sentence.

AP, March 6, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — Afghanistan's 2007 opium poppy cultivation could expand again after last year's record crop, the U.N. drug agency said Monday, underlining the weakness of an internationally backed drive against the country's booming narcotics trade.

The Office on Drugs and Crime predicted an increase in a string of provinces, including southern Helmand — Afghanistan's largest poppy-growing region and an area wracked by a growing number of Taliban attacks.

The office said in a report that a recent U.N. survey found increasing evidence that the drug trade flourished in regions with poor security.

"This winter survey suggests that opium cultivation in Afghanistan in 2007 may not be lower than the record harvest," last year, UNODC Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa wrote in the report's preface.

Last year, opium cultivation rose an alarming 59%, deepening fears that Afghanistan is rapidly becoming a narco-state. Officials say Taliban militants protect southern farmers and tap drug profits to fuel their insurgency.

The U.N. said poppy cultivation occurred in 100% of villages it visited in Helmand province; 93% of villages were growing opium poppies in neighboring Kandahar, the Taliban's former stronghold. The U.N. report did not detail how many villages were visited.

It also predicted a sharp increase in cultivation in Nangarhar — touted in recent years as an example of the success of efforts to persuade farmers to grow licit crops — as well as in Kunar and Uruzgan provinces.

On the other hand, the U.N. saw a decrease in cultivation in seven mostly northern provinces, and said there was an indication of a split in attitudes between the north and south.

"There is evidence that Afghanistan's opium economy is becoming segmented, with farmers' attitudes, supply conditions and price trends moving in opposite directions in the north and the south," Maria Costa said.

President Hamid Karzai has vowed to rid Afghanistan of opium. International donors are directing hundreds of millions of dollars in development aid to rural areas to make it profitable for farmers to grow wheat, or plant orchards. Eradication teams are supposed to destroy opium in the fields before harvest.

However, critics say corrupt Afghan authorities and security forces are themselves heavily involved in the trade and are unlikely to mount a serious crackdown, while Karzai is wary of a rural backlash against his already weak government.

The U.N. report also found what it called a "new and disturbing trend" in Afghanistan's drug business — an increase in marijuana cultivation.

"The last thing we need is for Afghanistan to switch from one drug to another or — worse — to become a world leader in cannabis as well as opium production," Maria Costa said.

Afghan drug production already accounts for more than 90% of global supply of opium, the raw material for heroin.

UN Fears Afghan Opium 'explosion' (BBC)

BBC News, March 6, 2007

Poppy production was up 25% in 2006, the US has said The United Nations says it fears that Afghanistan may grow even more poppies in 2007 - at a time when current levels are already running at record output.

Poppy production rose 25% in 2006, according to the US State Department.

The UN says although production of poppies, used to make heroin, has fallen in the north and centre, a sharp rise is likely in the lawless south.

It also cites a dramatic increase in cannabis growing, which it describes as a new and disturbing trend.

In a report published on Monday, the UN office on drugs and crime said it was clear that the increased production in the south was a security issue.

'Cancer of insurgency'

Many southern regions have no government presence, while opium farmers were protected by the Taleban which uses drugs money to fund its insurgency, it said.

"It is clear that the insurgents are deriving an income, which they use to pay salaries for their foot soldiers (and) to buy weapons," said Antonio Maria Costa, the UN department's executive director.

"All of this has created quite a cancer of insurgency and illicit drug cultivation that has to be cut through in the years to come," he said.

He said the eradication effort needed to be increased to be effective. Last year, about 10% of the crop was eradicated, but Mr Costa said the figure should rise to 30%.

Four years after the US and its British allies began combating poppy production, Afghanistan still accounts for 90% of the world's opium trade.

IMMIGRATION:

Despite Push, Immigration Deal Not On Horizon (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, March 6, 2007

With Republicans looking to regain control of the Senate and Democrats hoping to pad their majority in 2008, neither party appears inclined to make the political sacrifices necessary to pass a broad immigration bill this year and may be content to simply duel to a rhetorical draw this summer, lawmakers and strategists in both parties said.

Leaders from both parties, Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) have all vowed to pass reform legislation this year, and Kennedy has been meeting with the White House and presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in recent weeks to work out a new compromise bill.

But despite these efforts, it still appears unlikely that comprehensive reforms will move out of the chamber before electoral concerns kill the bill.

In fact, GOP and Democratic aides contend that both parties may be best served by a political impasse over the issue, since such a scenario would allow Members to show they are standing firm on the hot-button issue while avoiding compromises that may upset base voters.

"Really, a filibuster is a win for us," one Democratic aide said, arguing that it would fit into the broader message to voters that Republicans are blockading reforms.

Similarly, a GOP aide argued that "blocking a bill is good for us" since Republican incumbents would be able to avoid facing the ire of single-issue conservative base voters come Election Day.

Despite massive protests across the nation and the rise of conservative vigilante groups along the Mexican border, Congress was unable to pass broad immigration legislation last year, in large part because of deep divisions within the Republican Party over the scope of the reforms.

While President Bush and some rank-and-file Republicans sided with most Democrats and backed a broad reform bill that included allowances for some illegal immigrants to remain in the United States, the bulk of the GOP opposed such a broad measure. Instead, most Republicans in the House and Senate favored a much narrower approach that focused on border-control measures, more aggressive enforcement of current immigration laws and a new system for ensuring employers do not hire undocumented workers.

Those differences apparently have widened since the elections. Although the Senate successfully passed a comprehensive immigration bill last year with the backing of a number of Republicans, it is unlikely such a bill will garner as much support from the GOP this year. A number of lawmakers — including Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) — voted for last year's bill because they knew the GOP-controlled House would act as a last barrier against enactment of any form of amnesty for illegal workers.

But with Leahy and Kennedy both backing provisions that are significantly more pro-immigration than those that were included in last year's bill, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and the White House may find it difficult to muster as much support in the Senate now that the backstop of a GOP-controlled House no longer exists.

"Anything with even a hint of amnesty" will have to face stiff opposition, one Republican Senator said, adding that "the gulf is just so wide" between Republicans in Congress and the White House that Bush may find little traction in the chamber.

Indeed, a number of lawmakers already are chafing at the fact that the White House, Kennedy and McCain have been holding closed-door meetings on a bill.

GOP Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and Arlen Specter (Pa.) — the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and a supporter of the comprehensive plan last year — complained last week that they had been frozen out of the process of drafting this year's bill.

As a result, Brownback said he would team up with other Republicans, including Specter and Sens. Mel Martinez (Fla.) and Jon Kyl (Ariz.), to work on the issue and perhaps introduce their own bill.

Last year, Kyl led a team of Senators that opposed the comprehensive bill supported by Specter, Brownback and Martinez.

Brownback explained the strategy of partnering with Kyl, saying in an interview, “If we can get a bill that all of us can agree to and hold 40 votes together, then we can have a real debate on the issue. Like last year, you still need 60 votes.” Sixty votes would be needed overcome a filibuster.

Democrats, meanwhile, face their own political difficulties. Given Reid’s narrow majority in the Senate, Democrats will find it all but impossible to pass a bill that goes as far as many in the party’s left wing will want. Additionally, one Democratic leadership aide pointed out that passing a wide-ranging reform package over the protests of Republicans could end up motivating the GOP’s base to turn out in next year’s election, making it difficult for Democrats to widen Reid’s margin of control in the 111th Congress.

This aide also pointed out that many Democrats elected to the House in 2006 ran, in part, to the right of Republican incumbents on the immigration issue and that passing comprehensive reforms that allow millions of illegal immigrants to remain in the U.S. could make their re-election much more difficult.

An added pressure facing both parties will be the timing of any immigration fight. Like Social Security reform, immigration has become something of a “third-rail” political issue, making it all but impossible for Congress to address it during an election year.

Although supporters have indicated they would like to take up the issue this spring — possibly as soon as the week after the annual Easter recess — leadership aides in both parties predict that the debate won’t begin until August at the earliest. That timeline would butt the debate up against the annual appropriations fight, meaning Congress will have a very narrow window in which to pass bills in both chambers, conference the legislation and get it to Bush before it becomes politically unviable.

Nevertheless, Kennedy, who is spearheading efforts to pass immigration reform this year, is pressing ahead. Kennedy is using this week to publicize his efforts, holding a series of public events with the Irish Lobby for Immigration Reform, religious leaders and other immigration reform advocates.

According to Kennedy’s office, this year’s version of the legislation will contain the main elements of last year’s Senate legislation. “The basic concepts are intact,” said Laura Capps, a Kennedy spokeswoman.

Those elements, she said, include a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants in the U.S. who meet several requirements, including working in the country for several years, paying a penalty, paying back taxes, and learning English and civics. They also would have to “get at the back of the line” behind immigrants already seeking citizenship, she added.

The bill also will call for enhanced border security, tighter requirements for employers to verify worker eligibility and a system to allow workers to enter legally into the U.S. to satisfy labor needs.

Chamber Takes On Law Aimed At Illegal Workers (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Chamber of Commerce Monday threw its considerable weight behind efforts to eliminate a groundbreaking Hazleton, Pa., law penalizing businesses that hire illegal workers and landlords who rent to them.

The Hazleton ordinance, which also makes English the official language of the small town, has not been implemented because a federal judge issued an order preventing it from going into effect. The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) has filed a lawsuit challenging it on behalf of a group local residents. A trial is set for next week.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce filed a legal document Monday in U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania backing the ACLU position and calling the law unconstitutional on two grounds.

First, the Chamber says, the Hazleton ordinance is pre-empted by federal law. Second, it says the law violates due process protections because it doesn't give a business accused of hiring an illegal worker the right to challenge an allegation before losing its right to operate.

"We need to bring some stability into the system until we come up with a federal answer," says Angelo Amador, Chamber director of immigration policy.

"If not, we're going to end up with 50 state laws and a thousand local ordinances," Amador adds. "A lot of people are copying what we think is a bad law."

Hazleton Mayor Louis Barletta, a former small-business owner, says he never expected to be on the opposite side from the Chamber.

"There's nowhere in our ordinance that we regulate immigration. We punish businesses that hire illegal workers," Barletta says. "I would rather stand on the side of the American workers than (with) businesses that break the law."

Hazleton has been raising money for its legal bills in part by seeking donations on a special website.

As immigration legislation has languished in Congress, dozens of states have passed measures aimed at an estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants. Barletta says more than 100 localities are considering imitating Hazleton's law.

The Hazleton ordinance lets individuals lodge complaints if they suspect a business has an illegal worker. Firms that can't verify an employee's status have three days to fix the situation. If they don't, the city can suspend the operating license. Workers who lose jobs at a business that had illegal immigrants on the payroll, under certain circumstances, can seek damages.

The Chamber argues that, unlike federal law, the Hazleton plan makes employers liable for penalties without proof they intentionally hired an illegal immigrant.

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WHEN HOUSE Republicans last year sought to make the mere presence of illegal immigrants in the United States a felony punishable by one year in prison, the odious legislation sparked international condemnation. No country was more loudly indignant than Mexico. Then-President Vicente Fox called the legislation "shameful" and its targets "heroes" who make a crucial contribution to the U.S. economy.

Yet Mexico is hardly in a position to criticize. Since 1974, foreign immigrants in Mexico illegally have been subject to prison sentences of two years, plus a fine. Immigrants who are caught reentering Mexico after deportation face 10-year prison sentences, compared to two years here.

That is, until now. Mexican President Felipe Calderon has decided to tackle immigration reform of his own, and he is seeking the repeal of Article 123 of the General Population Law, which makes illegal immigrants the Mexican equivalent of felons.

The vast majority of the 185,000 illegal immigrants caught, detained and deported by Mexican officials each year come from Guatemala and Honduras, and many of them are in transit toward the Rio Grande. Human rights advocates have documented a lengthy list of abuses faced by these migrants — threats, extortion and even violence — stemming in part from their status as felons. In addition to amending Mexico's draconian and hypocritical law, Calderon's government is vowing to improve living conditions and medical services at the 48 detention centers where illegal immigrants are held pending deportation. Proposed upgrades include the addition of hot water and telephone service.

In a recent report, Mexico's National Commission on Human Rights accused immigration agents of numerous violations, citing one instance in which 78 migrants were crammed into four cells, each designed to hold only five people, and denied food and water for more than 24 hours.

These reforms would certainly improve the plight of detained migrants and also Mexico's relationship with its southern neighbors, as well as giving Mexico more moral standing to agitate against laws affecting its citizens in the United States. Those in this country who oppose guest-worker programs and a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants often cite Mexico's own harsher policies as the ones we should adopt, or at least complain about first.

Mexico can declaw that argument by closing the gap between its advocacy for Mexican nationals in the United States and how it treats illegal immigrants within its borders. Mexico is under pressure from the U.S. to block the flow of migrants heading north, and recent crackdowns, in part, have been to that end. Ensuring the human rights of its migrant population, however, is not only the right thing to do, it's good politics.

TAX:

DOJ_NMG_0140645

By Peter Waldman

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

John Doerr is the dean of Silicon Valley venture capitalists, one who helped launch tech icons like Google and Sun Microsystems. A billionaire, he works with rock star Bono to fight poverty in Africa and with others to increase aid for education and medical research.

Mr. Doerr is less well known for one investment that didn't pan out. Called myCFO Inc., the firm set out to provide rich people a full menu of financial services, from wealth management to estate planning. It succeeded with only one: tax shelters that helped clients shield hundreds of millions of dollars from taxes. Less than two years after myCFO began selling them in 2000, the Internal Revenue Service said they were bogus.

MORE ON MYCFO

IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS

• Deposition of Kevin McAuliffe2, a former top accountant at myCFO, in which he testifies that he warned his bosses that myCFO was becoming too heavily involved in selling tax shelters. Plus, see emails3 shown as exhibits in the deposition.

• Emails from myCFO board member John Doerr4 to Frank DiFerdinando, the head of myCFO's tax-strategies group. Mr. Doerr was a leading proponent of the group.

• An admission of facts5 by one of the large banks that underwrote myCFO's main tax shelter. In it, the bank admits the deal's purported 30-year loan was a sham and only meant to help clients avoid taxes.

• A document myCFO prepared6 for an informal phone discussion after the IRS cracked down on one of its tax shelters in March 2002.

MyCFO ceased independent operations five years ago, but it still casts a shadow. A bank that underwrote some of its tax deals has admitted that they were shams. Former clients, hit with back-tax bills, are fighting the IRS. Two ex-clients have alleged that myCFO's tax deals were fraudulent.

Two lawyers who worked with myCFO are under tax-fraud indictment for their work on similar tax shelters. The Manhattan U.S. attorney's office, which has charged more than a dozen people in connection with tax shelters, said in a court filing last April that it had "an ongoing criminal investigation" involving "various former employees of myCFO."

The financial backers and board members of myCFO were Silicon Valley royalty. They included James H. Clark, co-founder of Netscape Communications and Silicon Graphics; John Chambers of Cisco Systems Inc.; Thomas Jermoluk, former chairman of Excite@Home; and former Netscape boss James Barksdale. The firm's outside legal counsel was Larry Sonsini, lawyer to Silicon Valley's stars.

The firm was Mr. Clark's idea. Mr. Doerr led its financing and took a leading role on the board. In typical Silicon Valley fashion, board members were closely involved with strategy and operations, according to company documents and legal papers reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The documents show that directors pushed ahead with the tax-shelter business despite signs that all wasn't right with the product.

Mr. Doerr praised the head of the firm's tax-strategies group in a 2001 email for "not only delivering on your original [business] plan, but going beyond to make up the revenue shortfall from the recurring business." MyCFO "has my full support, and the full support of [my] partners" at Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, the venture-capital firm that financed myCFO, he added.

MyCFO's story shows how the sudden wealth spawned by the technology boom had hidden impacts that still echo in Silicon Valley. "There were 30-year-old clients making hundreds of millions of dollars -- it was intoxicating," says James Phillips, myCFO's former chief investment officer. "The accountants and CPAs wanted their share, too."

SILICON VOLLEY

• The Background: Prominent tech financiers set up myCFO in 1999 to provide financial services to the rich.

• What Went Wrong: Firm morphed into a purveyor of tax shelters, which the IRS in 2002 labeled invalid.

• The Hangover: A bank that worked on myCFO shelters admits they were a sham; prosecutor has said ex-myCFO employees are party to criminal probe.

At the time, tax shelters were a lively business. Dozens of national law and accounting firms sold these strategies -- Byzantine transactions that often involved foreign currencies and offshore middlemen. MyCFO selected a few tax shelters and refined them for a clientele dripping in capital gains.

Some of California's leading industrialists were customers. Ray Irani, chief executive of Occidental Petroleum Corp., did a tax deal through myCFO, company records show. So did Ariba Inc. co-founder Boris Putanec and Val Vaden, co-founder of financier Benchmark Capital.

Mr. Jermoluk, the former Excite@Home chairman, was both a founding financier of myCFO and a shelter customer. For fees of about $2.4 million, he acquired ostensible losses to offset as much as $50 million of taxable income, according to company documents and a deposition by his former accountant, Kevin McAuliffe.

Mr. Jermoluk declined to be interviewed about myCFO, as did Messrs. Doerr and Chambers. Messrs. Clark and Barksdale didn't respond to email and phone requests for interviews. A lawyer for the former directors told a tax client last October that they "categorically denied...misconduct or malfeasance of any sort." The lawyer, David York, predicted myCFO's main tax package ultimately "will survive a substantive tax law analysis" in court.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Sonsini said his law firm did basic legal work for myCFO that didn't include reviewing its tax offerings. Messrs. Vaden and Putanec declined to comment, while Occidental said Dr. Irani wouldn't comment "on what is clearly a personal matter."

MyCFO's main tax shelter, sold to 17 clients, was called Cards, for Custom Adjustable Rate Debt Structure. Each involved an ostensible 30-year bank loan to a foreign party for $50 million to $100 million. MyCFO's client then assumed the loan and, after some complex swapping of collateral, claimed a loss for tax purposes of nearly the full amount of the loan. Others besides myCFO also marketed Cards.

The IRS in March 2002 ruled Cards invalid. Largely as a result, myCFO sold its name and client list and liquidated its tax business.

The IRS said Cards failed a basic test of legitimacy: It lacked any real economic purpose other than to lower taxes. The agency added that clients were never really at risk for the supposed $50 million or more in loans.

Most myCFO shelter clients are challenging the IRS's action, in federal court in San Jose. But two broke ranks and alleged the shelters were fraudulent, in civil racketeering suits they filed against big banks that underwrote their Cards deals. They claim they were misled to believe the shelter's loan structure was actually a viable credit facility. (See adjoining article7.)

From the start, there were internal warnings. Mr. McAuliffe, a former Ernst & Young tax partner who was one of myCFO's first hires, said that when the firm was just gearing up in 1999, some of its accountants wanted to shun tax "elimination" deals. He warned Mr. Jermoluk and Chief Executive Art Shaw that myCFO was relying too heavily on tax shelters for revenue, Mr. McAuliffe said in a 2005 deposition for a tax client's lawsuit in San Francisco Superior Court. But he said the founders were talking about an initial public offering, and his warnings went unheeded amid IPO "fever." Mr. Shaw, CEO of advertising firm Netblue Inc., didn't return calls seeking comment.

MyCFO had obtained the Cards strategy from a San Francisco investment boutique called Chenery Associates, which also provided it to others. Chenery had done a Cards deal for an aircraft-leasing company, which registered it with the IRS as a tax shelter. The IRS requires corporations to register such tax-driven deals. Its rules for when individuals must register a deal they're using as a shelter are less strict.

MyCFO officials said their clients would never accept a transaction they had to register as a tax shelter, Chenery Associates owner Roy Hahn later testified in a deposition for San Francisco Superior Court. A lawyer for Chenery removed the obstacle. He wrote an analysis saying that Cards wasn't a tax shelter under relevant IRS rules.

The lawyer, Graham Taylor, then at LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae, wore multiple hats. He also represented myCFO in refining the tax strategy, court documents show. And when myCFO signed up Cards clients, it arranged for them to hire Mr. Taylor as their lawyer. For fees of roughly $85,000 per client, he supplied many of them with letters saying that if the IRS found their deductions invalid, they shouldn't owe penalties because they had relied on "an opinion from reputable counsel."

That counsel, it turned out, was a co-inventor of Cards, Raymond J. Ruble, then at law firm Brown & Wood. The law firm got $250,000 each time a client used Cards. Chenery paid this out of its share of the tax client's fee.

Chenery also agreed to pay 20% of its own fee into a Ruble family trust, according to court records and Mr. Hahn's testimony.

MyCFO directors had several briefings about tax shelters, minutes of board meetings show. One in mid-2000 led to a marketing delay while the firm's general counsel reviewed the matter. Three months later, the IRS, in connection with a similar shelter, warned that "an artificial loss lacking economic substance is not allowable." Within weeks, myCFO decided to go ahead with marketing Cards.

It quickly signed up 10 clients for fees totaling $16 million. As those deals were closing in late 2000, Mr. Ruble from Brown & Wood emailed myCFO an article in which a prominent tax analyst called Cards a blatant tax dodge. Mr. Ruble said the analyst had "totally missed the boat on business purpose," which he said lay in financing opportunities.

As the tech bubble deflated, myCFO imposed layoffs and spending cuts, but not on the tax-strategies group. MyCFO's growing reliance on tax shelters for revenue was discussed at a board meeting in August 2001. At that meeting, the board's compensation committee, Messrs. Doerr and Clark, approved stock options for 94 employees -- giving a third of them to the firm's top two tax strategists.

One director asked if myCFO would have an obligation to refund clients' fees if the tax deals were unwound. "It was basically, 'Gosh, is this kosher?' " says someone who was there. "Then they read the attorneys' comfort letters and everyone shut up."

Mr. Doerr was a booster for the firm's tax strategists. In response to Mr. Doerr's 2001 email lauding the tax team for its performance -- which he sent on Sept. 11, 31 minutes before the first plane struck the World Trade Center -- the tax team's leader reported landing $4.5 million more in fees. Five days after 9/11, Mr. Doerr replied: "This is AWESOME news, particularly during a week marred by national tragedy.... Please keep me posted."

But some of myCFO's accountants and client-service people were in revolt, according to Mr. McAuliffe's deposition. In late 2001, he and several colleagues refused to sign shelter clients' tax returns until myCFO agreed to indemnify them for any personal liability. One client was claiming a tax loss greater than his net worth. "It was only a matter of time until the IRS came down pretty hard," Mr. McAuliffe testified.

In January 2002, the IRS offered a broad tax-shelter amnesty: It would waive penalties for any taxpayer who owned up to using a questionable shelter.

MyCFO staffers disagreed over what to tell clients about this and whether to discourage them from taking the amnesty. Ultimately, the firm sent out what General Counsel Steve Debenham, in an email about a draft to a colleague, called "a CYA letter," for "cover your a -- ." It said the IRS appeared to be focusing on the packages offered by major accounting firms, which "may be less credibly supported by a substantive economic justification...."

Mr. McAuliffe mocked that distinction in an email to colleagues. "Same law firms, similar or same promoters, same tax effect," he said, wondering if myCFO was "smoking our own dope again?"

He also dismissed the idea that myCFO's clients were penalty-proof for relying on reputable counsel. "You bought your opinion. You bought your comfort-level letter," he said later in his deposition. Mr. Debenham and Mr. McAuliffe both declined to be interviewed.

Two months later, the IRS ruled that Cards was an improper shelter. MyCFO's board discussed the ruling by phone. MyCFO by this time was little more than a tax-shelter brokerage, according to documents prepared for the meeting. If it closed its shelter business, it would forgo $10 million in revenue in the next three months and be in the red.

Instead of closing the tax business, myCFO tried to revive it by hiring a veteran of KPMG, an accounting firm that was especially active in selling tax shelters. The employee, Randall Bickham, brought a pipeline of tax deals worth a projected $7 million in fees.

The board also explored selling the company. MyCFO documents show Deutsche Bank AG, which had worked with myCFO on several Cards deals, expressed interest in acquiring the firm for $200 million to $300 million, but backed away, citing potential tax-shelter liability. Bank of Montreal agreed to buy myCFO for $90 million but it, too, backed out over the same concern, myCFO documents show. In October 2002 Bank of Montreal finally purchased just myCFO's name, client list and some other assets. It paid $30 million, about a third of the sums the Kleiner Perkins founders and others had put in. Bank of Montreal now has a private-banking unit called Harris myCFO Inc., which declined to comment.

Directors assigned the rest of myCFO to a liquidator. They gave Mr. Bickham, the former KPMG man, a $1.4 million contract, paid in advance, to maintain files and assist clients in "controversy issues" with the IRS.

In 2005, Mr. Bickham was among those charged by the Manhattan U.S. attorney with tax evasion and conspiracy to defraud the IRS. The charges relate to work he did while at KPMG. He has pleaded not guilty and declined to comment.

Also charged was Mr. Ruble, the Cards co-inventor. He was cited for tax-shelter work he did for others, mostly KPMG. Mr. Ruble's law firm had fired him, after discovering the deal he had with Chenery to funnel 20% of Chenery's fees into a Ruble family trust.

By that time, Mr. Ruble was at Sidley Austin, which had absorbed Brown & Wood. Sidley Austin and KPMG both faced civil litigation over tax shelters, which they settled last year for $179 million, including legal fees.

Mr. Taylor -- the lawyer who helped myCFO refine the shelters and assisted its shelter clients -- was indicted in a tax-shelter matter in Utah. Both he and Mr. Ruble have pleaded not guilty, and both declined to comment.

Federal prosecutors also investigated a German bank that helped arrange some of myCFO's tax shelters. In a deferred-prosecution deal reached last year, the bank, Bayerische Hypo-und Vereinsbank AG, or HVB, agreed to a $30 million penalty and admitted that the Cards deal contained "fraudulent and illegal elements."

The bank's confession didn't mention myCFO. But it said "all parties involved" knew the Cards credit facility wasn't a legitimate long-term loan and would be unwound in about a year to generate "the phony tax benefits sought." Said HVB, in a Statement of Admitted Facts: "The transactions were prearranged by the promoters... and had no purpose other than generating tax benefits for the clients involved."

Did You Pay All Your Taxes? (USAT)

By Sandra Block

If not, you're part of the $300 billion gap that Congress wants to close

Don't tax you, don't tax me, tax that fellow behind the tree. — Russell B. Long, late senator from Louisiana

If you're self-employed, sell used items occasionally on eBay or own a home, now would be a good time to start keeping really good records. Your tax returns could receive more scrutiny, thanks to a growing push to narrow the "tax gap" — the billions of dollars in federal taxes that go uncollected every year.

Democrats and Republicans don't agree on much, but they do share a desire to narrow the tax gap. That's not surprising. The IRS estimates that the tax gap exceeds more than $300 billion a year. Collecting even half that amount would let Congress repeal the alternative minimum tax — a parallel tax system that increasingly threatens middle-income taxpayers — without raising taxes or cutting government programs.

Taxpayers like the idea of closing the tax gap, too. More than 86% of taxpayers believe that cheating on income taxes is unacceptable, according to a survey released last month by the IRS Oversight Board.

But closing the tax gap is a lot more complicated than chasing down the proverbial deadbeats who hide money under the mattress. Government proposals to narrow the gap would affect people who probably don't think of themselves as scofflaws. And tax experts say the IRS can't make a serious dent in the tax gap unless it conducts more audits.

"If you're going to do away with the entire tax gap, it's going to be real painful for everybody," says Mel Schwarz, a partner at Grant Thornton's national tax office in Washington.

The IRS estimates that unpaid taxes from individuals, as opposed to big corporations, account for more than 70% of the tax gap. And within that group, the self-employed are considered the biggest offenders. Sole proprietors who underreport their income and self-employment taxes account for roughly one-third of the tax gap, the IRS says.

The Treasury Department has proposed requiring credit card companies to report to the IRS payments made to small businesses and other self-employed workers. That would allow the IRS to compare the self-employed workers' tax returns with the payments and determine whether they're underreporting their income.

But groups representing small-business owners worry that the proposal could increase the costs that credit card companies charge small businesses. More fundamentally, they say, the IRS figures fail to distinguish between sole proprietors who deliberately hide income and those who make honest mistakes.

"They don't make it easy for you," says Dennis Waters, 55, of Exeter, N.H., who buys and sells antique photographs via his website, www.finedags.com. "Every year, they're changing the rules, changing the types of deductions. You can't plan ahead to try and do something."

Because of the complexity of their returns, many self-employed workers must pay someone to do their taxes, which reduces their profits, says Todd McCracken, president of the National Small Business Association. Those who can't afford to hire a professional must take time away from their businesses to meet complex reporting requirements, such as filing estimated taxes every quarter, he says.

They need to keep comprehensive records, too, because sole proprietors are up to three times more likely to be audited than are individual taxpayers who don't file a Schedule C, the form used by self-employed workers to report their business income.

"Chances are, you'll be audited if you're in business long enough," says Frederick Daily, a tax attorney and author of Stand Up to the IRS.

Chuck Smith Jr., co-owner of JR Services, a mortgage servicing company in Norton, Ohio, knows that all too well. Since he went into business for himself in the 1970s, he's been audited three times.

None of the audits resulted in a higher tax bill, but in one case, he had to track down a receipt for a used truck cap. In an e-mail message, Smith said he now saves receipts for everything, some for as little as 50 cents.

A stepped-up effort to capture unreported income would lead to more audits of the self-employed. And it could also prove costly for families who employ nannies or other full-time household help.

If you paid a nanny $1,500 or more in 2006, you're supposed to file Schedule H with your tax return and withhold a portion of your employee's pay for Social Security, Medicare and unemployment tax.

But despite some high-profile cases of nanny-tax evasion, the tax is widely ignored. In 2003, the most recent year available, only about 241,000 taxpayers filed Schedule H, according to the IRS. The International Nanny Association estimates that about 1 million households employ nannies in the USA. Families bypass the nanny tax for many reasons. Some are already struggling to pay for child care and can't afford it.

Others employ undocumented workers. And some don't understand the rules, or think the tax is too complicated or burdensome, says Robert King, co-owner of Legally Nanny, an Irvine, Calif.-based company that helps people pay nanny taxes.

But this much is clear, King says: If the IRS audits your return and finds you have an off-the-books nanny, you'll owe back taxes and interest — along with penalties for tax evasion and fraud.

Other taxpayers who could be affected by efforts to narrow the tax gap include:

•Online sellers. More than 200 million people buy and sell items on eBay. If you use eBay or another Internet auction site to sell old stuff that's been piling up in your garage, you probably don't have to worry about paying taxes on the proceeds. But if you earn extra income by selling items online, you're supposed to pay taxes on your profits.

An IRS advisory committee recommended last year that online auction sites be required to file reports of sales transactions with the IRS. The committee also suggested requiring sellers to obtain a taxpayer identification number, which would let the government track the transactions.

A crackdown probably wouldn't affect professional sellers. Nor would it affect people who sell used personal items on eBay for less than they originally paid for them. Proceeds from those sales, like money earned from a garage sale, aren't taxable.

But it could cause headaches for people who occasionally buy items at yard sales and sell them online months later, Grant Thornton's Schwarz says. To calculate their profits, those people would have to keep records of the amount they originally paid — known as the basis — for every item they sell. That kind of inventory accounting "is sophisticated even for people who do taxes for a living, much less a guy who is trying to make a little extra money," Schwarz says.

EBay doesn't have records on transactions, because once a winning bid is posted, the sale takes place offline, she says. "We have no way to confirm whether or not that transaction actually happened," she says.

•Homeowners who deduct property taxes. One big benefit of homeownership is the ability to deduct all sorts of expenses. In fiscal 2006, homeowners deducted nearly $20 billion in real estate taxes and nearly $70 billion in mortgage interest. But the non-partisan Joint Committee on Taxation says it believes homeowners are deducting more property taxes and mortgage interest than the law allows — and that tightening those deductions could reduce the tax gap.

In a report to Congress last year, the committee said many homeowners' real estate tax deductions include user fees and special assessments for improvements. Those aren't legal deductions. But it's an easy mistake to make, the committee said, because property tax bills often don't distinguish between deductible taxes and non-deductible fees.

Many homeowners also incorrectly deduct "points" — prepaid interest — when they refinance their mortgages, the committee report said. Under the tax code, points are fully deductible on a mortgage to buy a home, but points on a refinanced mortgage must be prorated over the life of the loan.

To address both issues, the committee recommended increasing reporting requirements for local governments and mortgage lenders. That would lead to more IRS scrutiny of the deductions, and more audits of homeowners who claim them incorrectly.

The IRS has increased the rate of audits in recent years, particularly among high-income earners and the self-employed. Still, most taxpayers are more likely to be hit by a meteor than be audited by the IRS.

Some analysts say the IRS can't close the tax gap without significantly increasing audits. But doing so would risk the kind of backlash that led to congressional hearings of allegedly abusive collection tactics in the mid-1990s.

IRS Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson says she believes audits can be more effective if they're targeted at specific problem groups, such as self-employed workers who are paid in cash.

If the IRS audited a food vendor in a New York City neighborhood, she says, he would probably talk about it with other vendors. They'd get nervous and start reporting more of their income, she says. That's more effective, Olson adds, than "scattershot audits."

Meanwhile, tax watchdogs and consumer advocates argue that Congress won't make real progress toward closing the tax gap unless it simplifies the tax code. Olson agrees that the tax code is too complicated but says that's hardly an excuse to cheat. "We have to start talking about paying taxes as a civic duty," she says. "I'm really proud of our system being based on that trust."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Leaders Admit Failures At Walter Reed (USAT/AP)

By Anne Flaherty

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Army leaders said Monday that they accept responsibility for substandard conditions at the service's flagship Walter Reed Army Medical Center but also said they hadn't known about most of the problems.

At an emotional House subcommittee hearing at the hospital, lawmakers suggested the failings go far beyond the hospital for wounded soldiers in Washington. They demanded action. Military leaders — and Vice President Cheney — promised they'd get it.

"We can't fail one of these soldiers or their families, not one. And we did," said Maj. Gen. George Weightman, who was in charge of Walter Reed from August 2006 until he was fired last week. "We did not fully recognize the frustrating bureaucratic and administrative processes some of these soldiers go through. We should have, and in this, I failed."

Other top Army officials echoed Weightman's comments as Congress began digging into the controversy. In a session that mixed contrition and clashes, lawmakers speculated that dilapidated housing and excessive red tape were problems that went beyond Walter Reed.

"I'm afraid this is just the tip of the iceberg, that when we get out into the field, we may find more of this," said Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., a member of the House Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee that held the session.

"My question is, where have you been?" Rep. John Tierney, D-Mass., asked Army Undersecretary Peter Geren; the Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter Schoomaker; and the vice chief, Gen. Richard Cody.

Schoomaker told Tierney, the chairman of the panel, "I've got a daughter and a son-in-law that are on the way to combat. This is not something about people who don't care. And I am not going to sit here and have anybody tell me that we don't care about —"

"Nobody said anything about people not caring," Tierney interrupted, "so we'll put that red herring aside and, if I can, calm you down and get you back to the issue here."

Addressing war veterans Monday, Cheney promised that the problems at Walter Reed would be fixed.

"There will be no excuses — only action," Cheney told a gathering of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. "And the federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down."

Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson said his office will hire 100 patient advocates, speed benefit claims and improve medical screenings for veterans at its facilities.

"Our goal is to do things that serve the veterans in the manner that they deserve the best way that we can," Nicholson said in an interview on NPR's All Things Considered.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates forced Army Secretary Francis Harvey to step down Friday. Gates also removed Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, who had been named interim commander of Walter Reed. Kiley led the hospital from 2000 until 2004, when he became Army surgeon general.

At the hearing, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., pointed to several investigative reports — including assessments by the RAND Corp. and the Government Accountability Office — dating back two years ago that sounded "alarm bells."

"Despite all the work that went on before, top Pentagon officials reacted to the reports at Walter Reed two weeks ago by claiming surprise," Waxman said.

Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, who lost his left eye and suffered traumatic brain injuries from a rifle wound, said that after he was discharged from Walter Reed, he was given a map of the grounds and eventually found his way to outpatient quarters by wandering around and asking for directions.

Then, he said, he "sat in my room for a couple of weeks wondering when someone would contact" him about continuing treatment.

"My biggest concern is having young men and women who have had their lives shattered in service to their country … get taken care of," Shannon said.

Congressional Panel Told Of Shoddy Care At Walter Reed (MCT)

By David Goldstein

McClatchy Newspapers, March 6, 2007

Annette McLeod, whose husband suffered a brain injury when he was hit by a steel door in Iraq, said the Army tried to blame his mental problems on the fact that he needed extra help with math and reading while in grammar school.

The hospital kept putting up roadblocks to his treatment, she said. On his test for traumatic brain injury, they said "he didn't try hard enough," McLeod said.

"This is how we treat our soldiers," she said angrily, her voice breaking. "They're good enough to sacrifice their lives, but we give them nothing."

Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, who lost his left eye and received a brain injury after he was shot near the Iraqi city of Ramadi, told lawmakers that once at Walter Reed, he was basically abandoned.

"The system can't be trusted," he said.

The generals in charge were apologetic, even as several said they were unaware of the conditions that blackened the reputation of the Army's premier medical facility.

"I couldn't be madder; I couldn't be more embarrassed," said Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff. "I'm ashamed."

"I'm personally and professionally sorry," said Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who headed Walter Reed before becoming the Army surgeon general. "Simply put, I'm in command and I share these failures."

Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who took over the hospital in August and was fired last week, said, "You can't fail one of these soldiers. Not one. ... And we did."

Weightman, who some in Congress believe has been made a scapegoat for the problems, at one point turned to the McLeods and apologized for "not meeting their expectations. I promise we will do better."

The House Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee held the hearing at Walter Reed, where some combat-wounded outpatients were housed in squalor and had to battle the Army bureaucracy for their disability benefits. Other House and Senate panels, along with similar questions about the Department of Veterans Affairs' treatment of wounded veterans, are certain to hold more on Capitol Hill as the issue crackles like lightning in political and military circles.

The hearing came in response to recent Washington Post reports that the hospital housed some of its wounded outpatients in a bug- and rodent-infested building, known as Building 18. Mold grew on the walls, security was compromised and utilities weren't always working. The online magazine Salon first reported the problems more than a year ago.

"It was unforgivable," said Spc. Jeremy Duncan, who lost his left ear and the vision in his left eye and suffered other wounds when a roadside bomb exploded near him. "It wasn't fit for anybody to live in a room like that."

The 17 lawmakers, plus aides, were squeezed onto the stage behind a long table in a small hospital auditorium. Above them hung the Walter Reed motto: "We provide warrior care."

"This is absolutely the wrong way to treat our troops, and serious reforms need to happen," he said.

But Tierney added that the housing problems were "only the tip of the iceberg," a phrase that panel members used repeatedly.

McLeod said the Army never told her that her husband, Spc. Wendell W. McLeod Jr., was injured while he was taking inventory on a food transport truck in Iraq. She learned about it from him.

She became his advocate: "I was very persistent. I went to generals, anybody who would listen to me."

Still, she said, "My life was ripped apart the day that my husband was injured."

McLeod, Duncan and Shannon described a system in which the injured have to justify their wounds in order to earn their disability payments. They said that Army medical personnel can diagnose their conditions, but case managers can question the diagnoses, prolonging their ordeal.

"Too often, wounded soldiers are poorly served and fall through the cracks," Cynthia Bascetta, a Government Accountability Office health care investigator, told the hearing.

Several generals said they were unaware of reports from both the GAO and the media in recent years that have detailed the problems that wounded soldiers often face.

Kiley said that the "bricks and mortar" issues, such as Building 18, can be easily fixed, and that most of the soldiers have been moved out. But the system for helping the wounded needs to be "less confrontational, less adversarial," he said. "We really need to reinvent this process."

Several lawmakers were skeptical. They said the Army has promised in the past to fix problems, only for Congress to later learn that little was done.

"What makes this round of problems any different?" said Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va. "These are heroes, and they're languishing."

'I Failed,' Says Fired Walter Reed General (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — The general who was fired after reports of substandard medical care for veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center said today he agreed with critics that there was a failure of leadership at the facility.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates "called this 'a failure of leadership.' I agree. We can't fail one of these soldiers, one of these patients, and we did."

Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who was fired as commander at Walter Reed after the Washington Post published a series of gripping stories about the soldiers' shoddy medical care, argued that most patient care for returning soldiers "is superb."

But Weightman, who headed Walter Reed for less than a year, acknowledged he did not realize how frustrated veterans and their families had become in dealing with a gargantuan bureaucracy overwhelmed by injured soldiers returning from war.

"In this, I failed," he said, adding that he was disappointed he was unable to "continue to help" in correcting the problems.

The committee also heard from the Army's top brass. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, chief of staff of the Army, said he was "extraordinarily angry and embarrassed" by the disclosures.

"We've got no excuse for the past," said acting Army Secretary Pete Geren, tapped for the post after predecessor Frances Harvey was forced to resign in light of the widening scandal. As for fixing the problems, he added, "The only way we can prove [our resolve] is to show you."

As several committees gear up to investigate the medical care provided to returning combat veterans from the Iraq War, particularly outpatients, congressional leaders charged today that the revelations are just the "tip of the iceberg."

In hearings of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee at Walter Reed Hospital, Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Los Angeles) said that veterans and their families are "flooding us with complaints" and that "this may be the tip of the iceberg of what is going on all around the country."

And, citing a litany of news stories and congressional reports, Waxman threw doubt on claims by the Army's higher-ups that they were surprised by the Post's disclosures two weeks ago.

"They said, 'We never knew things were out of hand.' " Waxman said. "I have a stack of reports and articles that sounded the alarm bells."

He also questioned the policy of outsourcing care. "We've contracted out so much in this war," he said. "We are using mercenaries instead of soldiers, we contracted out this as well." As a result, he said, "in Iraq, [we're] overpaying for contracting; here we're under-serving our soldiers."

Soldiers and their families testified today that the veterans were denied adequate care, forced to live in squalid conditions and dismissed as troublemakers when they complained.

"When I have to show my Purple Heart to get my uniform, you know it's bad," said Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon. Waiting for the plastic surgery that would allow him to wear a prosthetic eye, Shannon said he was angry that Army Secretary Harvey was allowed to resign.

"In a war," Shannon said, "you don't resign in the middle of a war, you continue to fight for us and admit mistakes and work to fix mistakes until you're fired."

Specialist Jeremy Duncan, who lost sight in one eye, suffered a fractured neck and almost lost his left arm when a homemade bomb exploded, said he was housed in a building "that wasn't fit for anybody to live in," with holes in the wall and black mold.

Duncan said despite his complaints, nothing ever got fixed. "That's when I called the Washington Post," he said. "The next day they [hospital officials] moved me and renovated that room."

Raising echoes of the federal government's flawed response to Hurricane Katrina, members of Congress blasted the hospital's response to severely wounded soldiers from Iraq and Afghanistan.

"You've been fighting a war," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) "You shouldn't have to come back here and fight a system."

Annette McLeod, wife of Cpl. Wendell "Dell" McLeod, said she became such a ferocious advocate for her husband's medical care that "the case manger got tired of dealing with me" and arranged to send her husband home to be treated by the local VA hospital.

Asked about claims by top Army officials that they had no knowledge of conditions, McLeod she said, "I have one question: were they deaf? I worked the chain, I talked to anybody who would listen."

Telling the committee about a soldier who was diagnosed with bipolar illness, McLeod said that serviceman received no compensation.

"This is how we treat our soldiers, we give them nothing," she said. "What about the ones that don't have [advocates like] me? If you're good enough to go to war, you're good enough to be taken care of when you get home."

Apologies, Anger At Walter Reed Hearing (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Steve Vogel

Senior commanders of the Army offered profuse apologies yesterday for the poor treatment accorded many soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, but lawmakers expressed skepticism that the generals had been unaware of the problems until they were spotlighted by the media two weeks ago.

Congress opened a round of investigative hearings into the Walter Reed scandal only days after a major shakeup at the Army that followed Washington Post reports about squalid living conditions and bureaucratic tangles for soldiers receiving outpatient care. Walter Reed's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey lost their jobs, and the Bush administration has established several panels to investigate the care being provided to wounded soldiers.

Senior commanders sounded more contrite yesterday than they did when the scandal first broke. At one point during several hours of hearings in the auditorium at Walter Reed, Weightman turned to the soldiers and families behind him and apologized "for not meeting their expectations, not only in the care provided, but also in having so many bureaucratic processes."

"I promise we will do better," Weightman said.

Lawmakers -- Democrats and Republicans alike -- seemed receptive to the candor voiced at the hearing of a panel of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, but they also cited earlier warnings from internal memos, government audits and news reports.

"I have to tell you, the first thing that pops into my mind is: Where've you been? Where has all the brass been?" said Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), who convened the hearing as chairman of the national security and foreign affairs subcommittee. "All the things that [were] heard, read about and heard earlier today, clearly, this can't all be pushed down at the lower level. Clearly this is not some junior officer's responsibility that nobody else has to claim anything for."

Army Chief of Staff Peter J. Schoomaker told the committee that the reports and audits did not come to his attention, but he said it is now clear that there is a much bigger problem in military health care. "I couldn't be madder, and I couldn't be more embarrassed and ashamed of the kinds of things that have turned up, because clearly it's not what my impression would have been based upon the feedback that I've gotten as I've talked to soldiers and the family," he said.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), the ranking Republican on the committee, cited an Oct. 12, 2006, Army memo indicating that a review team found problems with billeting, staffing and other issues at Building 18, the outpatient residential facility whose substandard conditions have been at the heart of the recent scandal. Both Weightman and Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army surgeon general, who previously commanded Walter Reed, acknowledged under questioning that they had been briefed on the findings.

"You knew these were problems," Davis said. "You may not have known specifically what it looked like, and you may not have been able to put faces and stories behind it, but there was an ongoing concern."

Kiley told Davis that his staff "informed me that the Walter Reed staff was working it, that they recognized that there were issues, and that they were taking action."

Kiley came in for tough criticism yesterday for his roles as commander of Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, when problems were developing at the facility, and as surgeon general since 2004, with responsibility for the Army medical command. Kiley accepted responsibility but defended his motives. "I've spent my entire life taking care of patients, training doctors to take care of patients. And I'm committed to Army medicine and committed to taking care of soldiers and their families," he said.

The comments from Davis and other GOP lawmakers underscored the bipartisan nature of the criticism yesterday in the first of what is likely to be a string of hearings probing problems at Walter Reed and in military health care more broadly. With anger building among military families and veterans groups, Republicans have seemed less reluctant to criticize the administration, and the White House is moving to try to get ahead of the political furor by naming a bipartisan commission to examine the care received by soldiers wounded in Afghanistan or Iraq.

Appearing yesterday morning before the national legislative conference of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Vice President Cheney said that President Bush "has made our administration's priority very clear to the Congress and to the country: There will be no excuses, only action. And the federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down. We're going to fix the problems at Walter Reed, period."

Yesterday's hearing, in the main building at Walter Reed, offered more grist for the developing political storm. The emotional impact was provided by three witnesses speaking on behalf of patients at Walter Reed: Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, who lives by the battlefield ethos of not leaving the wounded behind; Annette McLeod, an Army wife who would not stand silent as her injured husband was pushed aside, and Spec. Jeremy Duncan, who spoke out when he could not get the mold in his room removed.

Shannon was shot in the head during a firefight near Ramadi, Iraq, in November 2004 and has languished at Walter Reed ever since, awaiting plastic surgery so he can be fitted with a prosthetic eye. Paperwork for his retirement from the Army has been on hold.

But his ire yesterday was less about his own treatment than about the sense of betrayal he feels for younger soldiers he has tried to shepherd through the bureaucracy at Walter Reed.

"I will not see young men and women who have had their lives shattered in service to their country receive anything less than dignity and respect," said Shannon, who at times said he is having difficulty controlling his anger.

He said some injured troops encounter so much bureaucracy that they give up and forgo benefits to which they are entitled. "I have seen so many soldiers get so frustrated with the process that they will sign anything presented to them, just so they can get on with their lives," he said.

Shannon, who wore a patch over his missing left eye, also said the cost of treating thousands of service members wounded in Iraq should be dealt with honestly. "The system can't be trusted," he said. "And soldiers get less than they deserve from a system seemingly designed and run to cut the costs associated with fighting this war."

McLeod, whose husband suffered a brain injury near the Iraqi border, described her frustration at getting help from the chain of command at Walter Reed. She scoffed at suggestions that higher-ups did not know about the problems. "I have one question: Were they deaf?" she said. "Because I worked the chain. I went anywhere they would listen. So if you don't want to hear it, you don't want to hear it."

During her testimony, McLeod often appeared on the verge of tears, and at one point she wiped her eyes.

In the wake of such testimony, the official witnesses offered little pushback. Instead, Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, offered a withering analysis of the problems faced by wounded soldiers in negotiating the process for ongoing care and disability benefits after they receive initial life-saving treatment at military facilities.

"Our counselors and case managers are overworked, and they do not receive enough training," Cody said. "We do not adequately communicate necessary information. Our administrative processes are needlessly cumbersome and, quite frankly, take too long. Our medical holding units are not manned to the proper level, and we do not assign leaders who can ensure a proper accountability, proper discipline and well-being of our wounded soldiers and their health, welfare and morale, and our facilities are not maintained to the standards that we know is right."

Cody also noted that the 2005 decision by the federal base-closing commission to close Walter Reed in the midst of a war has caused problems getting "the best people" to work at the hospital, and he suggested that the decision be reexamined "during this long war."

'Serious Reforms' At Walter Reed Urged (USAT)

By Douglas Stanglin

USA Today, March 6, 2007

The chairman of a House panel holding hearings today on the care of wounded veterans at Walter Reed Army Hospital said problems at the facility are only the "tip of the iceberg" of poor treatment that extends throughout the military health care system.

"This is the wrong way to treat our troops and serious reforms need to happen immediately," said Rep. John Tierney, D-Mass., in opening hearings in the hospital's auditorium.

ON DEADLINE: Army brass face Walter Reed grilling

Maj. Gen. George Weightman, who was dismissed last week as commander of the Washington-based hospital, acknowledged in his testimony to "failures of leadership" at Walter Reed.

"Mistakes were made, and I was in charge," Weightman said.

Other top Army officers also offered their apologies. "We have let some soldiers down," said Peter Geren, the undersecretary of the Army.

Tierney, chairman of the national security subcommittee of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, called the hearings after a series of articles in The Washington Post two weeks ago about alleged substandard conditions and bureaucratic problems at the Army-run facility.

The newspaper reported on moldy walls, rats and roaches at the outpatient facility where soldiers are sent after their initial treatment at the main hospital. The series also examined the frustrations of wounded soldiers from the Iraq and Afghan wars who face a bureaucratic nightmare in seeking medical help.

"Rats and cockroaches don't burrow and infest overnight," Tierney said. "Mold and holes in ceilings don't occur in a week. And complaints of bureaucratic indifference have been reported for years."

The panel heard wrenching testimony from two wounded soldiers and the wife of a veteran who quit her job to fight the bureaucracy to get him help.

"My life was ripped apart the day my husband was injured," said Annette McLeod, whose husband, Walter, was hit in the head by a steel cargo door while working in Iraq. "And having to live through the mess that we lived through at Walter Reed has been worse than anything I've ever sacrificed in my life."

She said that when hospital officials found out her husband had had trouble with math in high school, they tried to use that to claim he had a learning disability and was mentally retarded, and therefore didn't qualify for treatment of a brain injury.

"He was considered fit enough to serve in the National Guard for 16 years. He was fit enough for deployment. But now they're saying he had his mental problem before he went to Iraq," she said.

Sgt. John Shannon, who lost his left eye and suffered traumatic injury after a firefight with insurgents in Iraq in 2004, said he was lost in the bureaucracy for weeks after he was discharged from the main hospital to the outpatient facility, known as the Mologne House.

Shannon said the staff handed him a photocopied map the grounds and sent him on his way.

"I was extremely disoriented and wandered around while looking for someone to direct me," he said. "Eventually, I found it."

After that, Shannon said, he was shunted from doctor to doctor and at one point had to start over because his records were lost.

"The system can't be trusted," he said. "And soldiers get less than they deserve from a system seemingly designed and run to cut the costs associated with fighting this war."

Tierney said he had concerns that the Army is "trying to whitewash over the problems."

"There appears to be a pattern developing here that we've seen before," he said. "First deny, then try to cover up, then designate a fall guy."

Tierney also suggested that the treatment of a large number of wounded soldiers from Iraq reflected "terrible planning" by the administration over the war.

The lawmaker said he is afraid "these problems go well beyond the walls of Walter Reed," adding that "as we send more and more troops into Iraq and Afghanistan, these problems are only going to get worse, not better."

Tierney also noted that an internal Army memo in September described the exodus of highly skilled and experienced personnel at Walter Reed following the Army's decision to privatize some aspects of health care.

The memo, he said, warned that the loss of staff and the increased workload because of the Iraq and Afghan wars put patient care services at risk of "mission failure."

The panel heard testimony from patients, hospital staff, relatives of wounded soldiers and top Army officials responsible for the facility. The defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee also opened hearings today into the scandal.

The public outcry over the issue has mobilized Congress and the White House. On Saturday, in his weekly radio address, President Bush vowed quick action to correct any problems and said care for wounded veterans was a top priority for his administration.

Bush has also ordered a sweeping review of conditions at the nation's network of military and veterans hospitals, which have been overwhelmed by injured troops from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The White House said the president would name a bipartisan commission to assess whether the problems at Walter Reed exist at other facilities.

Addressing war veterans today, Vice President Cheney promised that the problems at Walter Reed will be fixed.

"There will be no excuses, only action," Cheney told a gathering of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. "And the federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down."

AUDIO: Cheney: Bush administration determined to ensure proper care for vets

Robert Gates, the new secretary of Defense, has moved quickly to hold top Army officials accountable. After Weightman's dismissal, the man who fired him, Army Secretary Francis Harvey, also was dismissed. Gates said Harvey was not aggressive enough to address the problem.

Gates was particularly upset that Harvey chose as Weightman's temporary successor Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the Army's surgeon general and a recent former commander of Walter Reed.

The Army announced that Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker will be the new commander of Walter Reed. In addition, the branch took disciplinary action against several lower-level soldiers at the hospital.

Gates, who was visibly angry in announcing Harvey's dismissal, also has created an outside panel to review the situation at Walter Reed and the other major military hospital in the Washington area, the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

In a letter to Gates on Sunday, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., called for an independent commission, possibly headed by former secretary of State Colin Powell, to investigate all post-combat medical facilities and recommend changes.

"To think that men and women are serving their country in the most honorable and courageous way possible and all we give them is a dilapidated, rat-infested, run-down building to recover is a disgrace," Schumer wrote. "My fear is that Walter Reed is just the tip of the iceberg, and merely highlights the pervasive and systemic mistreatment of our servicemembers."

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Sunday on CBS' Face the Nation that the scandal is emblematic of the Bush administration's "lack of accountability" and "over-optimism" about the war in Iraq.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., appearing on ABC's This Week, said he likely would support a commission such as the one Schumer proposed.

"Investigations are not always the best way to go, but I think we ought to do whatever's necessary," he said.

Walter Reed In Spotlight (RC)

By Paul Singer

Roll Call, March 6, 2007

Democrats launched their first major investigation of the 110th Congress on Monday with hearings on conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and suggested that weak Republican oversight contributed to the problems experienced by wounded soldiers there.

As the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee convened a hearing at Walter Reed, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) issued a statement proclaiming the beginning of "long overdue oversight of the Bush administration."

Pelosi spokesman Nadeam Elshami said: "The American people spoke clearly in the November elections that they wanted accountability and oversight. Under the Republican Congress it has been almost nonexistent, and you can certainly see that with what occurred at Walter Reed."

Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), chairman of the subcommittee on national security and foreign affairs, which hosted the hearing, said in an interview afterward that "we should have known all this before. ... There just hasn't been enough oversight." Tierney said he anticipates holding another hearing on the matter within the next 45 days and promised "we are going to stay on this thing until we get it fixed."

Republicans rejected the notion that they had failed to investigate conditions at Walter Reed, and cited a range of hearings and oversight activities on military health care that preceded the Democratic majority.

The Walter Reed hearing Monday was spawned by a series of published reports depicting wounded soldiers living in squalid conditions in a ramshackle dormitory.

But mice and mold were not the leading issues for the hearing. Instead lawmakers focused on the Byzantine process a wounded soldier must endure as the military attempts to establish how badly wounded the soldier is, and how his or her disability should be classified. This process has created a backlog that strains the medical center's capacity to respond to its wounded, officials said.

Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the army's surgeon general, testified Monday that the Walter Reed outpatient population has swelled during the Iraq War, and the medical review process that is required before a patient can leave the facility may take a year or longer. "Beginning in 2003, the population of active and reserve component soldiers assigned to [medical holding units on the campus] increased from 100-120 before the war, to a high of 874 in the summer of 2005," Kiley said.

Families have no reliable guide through the process and military decisions on physical disabilities may be confusing and contradictory, particularly since the Department of Veterans Affairs frequently comes to a different disability determination than the Defense Department did using the same ranking systems and in reference to the same wounds.

Republicans point out that they have charted many of these problems in oversight hearings in recent years. For instance, in February 2005 the Government Reform Committee under the gavel of then-Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) held a hearing on the convoluted system of designating disabilities. Davis pointed out at the time that "the Army lacks compassionate, customer friendly service," and said in his opening statement for that hearing, "I'm appalled that these men and women not only have had to face recovery from their war wounds, but are forced to navigate a confusing and seemingly uncaring system of benefits."

Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) wrote Monday in an e-mail that prior to the Democratic takeover, "The Committee handled 78 individual cases, recognized flaws in the system and were putting pressure on the Army to fix them. Army officials testified they were aware of the problems and were making progress. When I visited Walter Reed, I met with the wounded soldiers who were not yet in the outpatient labyrinth."

Tierney said many Members of Congress had probably dealt with individual cases of constituents seeking relief from the military bureaucracy, but had not realized that was part of a larger institutional problem. "We've all heard different stories," he said. "When you have a complaint, you get it resolved, you do your constituent service and don't realize it may be part of something broader."

Soldiers Testify Over Poor Care At Walter Reed (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — Members of Congress heard wrenching testimony on Monday from wounded soldiers treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and contrite promises from top Army officials to correct the conditions there.

The general who most recently commanded Walter Reed, a premier military hospital in Washington, and the Army's surgeon general accepted responsibility for the situation faced by some wounded troops, including poor housing, neglect and a hopelessly complicated bureaucratic maze.

The Army officials said they were working to address the problems at Walter Reed and were examining the situation at other medical centers.

"We have let some soldiers down," said Pete Geren, the acting secretary of the Army, addressing the panel before the hearing began.

The hearing was held by a subcommittee of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, whose members convened in an auditorium at Walter Reed, in deference to the soldiers who were to testify. The unusual venue also provided a vivid backdrop for the hearing, the first of several that Congressional committees intended to hold.

The subcommittee members heard first from two soldiers badly wounded in Iraq and from the spouse of another soldier injured in Iraq about their experiences at Walter Reed. Together, the three's stories set the emotional tenor for the testimony from military officials that followed.

Wearing a black eye patch, Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon described how he was struck in the head by a round from an AK-47 in November 2004 during a firefight near Ramadi, causing a traumatic brain injury and the loss of an eye.

Within a week of the injury, he was released to outpatient treatment, Sergeant Shannon recounted.

Despite being extremely disoriented, he said, he was given a map and told to find his own way to his new residence on the hospital's sprawling grounds. He wandered into a building and received directions.

He then waited several weeks wondering whether anyone would contact him about additional treatment, eventually calling people himself until he reached his case worker.

He told of languishing in the hospital's bureaucratic system that evaluates soldiers for continuing in active duty or becoming medically retired, and what benefits they should receive. His paperwork, he said, was lost repeatedly, forcing him to start over several times.

Specialist Jeremy Duncan, one ear shredded by a makeshift bomb, told of the moldy living conditions in Building 18.

"It wasn't fit for anybody to live in a room like that," Specialist Duncan said.

Annette L. McLeod, whose husband, Wendell, returned from Iraq with a head injury, spoke emotionally of her distress during his treatment.

"My life was ripped apart the day my husband was injured, and having to live through the mess we've had to live through at Walter Reed has been worse than anything I've had to sacrifice in my life," Mrs. McLeod said through tears.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said he was "extraordinarily angry and embarrassed" by the living conditions at the hospital, reported prominently last month by The Washington Post. His brother, Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker, a senior medical officer, has now been named to command Walter Reed. The Army officials said extensive repairs were being made to deal with the deplorable conditions at one of the facilities on the hospital campus, Building 18, in which soldiers getting outpatient treatment at the hospital were found to be living in crumbling rooms soiled by mice, cockroaches and mold. Most of the soldiers living there, they said, have now been moved.

Accusations about shoddy treatment received by wounded soldiers at the prominent hospital, which is the centerpiece of the military's medical system, have touched a public nerve and deeply embarrassed the military in the past few weeks. The Bush administration has been thrown on the defensive, and members of Congress have been quick to express outrage.

"This is absolutely the wrong way to treat our troops, and serious reforms need to happen immediately," said Representative John F. Tierney, a Massachusetts Democrat who is the chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's subcommittee on national security and foreign affairs.

Mr. Tierney declared the problems at Walter Reed to be part of broader dysfunction at military health care facilities across the country and wondered whether it was "another horrific consequence of the terrible planning that went into our invasion of Iraq." He warned of a coming crunch with Mr. Bush's new plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"As we send more and more troops into Iraq and Afghanistan," Mr. Tierney said, "these problems are only going to get worse, not better."

Last week, Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was ousted over his handling of the revelations at Walter Reed, and officials changed the hospital's commanding officer twice in as many days.

Speaking at a meeting of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Vice President Dick Cheney restated on Monday the White House's promise fix the problems at Walter Reed.

"There will be no excuses, only action," Mr. Cheney said.

"As we work to improve conditions at Walter Reed, we want to find out whether similar problems have occurred at other military" and veterans' hospitals, he said. "These brave men and women deserve the heartfelt thanks of our country, and they deserve the very best medical care that our government can possibly provide."

Members of the committee from both parties were sharply critical during the hearing, some arguing that government audits and news articles have hinted at similar problems for years. Representative Tom Davis of Virginia, the ranking Republican on the committee, said the military's entire system for handling wounded veterans was in need of a "top-down overhaul."

"You're not going to be able to Scotch tape over it," Mr. Davis said.

Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the surgeon general of the Army, who also headed Walter Reed several years ago, apologized to soldiers and said the bureaucratic process they faced demanded "urgent simplification."

"We really need to reinvent this process," General Kiley said.

General Kiley was initially appointed to replace Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman as commander of the hospital last week, but the appointment came under fire because he had previously appeared to play down problems at the hospital when he was in command in 2004.

He was pressed on Monday to explain how he had not known about the conditions at Building 18, even though he lived across the street from it. He explained that inspections of barracks were not part of his normal job duties. But the subcommittee members continued to hammer him, asking why he had not taken action earlier to deal with the challenges faced by wounded soldiers and wondered whether recent efforts to contract out services to civilians had left the hospital depleted.

"I want you to know that I think this is a massive failure of competency and management and command," said Representative Paul W. Hodes, Democrat of New Hampshire.

Beyond specific steps to streamline the bureaucratic process that is faced by wounded troops and to improve living conditions, military officials said it might be time to re-evaluate whether Walter Reed should be closed in several years, as had been previously planned as part of a national base reorganization process.

Several patients at Walter Reed attended the hearing Monday and echoed some of the problems described. But Staff Sgt. Brian Beem, who lost his right leg to a makeshift bomb in Baghdad in October, said he had had no idea conditions were so bad for some of his counterparts, even though he had heard grumbling.

"At my level," Sergeant Beem said, "I'm ignorant of it."

Walter Reed Army Medical Center Shapes War Debate (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

DOJ_NMG_0140661

A House Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee hearing on the conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center yesterday could further pressure Democratic leaders to adopt a more stringent approach to paying for the war in Iraq.

House Democratic leaders are considering how to proceed on several war-related spending bills. After passing a resolution condemning Bush's troops surge with just 17 Republican votes, Democrats spent last week discussing how to challenge President Bush's authority to manage the war.

Some rank-and-file centrist Democrats have challenged a proposal from Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee and a leading anti-war critic, that would tie funding for the war to soldiers' readiness.

"I would suspect [the hearings] would add to anti-war pressures," said Rep. Paul Hodes (D-N.H.), who attended the talks. "It certainly gives weight to Jack Murtha's argument that unless there is adequate time between deployments, [Bush] is proposing a troop increase for a system that can't handle casualties."

Rep. John Yarmuth (D-Ky.), a freshman Democrat who defeated a GOP incumbent, said that the scandal at Walter Reed would add to anti-war pressures.

Other Democrats said the pressure will shift to the Republcans.

"The real pressure will be on Republicans to support our troops by voting for the supplemental spending bill," said a Democratic aide. He indicated that there would be extra money for veterans' healthcare programs in that bill.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), attended yesterday's hearing and said he saw "political dangers" ahead for the Bush administration.

"It's another example of failing to take action in the face of facts staring them in the face," he said.

The scandal adds further support for the Democrats' position "that the administration just botched this war from the beginning, not just in Iraq but to address the needs of returning soldiers," he added.

There was not enough room in the small auditorium at Walter Reed for the bipartisan outrage as lawmakers listened to wounded soldiers, Army officials and a Government Accountability Office investigator testify about the conditions at the Army's premier medical facility. The panel's subcommittee on National Security and Foreign Affairs ran the hearing.

The fast-paced, skeptical questions from Democrats and unusually harsh criticism from GOP lawmakers indicated a sea change in Washington since last year's mid-term elections.

"The frustration of these poor, injured veterans coming back — it is systemic. And I'm afraid this is just the tip of the iceberg. When we got out into the field, we may find more of this," said Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), the senior Republican on the panel.

"I didn't notice any partisan divide in the hearing today. We were all on one page," said Yarmuth, who met last week with former Miss America Heather French, the wife of Kentucky's lieutenant governor and a veterans advocate.

Some lawmakers even praised the media for reporting on conditions at Walter Reed.

Subcommittee chairman John Tierney (D-Mass.) reminded members that he was conducted a hearing, not an inquisition. Lawmakers minded his advice until Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the U.S. Army Surgeon General, and Major General George Weightman, who was recently fired as Walter Reed's commander, sat down at the witness table.

Several lawmakers, including Rep. Bruce Braley (D-Iowa), asked two wounded soldiers and a wounded national guardsman's wife whether they had any help navigating the Army's health care system. The witnesses repeatedly said there were few people with knowledge and expertise who could help them.

"One of the concerns was that there was no advocacy," said Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.). "It's an excellent idea and it has broad support."

There were no memorable moments of confrontation between the lawmakers and Army officials. But without raising their voices, Democrats pounded on the Bush administration's push to privatize services at Walter Reed.

Committee Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) and other Democrats blamed the Bush administration for privatizing outpatient care services at Walter Reed, which in turn led to a decline in the quality of care and a mass exodus of qualified care givers.

"A $120 million contract [led to] downsizing, and shows that there is an ideology still at work that puts profit ahead of public services," said Welch. "That has to change."

While Democrats called the hearing, the most animated lawmakers were those most affected by the war in Iraq, including Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and freshmen Democrats.

Shays, whose support for the war in Iraq nearly cost him his congressional seat, said, "What I wrestle with is that there's not anyone involved in this that didn't know there were challenges. How can we know when a problem is being addressed? Is it something where we need to have hearings every two months?"

"I'm appalled, I'm outraged," said Hodes, adding that he could barely contain his frustration as Army officials testified that they did not know about the squalid conditions and bureaucratic mismanagement.

"There will be no excuses, only action. And the federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down. We're going to fix the problems at Walter Reed, period," he said.

Congress will hold more hearings this week on Walter Reed. The Senate Armed Services Committee and the House and Senate Veterans Affairs Committees will meet tomorrow. Murtha postponed a hearing yesterday.

Walter Reed Hearing Brings Outrage And Apologies (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Adam Schreck

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Top Army officials faced angry lawmakers during an emotional hearing Monday on shoddy medical treatment and living conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, acknowledging that they had failed in the care of wounded veterans.

Calling the scandal at Walter Reed "the tip of the iceberg of what is going on all around the country," Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said veterans and their families were "flooding us with complaints" about bad medical care.

Waxman, citing news stories and congressional reports that revealed the hospital's problems over the last two years, cast doubt on Army officials' assertions that they were surprised by disclosures that injured soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan had been treated shabbily.

"We get officials who say they just didn't know things were happening," Waxman said. "I have a long list, a stack of reports and articles that sounded the alarm bells about what was going on here and around the country."

Army Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, fired as commander of the hospital complex last week, took responsibility for the problems.

"I failed," he said at the hearing. "We can't fail one of these soldiers or their families, not one. And we did."

Turning from the congressional panel to face a veteran and his family, Weightman expressed regret for a bureaucratic maze that forced the soldier's wife to battle the Army to get her husband proper medical treatment.

"I'd just like to apologize for not meeting their expectations," he said.

Several lawmakers accused Army brass of making Weightman, the medical center's commander for six months, the scapegoat for the problems at Walter Reed. Veterans groups think he had made progress in reducing the ratio of case managers to patients and in spotlighting post-traumatic stress disorder.

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was forced to resign last week over the scandal.

Weightman's predecessors — retired Maj. Gen. Kenneth L. Farmer Jr., who had commanded the hospital complex from 2004 until August, and Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who was in charge from 2002 to 2004 — have not been disciplined.

After Weightman was fired, Kiley was named interim commander of Walter Reed but was removed a day later. Kiley remains the Army's surgeon general.

"Tell me why [Weightman] got the ax and why the others walk on the earth today," said Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), chairman of the subcommittee that held the hearings. "Where has all the brass been?"

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, responded angrily.

DOJ_NMG_0140663

"I've got a daughter and a son-in-law that are on the way to combat," said Schoomaker, whose younger brother, Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, has been named to run Walter Reed. "This is not something about people [who] don't care, and I am not going to sit here and have anybody tell me that we don't care."

Tierney shot back, "Nobody said anything about people not caring." He called Schoomaker's response a "red herring."

The burgeoning scandal over medical treatment for returning troops, much like the government's flawed response to Hurricane Katrina, is exposing weaknesses in federal crisis management.

Members of Congress promised more hearings on the maze of red tape that wounded soldiers confronted.

"You've been fighting a war," Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) said to veterans. "You shouldn't have to come back here and fight a system."

Peter Schoomaker promised to address the problems.

"I couldn't be madder, and I couldn't be more embarrassed and ashamed," he said.

Lawmakers questioned the policy under which maintenance and operations at Walter Reed were outsourced to IAP Worldwide Services Inc., a Florida firm run by a former Halliburton official who reduced Walter Reed's staff from 300 to 100.

"We've contracted out so much in this war," Waxman said. "We have mercenaries instead of U.S. military.... We are, in Iraq, overpaying for the work of the contractors, and here we're under-serving our military."

The subcommittee made the unusual decision to move the hearing from Capitol Hill to a wood-paneled auditorium at Walter Reed.

As soldiers in camouflage fatigues and sand-colored boots roamed the scrubbed hallways outside, lawmakers squeezed shoulder to shoulder onto a dais in the auditorium. They listened intently to the testimony of two injured soldiers and the wife of a third. All recounted problems and hurdles at the hospital — stories that first captured public attention in articles in the Washington Post last month.

Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, who is waiting for plastic surgery so he can wear a prosthetic eye, was angry that Harvey was allowed to resign.

"I don't know how things work in Washington, D.C., but in combat, we don't get to resign when bullets are flying and people are dying," Shannon said.

His advice to Army officials: "Pull themselves up by their bootstraps like any sergeant would do, admit to their mistakes and work to fix them until they're fixed."

Spc. Jeremy Duncan, injured by a roadside bomb in Iraq, lost sight in one eye, fractured his neck and almost lost his left arm. He was housed in now-infamous Building 18.

"It wasn't fit for anybody to live in a room like that," he said, describing holes in the walls and black mold that exposed vulnerable patients to infection.

Duncan said nothing was repaired despite repeated reports and complaints.

"That's when I contacted the Washington Post," he said.

After the newspaper reported the squalid conditions, "I was immediately moved from that room, and the next day they were renovating the room."

Another witness, Annette McLeod, said she became such a ferocious advocate for her husband's medical care that the case manager "got tired of dealing with me."

"I was very persistent," McLeod said. "Anybody that would listen to me, I would talk."

Asked if she spoke to Farmer, the former head of Walter Reed, she said, "I did. I was at his office door for several days and each time they turned me around.... They told me he did not have time to talk to me."

McLeod recounted the story of a young soldier who, on his return from Iraq, was diagnosed with bipolar disorder. The Army said it was a preexisting condition and refused disability payments.

"This is how we treat our soldiers," she said. "We give them nothing, but they're good and tough [enough] to go and sacrifice their lives. And we give them nothing."

Two Generals Provide A Contrast In Accountability (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0140664

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Kevin Kiley, the three-star general in charge of all Army medical facilities, seemed stumped as he testified yesterday about his responsibility for the Walter Reed scandal.

"I'm trying not to say that I'm not accountable," he told members of the House oversight committee.

But try as he might, he couldn't fix blame on himself.

How could he not have known that wounded soldiers were living in squalid conditions across the street from his own home? "I don't do barracks inspections at Walter Reed," he said.

Why did he assure Congress in 2005 that the Walter Reed bureaucracy was improving, even though many soldiers were languishing in neglect at the facility? "In my role as the MedCom commander," he said, "Walter Reed was not my only command."

What did he do when a government report in 2006 found numerous problems at the now-infamous Building 18? "My staff informed me that the Walter Reed staff was working on it."

Lawmakers on the committee, who were visiting Walter Reed Army Medical Center for a field hearing yesterday, quickly tired of the general's I-don't-do-windows routine. Rep. Bruce Braley (D-Iowa) accused him of spouting "hogwash." Rep. Chris Shays (R-Conn.) called his position "dishonest."

"I want you to know that I think this is a massive failure of competence in management and command," said Rep. Paul Hodes (D-N.H.), pointing his finger at Kiley.

After Hodes's harangue, Kiley replied, "I command by commanding through my commanders and trusting them to execute the mission."

Sitting shoulder to shoulder with Kiley was one such commander, Gen. George Weightman, who last week was fired as chief of Walter Reed after just six months on the job. Weightman and Kiley, who ran Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, wore matching Army dress uniforms, but their responses could not have been more divergent. While Kiley deflected blame, Weightman freely admitted failure -- even though the victims of Walter Reed's neglect testified, and the House committee members agreed, that he was not to blame.

"He was, in my perspective, being punished because he caught the tail end of it," testified Annette McLeod, whose ordeal with her wounded soldier-husband, Dell, was one of those chronicled in a Washington Post series on Walter Reed. "Because somebody had to be the fall guy, he was there."

After Annette McLeod's testimony, the couple sat in the first row of the audience, just three feet from Weightman and Kiley as the two generals testified. "The McLeods are right behind you," pointed out Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va). "Do you have anything you want to say to them?"

"I feel terrible for them," said Kiley, keeping his back to the McLeods. "We have got to double our efforts, redouble our efforts, to make these kind of cases disappear in the system."

Weightman, by contrast, turned around to the McLeods and spoke warmly, addressing Annette directly. "I'd just like to apologize for not meeting their expectations, not only in the care provided, but also in having so many bureaucratic processes that just took your fortitude to be an advocate for your husband that you shouldn't have to do," Weightman said, as Kiley finally turned to face the McLeods. "I promise we will do better."

When the two generals were eventually excused, Weightman again turned to the McLeods and shook hands with them; though he spoke quietly, the words "I'm sorry" were clear. Kiley left the room without a glance backward.

Members of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee shook their heads in amazement as Annette McLeod testified tearfully that she didn't know her husband had been hurt in Iraq "until he called me himself from a hospital in New Jersey."

They reacted similarly when another Walter Reed patient profiled by The Post, Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, spoke about how, while recovering from being shot in the head in Iraq, he was left "extremely disoriented" to wander the Walter Reed campus alone in search of an outpatient facility. The third member of the panel, Spec. Jeremy Duncan, who had two studs where his left ear used to be, described the "unforgivable" squalor of his room at Walter Reed.

But nobody blamed Weightman. "I don't think he should have been fired," said Shannon, wearing a patch over his missing eye.

The lawmakers seemed to agree. "There appears to be a pattern developing here that we've seen before," said Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.) "First deny, then try to cover up, then designate a fall guy." Rep. Stephen Lynch (D-Mass.) advised Weightman that "you probably have a little more blame being laid at your doorstep than I think is probably appropriate." And Rep. John Duncan (R-Tenn.) shared the view of a colleague's wife that Kiley "skirted this stuff for five years and blamed everyone else."

Weightman was not so easy on himself; he pleaded guilty repeatedly to a "failure of leadership," and said lawmakers were "absolutely right" to question what was "obviously a failure."

Kiley started off in similar fashion, saying he was "personally and professionally sorry" and acknowledging: "I share these failures." But the further he got from his prepared testimony, the less contrite he became. He was blameless after Walter Reed shifted maintenance to a private contractor in 2004. "I was not the commander then."

Shouldn't top officers make sure proper care is being given at every level? "I don't get involved at my level . . . at an individual issue."

Will he find a way to break down privacy obstacles that hampered proper care? "I'm not in charge of it, but I'll take care of it."

Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.), like his colleagues, was skeptical about Weightman's guilt and Kiley's self-exoneration; he wondered if Kiley thought the problems at Walter Reed "have been in existence for over six months."

Kiley responded with something about "two 15-6 investigations" and something else about the "MEB/PEB process."

"The information we have to date is that General Weightman in fact was trying to work through these problems; he's been fired," Welch continued. "Is that an appropriate response to the situation?

"That is a decision for the civilian leadership," Kiley answered.

Whatever the merits of Weightman's dismissal, the problems at Walter Reed have not disappeared with him. Before yesterday's hearing, a patient with a prosthetic arm tried to get in but was stopped by a guard, who asked if the young man was supposed to be in the hearing. "I'd like to be," the soldier said.

"It's preselected, unfortunately," the guard replied. The young amputee walked away. Inside, three rows of seats had been reserved for the Army; almost all were empty.

Testimony At Walter Reed (WP)

IN A DIM auditorium at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center yesterday, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, the recently ousted commander of the facility, turned and apologized directly to the maimed soldiers and their families who had assembled for a House subcommittee hearing. Once during the hearing, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, Army surgeon general and former Walter Reed commander, tried to frame the situation as a failure of lower-ranking personnel and characterized an article in The Post as "yellow journalism." Gen. Kiley has reason to be defensive -- he is arguably more to blame for the miserable outpatient conditions described in a recent Post series than is Gen. Weightman but still serves as the Army's top doctor. Nevertheless, he, too, apologized, and he acknowledged that he is ultimately responsible for outpatient facilities. And Gen. Kiley, along with Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, and Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, the new head of Walter Reed, assured the subcommittee that thorough reviews of outpatient facilities will lead to significant reform.

Also encouraging was Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates's swift firing of Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey on Friday after Harvey nonsensically removed Gen. Weightman from his position and placed Gen. Kiley temporarily in charge. Mr. Gates seems to be holding upper tiers of Army management to account.

Being sorry is only the first step, however. Since the series was published, Post reporters have received hundreds of accounts of appalling conditions and management practices at both Army outpatient facilities and Department of Veterans Affairs facilities across the country. One mother complained that a room assigned to her son, who had an open wound, was infested with fruit flies and contained overflowing trash and a syringe. A soldier said that wounded veterans had to sign waivers attesting that they understood that their living conditions were below minimum governmental standards. Most disturbing are reports of

Army medical review boards trying to pay wounded soldiers as little as possible in disability benefits, sometimes adjudicating veterans' claims while they were heavily medicated and unable to argue their cases effectively.

Fixing veterans' outpatient care will take a lot more than putting a new roof on Walter Reed's Building 18. It means revamping buildings and bureaucracies across the country. The generals who testified yesterday made an excellent point: More injured soldiers survive now than ever before because of the quality of the Army's inpatient medicine, and the nature of their physical and psychological wounds often makes those injuries difficult to diagnose and treat. Since American action began in Afghanistan, this country has taken on a large responsibility to care for its wounded service members, for life if needed. It may be expensive, but these men and women deserve clean accommodations and straightforward assistance -- not adversity -- from administrators. If the accounts The Post has received over the past couple of weeks are true, then the Army and Veterans Affairs are both far from achieving that goal.

Casualties Of The Budget Wars (NYT)

By Paul D. Eaton

Fox Island, Wash.

IN his 1997 book "Dereliction of Duty," Col. H. R. McMaster wrote that "the 'five silent men' on the Joint Chiefs made possible the way the United States went to war in Vietnam." So it is today with the war in Iraq. Regrettably, the silence of our top officers has had a huge impact not just on the battlefield but also on how we have brought our injured warriors home from it. These planning failures led to the situation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center recently reported by The Washington Post, which resulted in the firings of the hospital's commander and the secretary of the Army.

The sad truth is that The Post's reports weren't entirely new: Mark Benjamin, of United Press International and the Web magazine Salon, and Steve Robinson, the director of veterans affairs at Veterans for America, have been reporting on the disgraceful treatment of our war wounded since 2003. More important, the Walter Reed scandal is simply the tip of the iceberg: President Bush, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Congress all pointedly failed to provide the money and resources for our returned troops wherever they are, both the obviously wounded and those who may seem healthy but are suffering mentally and physically from their service.

Soldiers have long joked: "If you are really sick or injured, Army medical care is O.K. But if you are hurting only a little, especially if it isn't visible, you're in big trouble." The American soldier still receives the best trauma care in the world, especially at Walter Reed. The problem there has been with deplorable outpatient care management. The military health system is seriously undermanned and underfinanced for the number of casualties coming home. Also, there has been little preparation for identifying and treating post-traumatic stress injuries.

Last year, because of spending in Iraq, the Army had a $530 million shortfall in its budget for posts at home and abroad. This forced the Army's vice chief of staff, Richard Cody, to tighten belts that were already at the last notch.

Hospitals have taken a big part of the financial hit. General Cody has warned Congress that failure to shore up the tottering military health care system could become a "retention issue." David Chu, the Pentagon's under secretary for personnel and readiness, told The Wall Street Journal that veterans' costs "are taking away from the nation's ability to defend itself."

The result is that Walter Reed and every other domestic Army post have struggled to house soldiers properly after their release from the hospital. For the lucky ones, family members pick up the slack, making sure that follow-up care is provided, that prescription drug regimens are followed, that therapists show up for rehabilitation sessions. Those without family help tend to slip between the cracks.

Walter Reed, in particular, has another problem. The Base Realignment and Closure Commission decided in 2005 to shutter this critical hospital. I won't debate that decision now — what's done is done — but when the commission decides you will close within a few years, money dries up real fast. It is no wonder that buildings fell into disrepair and recovering soldiers slipped off the radar screen.

This was the fiscal environment that Maj. Gen. George Weightman stepped into last August when he took command of Walter Reed. I have known George since he was a plebe at West Point. He is bright, honorable and energetic — and always capable. But as another of his admirers told me, "He was the captain of that ship." And now he has gone down with his ship — the victim of Mr. Rumsfeld's wrongheaded cost-cutting and the joint chiefs' failure to stand up to the civilian leadership.

So, what can we do to ensure that good men like General Weightman aren't put in impossible situations and, more important, that our fighting men and women get the care they need? A good first step has been taken: Secretary of Defense Robert Gates fired the secretary of the Army, Francis Harvey, who was a true Rumsfeld man and viewed by many as more loyal to his boss than to the Army. But some other prescriptions seem obvious:

I would encourage every member of Congress, ever senior Pentagon official and every White House staff member to read the articles Mark Benjamin has written on soldier care, beginning with the 2003 report he did on Fort Stewart in Georgia. The train in this wreck left the station a long time ago.

The Pentagon must do something it has, amazingly, never tried: develop an official doctrine on how to "redeploy" a soldier from the combat zone to the peaceful zone. This means hiring mental health experts to thoroughly analyze the psychology of the returning soldier, and making a commitment to building a health care network that can meet the needs of a growing population of injured soldiers.

Congress must increase financing for research into traumatic brain injuries, the signature malady of this war. Unbelievably, in its Pentagon appropriations bill for 2007, Congress cut in half the financing for the Army's main research and treatment program on brain injury (which, no surprise, is at Walter Reed).

The government should also expand grants to the Fisher House program, a public-private partnership that has "comfort homes" at every major military medical center. These provide families of wounded troops with housing, kitchens, laundry rooms and other support services. The program serves more than 8,500 families a year, but will struggle to keep pace with the growing number of returning wounded.

Like so many government departments, the military has a medical computer system that is made up of a hodgepodge of antiquated machines with outdated software that often can't communicate with one another. This needs to be replaced with a user-friendly system that can efficiently track the wounded as they make their way through the system.

The Pentagon must revamp the Medical Evaluation Board process, the system under which a soldier suffering from injury is screened to see if he should be given a discharge and a disability pension. Cases now are handled in a haphazard way and can drag out indefinitely; each should be held to a disciplined timeline.

The general effort by Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Harvey to privatize services at Army bases needs to be reined in. Some of the problems at Walter Reed seem to have been caused by the contracting out of maintenance services and other support jobs.

While we address the needs of uniformed men and women, we need to assess our civilian employees as well; most are excellent, but some are entrenched and in need of firing.

The money to care for our soon-to-be-veteran soldiers should not come from the Defense Department budget. The immense costs of medical care are simply too attractive to Pentagon budget-cutters, creating a conflict of interest between the war effort and the health of our troops.

And, of course, we must move the outpatient soldiers out of Walter Reed immediately. It is a small, old installation with few recreational outlets in a neighborhood of Washington that is unwelcoming to patients' families. Fort Lewis in Washington State, for example, is a large, well-equipped installation in a beautiful area with a good program for recovering soldiers. And the big goal should be to get our wounded troops off bases entirely and back their own homes, with adequate medical care and insurance.

The other day I had a phone conversation with Mr. Robinson, a former Army Ranger whose group aids Persian Gulf war veterans suffering with health disorders. “The problem with Walter Reed and the nation’s defense health program is much more than money, mold and mice,” he said. “It is about leadership.” He’s right. And with Secretary Gates, I expect the Joint Chiefs of Staff to be able to resume their rightful role in our nation’s defense

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Doctors found a blood clot in Vice President Dick Cheney's left leg, but he was not admitted to a hospital and will be treated with blood thinning medication "for several months," his office said. Mr. Cheney, 66 years old, went in for tests after experiencing "mild calf discomfort" following a nine-day trip to Asia and the Middle East, his spokeswoman said. The clot, a deep venous thrombosis, may have resulted from spending long periods seated on a plane. "Treated properly, it poses a small threat," said Sean O'Donnell, chief of vascular surgery of Washington Hospital Center.

Supreme Court Declines to Hear Appeal by Ebbers of WorldCom

The Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal by former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year sentence in federal prison for his role in an $11 billion accounting fraud at the telephone company. Mr. Ebbers appealed the trial judge's refusal to grant immunity to three defense witnesses and argued that the judge wrongly instructed the jury. The court turned away the appeal without comment. A federal appeals court in New York rejected the same arguments last year.

China Aims to Deter Steel Exports

China will cut tax rebates on steel exports in an effort to curb exports and stabilize local prices. China became a net steel exporter last year as its crude-steel output rose 19%, leading to 27 antidumping or antisubsidy investigations against Chinese steel producers by 11 countries. In September, China cut tax rebates for steel exports to 8% from 11%.

Cheney To Be Treated For Blood Clot (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Vice President Cheney will be treated with blood thinners for several months after tests revealed Monday that he has a blood clot in his left leg, a spokeswoman said. Cheney visited his doctor in Washington after feeling minor discomfort in his calf, spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride said. She said an ultrasound showed the deep venous thrombosis.

Cheney, 66, returned to the White House after the exam and continued his workday. "He'll maintain his regular schedule," McBride said. "He feels fine."

The vice president returned last week from a trip that included stops in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

In 2005, he underwent six hours of surgery on his legs to repair a kind of aneurysm, a ballooning weak spot in an artery that could have burst if left untreated.

White House panel OKstwo surveillance programs

A White House board has determined that two of the Bush administration's controversial surveillance programs — electronic eavesdropping and financial tracking — do not violate citizens' civil liberties.

After operating mostly in secret for a year, the five-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Board is preparing to release its first report to Congress next week.

The report finds that both the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program and the Treasury Department's monitoring of international banking transactions have sufficient privacy protections. They have multiple layers of review before sensitive information is accessed.

"We visited NSA and met with the top people all the way down to those doing the hands-on work," said Carol Dinkins, a Houston lawyer and former Reagan administration assistant attorney general who chairs the board. "The program is structured and implemented in a way that is properly protective and attentive to civil liberties."

Lawyers seek hearing soonfor Guantanamo detainees

Former U.S. solicitor general Seth Waxman and other lawyers asked the Supreme Court to quickly hear the appeal of six detainees who have been held for more than five years at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The case would test the new Military Commissions Act, part of the Bush administration's strategy for special trials for foreign terrorist suspects held at Guantanamo.

The prisoners are appealing a decision last month by a federal appeals court in Washington that said Guantanamo detainees have no right to challenge their detention in federal court. Their lawyers say the ruling conflicts with decisions by the justices in 2004 and 2006 that said detainees could get a hearing by a federal judge.

The lawyers want the case heard May 7. They say it is urgent because of the important issue of access to U.S. courts and "oppressive conditions" at Guantanamo.

The federal appeals court ruled that the Military Commissions Act barred federal judges from hearing detainees' cases. Congress passed the act at the urging of the Bush administration after the justices' decision in June that struck down Bush's original plan for military tribunals as an alternative to regular U.S. courts.

Waxman, who was the government's top lawyer before the court during the Clinton administration, wrote: "At issue is nothing less than this country's commitment to the rule of law. Hundreds of men are currently facing lifelong imprisonment without any assurance that they will ever be tried on a criminal charge or given any fair opportunity to challenge the purported basis" of their detention.

The military has used Guantanamo since 2002 for foreigners picked up as al-Qaeda suspects in Afghanistan and elsewhere. The prisoners in the new case are Algerians arrested in Bosnia on suspicion of an attempt to commit international terrorism.

Dick Cheney Treated For Blood Clot In Leg (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

Cheney is being treated with a blood thinner intended to prevent the clot from breaking loose and reaching his lungs, said his deputy press secretary, Megan McGinn. She said Cheney, 66, had experienced "mild calf discomfort."

Cheney has been treated for multiple cardiology and vascular issues over the past three decades -- most recently undergoing surgery in September, 2005, to treat swelling in blood vessels behind both knees. He has had four heart attacks, quadruple bypass surgery, two artery-clearing angioplasty procedures, and an operation to implant a pacemaker, designed to start automatically to regulate his heartbeat if needed.

He has struggled for years to keep his weight down and has traveled with an exercise cycle stored in the cargo hold of Air Force Two.

The vice president's most recent travel took him to Japan, Australia, Oman, Pakistan and Afghanistan, a roughly 25,000-mile trip over the course of a week.

"In light of his recent prolonged air travel, he visited his doctor's office at the George Washington University Medical Faculty Associates," she said. An ultrasound revealed the clot, a deep venous thrombosis, or DVT, in his left lower leg, she said.

Cheney would be treated with the blood thinner for several months, McGinn said. The vice president's office did not make public the specific medication with which he is being treated.

McGinn said Cheney, who spoke for about 20 minutes during the morning to a convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, returned to his White House office after visiting the medical office.

Obesity, immobility and age are among the risk factors for deep venous thrombosis, said Leslie Saxon, chief of cardiology at the Keck School of Medicine at USC.

DOJ_NMG_0140670

The factors can be multiplied by air travel, Saxon said, because the lower oxygen levels in airplanes lower the oxygen in the bloodstream, increasing the risk of clots, and the dry air of the airplane increases dehydration, another factor in increasing the likelihood of clotting.

In addition, she said, "people who have heart and circulation problems don't have as vigorous a flow" of blood as healthier people.

She said the common blood thinner treatment carried some risk of promoting internal bleeding but that the risk was "extraordinarily low."

Cheney Is Treated For A Blood Clot After Trip (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — Vice President Dick Cheney was treated Monday for a blood clot in his left leg that independent experts said was probably not related to his history of heart disease but rather the result of his recent around-the-world trip, which included 65 hours of plane travel over 9 days.

Mr. Cheney's office said the vice president experienced "mild calf discomfort" sometime after delivering a late-morning speech to the Veterans of Foreign Wars and visited his doctor's office at George Washington University.

An ultrasound revealed a deep venous thrombosis, a blood clot, in the lower part of his left leg. He was treated with anticoagulant medication, which he will take for several months, and he returned to work. Although blood clots in the leg can be dangerous if left untreated, experts say most are successfully treated with the anticoagulant drugs that the White House says Mr. Cheney is now receiving.

A crucial determinant in treating blood clots in the leg is the size of the clot, which a statement Monday from Mr. Cheney's office did not describe. Nor did the statement state the clot's specific anatomical location.

In September 2005, Mr. Cheney underwent surgery to repair aneurysms, bulges in the arteries that can spawn dangerous blood clots, behind both knees. Doctors implanted devices known as stent-grafts in each of his legs.

The blood clot that was discovered in Mr. Cheney's leg on Monday was in a vein, not an artery, and several independent experts said there was most likely no connection between it and the 2005 surgery. Dr. Cameron Akbari, a senior vascular surgeon at Washington Hospital Center in the District of Columbia, said Mr. Cheney's history of heart disease put him at only "a very slightly increased risk" of developing a deep venous thrombosis.

"Reasons No. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 why he developed this are he was on a very long plane ride," Dr. Akbari said.

In otherwise healthy people, such clots most often develop among those who are sedentary, bedridden after orthopedic or major surgery, or during pregnancy. Deep venous thrombosis can also develop after long flights or car rides.

The clots form when blood pools; doctors often advise patients to walk the aisles of a plane, or make road stops every few hours to keep blood circulating. Mr. Cheney's plane, Air Force Two, is roomy, but White House officials did not say how much he walked around during his trip.

The danger from deep venous thrombosis is that a piece of the clot can break off, travel with the blood and lodge as an embolus in a lung to damage the organ or cause sudden death. Experts say an individual who experiences one episode is at risk for a recurrence.

Standard therapy is to start treatment with injections of low molecular weight heparin and Coumadin pills. Both are anticoagulant drugs (often misnamed blood thinners). Coumadin is usually continued for at least six months. In its statement, Mr. Cheney's office said he would be treated with "blood thinning medication for several months."

Doctors allow most patients to return to work after therapy starts. At least one expert, Dr. K. Craig Kent, chief of vascular surgery at New York-Presbyterian Hospital, said he would not advise a patient like Mr. Cheney to take a long plane trip in the next few days.

During his speech to veterans Monday morning, the vice president made joking reference to the trip, which covered 25,000 miles and took him to Australia, Pakistan and Afghanistan, where a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the base where Mr. Cheney had spent the night.

"As you may have heard, I've been away from Washington recently," the vice president said, adding, "Some, of course, consider that a positive."

Cheney Treated For Blood Clot In Leg (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Vice President Cheney is being treated for a blood clot that his doctor discovered in his left leg, his office announced yesterday.

Cheney's doctor at George Washington University discovered the clot during an examination yesterday after the vice president experienced mild discomfort in his calf, spokeswoman Megan McGinn said. The doctor prescribed blood-thinning medication, which Cheney is to take for several months, she said.

Cheney, who may have developed the clot during a recent trip to Afghanistan, Pakistan, Australia and elsewhere that involved extensive air travel, saw his doctor after delivering a speech yesterday morning to the national legislative conference of the Veterans of Foreign War. He then returned to the White House and continued to work.

Cheney, 66, has a long history of heart problems. He has suffered four heart attacks and has had quadruple bypass surgery, two artery-clearing angioplasties and an operation to install a pacemaker.

Cheney, who became vice president in 2001, had his last heart attack, which doctors described as slight, in 2000. He was hobbled briefly in late 2005 after having surgery to repair aneurysms behind each of his knees.

The kind of blood clot Cheney developed is known as a deep venous thrombosis, which forms in a vein deep in the body. Most deep vein clots occur in the lower leg or thigh.

Sitting for long periods of time, such as on long plane flights, can increase the risk of such clots. Cheney returned last week from his trip.

"He spent over 60 hours in the air," McGinn said.

A clot that breaks off and travels through the bloodstream can cause a deadly pulmonary embolism by lodging in a lung, a heart attack by lodging in the heart or a stroke by traveling to the brain.

A blood clot in the thigh is usually more likely to break off and cause a pulmonary embolism than a clot in the lower leg or another part of the body, according to the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute.

Making Up For Lower Pay (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

When Michael Maynard's company announced it was moving overseas, the 53-year-old machine technician from Massachusetts quickly found a job at another firm. As the sole provider for his wife and two daughters, Maynard jumped at the new opportunity, even though he had to take a pay cut of nearly $8 an hour.

Then Maynard got lucky. He discovered that, unlike most Americans who lose their jobs, he qualified for a little-known federal program that pays up to $10,000 to certain workers dislocated by trade. In addition to his regular paycheck, he gets a government check for $117 a week, he said, a sum that "helps a lot."

Now, congressional leaders want to expand the program, known as wage insurance, with some arguing that it should be available to any worker who loses a job for almost any reason. The proposal is part of a broader effort to ease the anxieties of middle-class Americans who feel threatened by the globalization of business and a churning U.S. labor market that creates and destroys about 30 million jobs a year.

The proposal is also central to the debate in Washington over trade. Democrats warn that it will be difficult for them to extend the Bush administration's authority to negotiate trade agreements unless the social safety net for U.S. workers is significantly expanded. That authority expires in June.

"There's a huge ferment out there. And part of the reason for that ferment is that for the last 12 years we have denied what was happening to people while trade just exploded," said Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.), chairman of the panel on income security and family support of the House Ways and Means Committee, which handles trade legislation.

From 2003 to 2005, 3.8 million workers were laid off from jobs they had held for at least three years because of plant closings, insufficient work or the elimination of their positions, according to data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. About 70 percent had found new jobs by January 2006. But nearly half took a pay cut, the BLS found, and 29 percent reported earnings losses of 20 percent or more.

Only a fraction of job losses are due to increased competition from imports or the transfer of jobs overseas, economists say. Nonetheless, "people do wrongly associate a lot of job loss with trade," said Rep. Jim McCrery (La.), the ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee. "So addressing this in some meaningful way is necessary to keeping us at the forefront of knocking down trade barriers."

Entire Washington think tanks have cropped up to propose solutions, including a "strategic pause" in the approval of new trade agreements, a position backed by labor, and an array of expensive social reforms to ease the pain of job loss and reemployment. The Hamilton Project, founded by former Clinton Treasury secretary Robert E. Rubin, urges continued trade liberalization along with the creation of universal health insurance, more portable pensions, more focused job-training programs and wage insurance.

In Congress, leaders from both parties are working with the Bush administration to tackle the issue in hopes of proceeding with pending trade agreements -- while responding to a surge of public anger over free-trade policies, which became evident in last year's election. In recent weeks, wage insurance has emerged as a key part of those discussions.

The concept has been around for years, but no country has tried it on a grand scale, said Lael Brainard, director of the Global Economy and Development program at the Brookings Institution. The goal, she said, is to give displaced workers "a strong incentive to search actively for new employment," even at lower pay, by "smoothing over" the reduction in income.

Unlike unemployment insurance, wage insurance rewards a worker for taking a new job, Brainard said. And unlike general job-training programs, which carry no guarantee of future employment, wage insurance subsidizes on-the-job training and, in theory, helps a worker climb back up the economic ladder.

The nation's existing wage-insurance benefit was tucked into the federal Trade Adjustment Assistance program in 2002. It applies only to manufacturing workers 50 and older who are laid off as a direct result of international trade. They are eligible if they take a new job within six months of the layoff that pays less than $50,000 a year. The program, administered by the Labor Department, will make up half of a worker's lost wages for two years, up to $10,000.

The program is reaching only a fraction of those eligible, however, due to the complicated qualification requirements and a lack of knowledge about the program among front-line job counselors. Last year, a Government Accountability Office report found that no more than 20 percent of older workers at five closed job sites received the wage benefit; at two sites, more than half of older workers were not aware of it. Others had trouble finding a new job before the six-month deadline.

Since the program began in 2003, fewer than 6,800 workers have received wage insurance, with nearly half of them signing up last year.

A bill by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) would expand the entire trade-adjustment program to include service-sector workers whose jobs are lost to trade and would lower the age minimum for wage insurance to 40. McDermott and Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), the third-ranking Democrat in the Senate, are working to adapt a proposal by Brainard and others that would cover almost any displaced worker of any age who loses a job for almost any reason and takes a new one for lower pay. Workers who make less than $97,500 would be eligible, according to a Schumer aide, and benefits could be increased to a maximum of $20,000.

Such an expansion would cause the cost of the program to increase to roughly $3.5 billion annually from about $20 million. Brainard said the cost could be covered by adding $25 to every worker's annual unemployment tax, an idea Schumer said he is considering.

While there is support in both parties for wage insurance, the idea is also drawing fire. Many labor unions oppose it, saying it encourages workers to accept lower wages and benefits. They also argue that the program amounts to "burial insurance" for workers whose jobs should have been protected in the first place.

At a hearing on wage insurance before the Joint Economic Committee last week, Maurice Emsellem, policy director for the National Employment Law Project, argued that wage insurance doesn't work and is likely to steal resources from the nation's unemployment insurance system and other benefit programs.

Some Republicans are willing to embrace a limited expansion of the program as a trade-off for renewing the president's trade-negotiating authority. But they are reluctant to expand it significantly at a time when the Bush administration and congressional Democrats have promised to balance the federal budget.

"My role is to make sure it's directly related to trade, not used as a subterfuge for another social-benefit program," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (Iowa), the ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee, which handles trade legislation.

With many people in both parties backing at least a limited expansion, more workers seem likely to find themselves eligible for the program that has been a blessing for Michael Maynard.

"I thought I was going to lose a lot of money and that's that," he said. But the extra money he gets from the government "is keeping me alive."

A Stampede Of Lobbyists Heads Toward The Budget (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, March 6, 2007

The farm lobby, higher-education advocates, veterans' organizations and a host of other groups are pressing their cases with budget committee staffers for increased funding as Democratic lawmakers look to release their spending blueprint as early as next week.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars, for example, wants a $4 billion increase in funding for veterans' healthcare over last year's level. The request is likely to resonate at least somewhat this year in the wake of the Walter Reed scandal.

"If the Congress is going to send men and women into harm's way, it's their obligation to pay for their care," Dennis Cullinan, the group's legislative director, said.

Hospital groups, doctors and other recipients of payments under Medicare and Medicaid are pushing to forestall any program cuts in an environment where Congress is under intense budget pressure.

The HMOs and other insurance plans such as Blue Cross Blue Shield are particularly worried after seeing their funding targeted over the last two years.

With the gaping budget deficit, such lobbying pleas may not work this year. Arguments to spend money on new initiatives are even more difficult with the reinstatement of pay-as-you-go.

Under pay-go rules, which were adopted by the House earlier this year and embraced by several committee chairmen in the Senate, any spending increase or tax cut must be deficit-neutral. So advocacy groups are trying to convince budget staffers that their causes should be exempted from pay-go. Others are coming hat in hand with suggestions for revenue offsets.

"It's tough right now. But we will continue our efforts to ask for an increase," Dana Brooks, who is overseeing the lobbying for the U.S. Farm Bureau on the farm bill, said. She believes any increase in agriculture spending merits waiving the pay-go rules.

In the pay-go environment, groups worry they might be targeted in the hunt for offsets. Companies that provide services under Medicare fear they will bear the brunt of any expansion to the State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP) when it is reauthorized this year.

"We're very supportive of SCHIP and making some sure all the kids that are covered under it get health-insurance services. But that shouldn't be done at the expense of Medicare beneficiaries," Erickson said.

A budget resolution is not binding. It merely suggests rather than dictates the amounts authorizing and appropriating committees can allocate to certain broad goals and programs. But it does cap the total amount of spending and revenue legislators have to work with without running afoul of budget rules.

More and more, groups lobbying on the budget realize that the top-line spending figure is more important than how the budget committee divvies it up, argued James Horney, a budget expert at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

"If the overall level isn't big enough, it's almost impossible for appropriators to make an increase," he said.

Some budget experts predict that the budget committees will try to wield more power over policy this year by creating a "deficit-neutral reserve fund." Used in previous years when Congress adhered to pay-go rules, the fund would provide money for spending increases — but only if legislators spend it on budget committee priorities and if they find a way to pay for it.

Yet all this assumes there will be a budget at all. On four occasions starting in 1998, Congress has failed to pass a budget resolution. Given the narrowly divided House, and especially the Senate, many lobbyists aren't holding their breath for an agreement this year. The Republican House barely passed its version last year, though it didn't come close to becoming law.

This week, lobbyists will also focus on the homeland-security legislation that is moving through the upper chamber. Sponsored by Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), the bill would implement many of the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

Discover America Partnership, a group that advocates reforms to make the United States more hospitable to tourists to advance foreign-policy goals, is pushing a number of amendments to the legislation. Among them are provisions to increase the number of Customs and Border Control agents in major airports and a "registered traveler program" with biometric and background screening that would allow the registrants to speed through customs and immigrations lines at airports.

"We're leading an aggressive effort to find things that can simultaneously strengthen security as well as fix the travel problems we've created these last five years," said Geoff Freeman, the group's executive director.

But the legislation may hinge on a provision to allow Transportation Security Administration (TSA) workers the right to organize into unions. Several Senate Republicans oppose the measure and Bush has threatened to veto the legislation if it is kept. The unions, led by the American Federation of Government Employees, are fighting tooth and nail to keep it in.

Lobbying Bill Sparks Populist Uprising -- On Both Sides (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

The National Right to Life Committee and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) are locking horns -- not over abortion, but over whether thousands of top executive branch officials should have to disclose the names of people who lobby them.

Driven by the over-the-top, clandestine lobbying of Bush administration officials by now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Waxman's House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform has unanimously approved the Executive Branch Reform Act. A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said that she backs the measure, which would require senior bureaucrats to report quarterly whom they speak to about government actions, and that she expects it to get a vote in the House.

But Douglas Johnson, legislative director of the National Right to Life Committee, is vowing to stop the bill at all costs. He thinks it would discourage officials from meeting with citizens, including his own members. That makes it downright undemocratic. And he is consistent: He led a coalition that helped kill broad ethics reform legislation last year because it would have imposed a similar type of reporting requirement on grass-roots lobbying.

Grass-roots and executive-branch disclosure "are of a kind," Johnson said. "They both have as a purpose to insulate policymakers from ordinary citizens and citizen groups in order to enhance the influence of certain inside-the-Beltway elites." He points out, for example, that communications from lawmakers and other elected officials would not be disclosed under the Waxman proposal.

Johnson is recruiting activists and has lined up the Family Research Council and Concerned Women for America (CWA) as allies. "We believe this bill poses a tremendous threat to any American who wants to communicate with a member of the executive branch," said Shari Rendall, a lobbyist for the conservative CWA. "The burdens of this bill are onerous on government officials and intimidating to the public."

The legislation's advocates are also preparing to fight and they hope eventually to expand reporting to include lobbyists' meetings with lawmakers. Liberal watchdog groups such as Public Citizen, Common Cause and Democracy 21 yearn to give the public a clearer picture of who asks what from government officials all over the nation's capital.

But for now they are content to start with the executive branch. "It's not a burdensome reporting requirement, and it is important information for the public to know," said Craig Holman, lobbyist for Public Citizen's Congress Watch.

Johnson and his allies are just as determined and are trying to spark protests nationwide with e-mail such as this: "Waxman wants to sell his bill as an expansion of 'government in the sunshine,' [but it's really] a tanning salon: a structure in which executive branch officials would be isolated from the real world and then exposed to intense, artificial and unhealthy radiation generated by privileged inside players such as himself."A Peek Into Corporate America

Not waiting for Congress to impose new disclosure laws, shareholder activists have persuaded some of the nation's largest companies to disclose their political spending on such things as issue campaigns. General Electric, Hewlett-Packard and American Electric Power recently agreed to report how much they give trade associations for politics and lobbying. Home Depot said it would report "soft money" gifts such as corporate donations to political advocacy groups.

The decision was announced by the Center for Political Accountability, Trillium Asset Management and Green Century Capital Management. The four companies join 15 other major corporations that have adopted increased transparency policies since 2005.

Separately, Aegon USA, a financial services firm, has begun to list on its campaign finance reports the events at which it gives money to politicians, a disclosure not required by law. It said its $5,000 donation to the leadership fund of Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.) was made during a "ski weekend." Anyone see a trend?Government Client? Not So Fast

Qorvis Communications, a fast-growing D.C. PR shop, is still waiting for the $3 million, or 13 percent of its revenue, that Saudi Arabia owes it from last year. But Qorvis managing partner Michael J. Petruzzello said he is confident that the payment will show up soon, now that the Saudis have a new U.S. ambassador, Adel al-Jubeir.

"I'm not at all concerned," Petruzzello said. "It will all be resolved imminently." Then again, delays are common when countries are involved. "This is not the last time that they or any of my government accounts have been late," he added. "That's what happens when you work with governments."Lobby for Money? Not Me

Last week, former attorney general John D . Ashcroft blasted Sirius Satellite Radio's proposed acquisition of XM Satellite Radio Holdings on antitrust grounds. He is a consultant, no surprise, to the merger's main opponent, the National Association of Broadcasters.

Thing is, XM says that Ashcroft's office also approached it to see if it would hire him to help with the merger fight, but the company turned him down. XM accuses Ashcroft of "parroting" NAB's views for money, a charge Ashcroft and NAB deny.

Separately, former senator Alfonse D'Amato (R-N.Y.) says he has acted out of "passion" to accept the chairmanship of the Poker Players Alliance, an organization of 160,000 gambling enthusiasts that wants to reverse a law banning online poker.Ex-Top-Aide Hires of the Week

Dutko Worldwide has hired Judy Lemons, a former chief of staff to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), and Andy Wright, former chief of staff to Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.). The Watts Consulting Group of former congressman J.C. Watts (R-Okla.) has added Steve Pruitt, once the top Democratic aide at the House Budget Committee.

Public Strategies Inc. has hired Lee Godown, former chief of staff to Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.). Joshua F. Hurvitz, former legislative director for Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.), has joined American Continental Group. And ML Strategies, the consulting affiliate of law firm Mintz, Levin, Cohn, Ferris, Glovsky and Popeo, has hired Jeremy Rabinovitz, former chief of staff to Rep. Lois Capps (D-Calif.).

David E. Yudin, former director of the city of Chicago's Washington office and more recently legislative counsel to Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), has joined B&D Consulting as a senior adviser.

Brad Woodhouse, a longtime political operative with strong ties to liberal causes, was named president of Americans United for Change, replacing Karen Olick, a former chief of staff to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.). Olick joined the media and communications firm Squier Knapp Dunn.

Apparently thinking ahead, XM Satellite Radio last summer hired as a senior vice president Jeff Blattner, who was chief counsel on the Senate Judiciary Committee staff of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and also helped run the Justice Department's antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft in the 1990s. XM is involved in a huge antitrust effort to win government approval to merge with Sirius Satellite Radio.

And on the GOP side, Dan Meyer of the Duberstein Group, a top aide to former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), will replace Brian Conklin as the White House's chief lobbyist in the House.

Caucus Embroiled In Leadership Dispute (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, March 6, 2007

Members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus scheduled a special meeting Tuesday to try to resolve an embarrassing leadership dispute that led one lawmaker to quit the group.

Among the options is a power-sharing arrangement that would dilute the authority of the caucus' controversial chairman, Rep. Joe Baca, D-Calif.

So far, Baca has resisted any changes to the caucus' power structure, according to caucus members and staff. Baca is under fire from female lawmakers, including fellow California Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, who quit the 21-member, all-Democratic group after accusing Baca of calling her a "whore."

Baca denies that. A meeting last Thursday broke up without resolution or a vote, and afterward Baca insisted that he was still in charge and that he was focusing on the future.

"I'm still the chair. ... I was elected in a Democratic process," Baca said. "We've got a lot of high priorities and we need to stay focused."

Sanchez has said she'll rejoin the group only if Baca is out as chair, and other members haven't ruled out quitting. Baca was supported by only one of six women in the caucus when he was elected chairman in November, and Sanchez, her sister Rep. Linda Sanchez, and two others subsequently contested the election procedure and asked for a new secret-ballot vote.

Female caucus members have complained of being ignored and disrespected.

In another episode a year ago, six caucus members — including Loretta and Linda Sanchez — cut ties to the group's campaign arm after it helped finance the unsuccessful campaigns of Baca's two sons for seats in the California Legislature.

Baca defended the decision to give money to them and other nonfederal candidates, saying the caucus should seek to build a farm team. Opponents said the focus instead should be on electing Latino House members.

McConnell Helps Save GOP's Agenda - But Risks Its Future (POL)

By Carrie Budoff

The Politico, March 6, 2007

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell returned to the Senate in January with a conference slashed in size and chastened by voters. Neither the Republican president nor the Democratic-controlled Congress had much use for him. Colleagues whispered that the senator, with all the pizzazz of plain oatmeal, was terrible on television.

Two months later, though, McConnell has managed to make the Republican stance on Iraq -- oppose a rebuke of the president while pressing for continued war funding -- look downright vogue. In the process, even skeptics have acknowledged that McConnell knows how to work a chamber.

Not with everyone.

"McConnell is in fact a combination of the worst of all worlds -- the arrogance of Bush, the social conservatism and lunacy of Rick Santorum, the hypocrisy of Mark Foley, the corruption of Tom DeLay," Matt Stoller, a Washington-based Democratic consultant, wrote on the liberal blog MyDD.

As the Kentucky Republican defends his party -- and President Bush -- like a Cub Scout den mother, he's threading the needle between a conference in need of an opposition identity and a public mood divided on the position he has staked out. Insiders admire his tactical maneuvers on Iraq, but could he lose the broader public relations battle outside of Washington?

"They have a potential double whammy," said Norm Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "They could ultimately be portrayed as obstructionists, and obstructionists in favor of a policy that deteriorates anyhow."

The competing agendas underscore the conflict between his leadership role and his style. He's the face of the Senate GOP, but aides have to nudge him to show it more on television. He's a backroom operator in a need-to-know-everything political age. He's the congressional Republican backstop at a time when voters say they want action.

The source of his highest praise -- and sharpest critiques -- stems from what he's stalled: a resolution opposing Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops into Iraq.

"It's time to do to Mitch McConnell what the GOP did to Tom Daschle -- make him the symbol of everything that is wrong and get rid of him in a presidential year," wrote Stoller.

With appraisals like that, this prim politician, whose flashiest attribute might be his pinstriped suits, morphed into the silver lining of an otherwise dark year for Republicans.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee reported a slight swell in fundraising. And on Friday, Bush's appearance with McConnell in Louisville, Ky., raised $2.1 million for GOP candidates.

"For the first time in a long while," William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard, wrote in Time magazine, McConnell's performance has "given Republicans a congressional leader worth rooting for."

Kristol's statement could be viewed as a subtle jab at McConnell's predecessor, Sen. Bill Frist, the Tennessee Republican who rose to majority leader after only eight years in the Senate and always had his eye on the presidency. McConnell has no designs on higher office, a departure from several of his recent predecessors in both parties, including Frist, former Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) and former Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.).

Moreover, political observers say McConnell brings a legislative know-how to the job that Frist lacked, earning him loyalty in his conference -- and because of that, greater negotiating power with the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

"The Senate is built for defense. The House is built for offense," McConnell said in a Politico interview. "The minority is never irrelevant in the Senate, particularly at 49" members.

McConnell has handled his minority leadership "exactly as Senator Reid expected," said majority leader's spokesman, Jim Manley.

"Senator McConnell is a fierce partisan," Manley said. "He is someone who knows the rules of the Senate and is prepared to use them."

A month ago, the reviews weren't so glowing.

Republican aides arrived at the Capitol Feb. 6 in a tizzy. The GOP was taking a pounding in the headlines. Voters across the country were hearing one message: Republicans defied the will of the American people. They obstructed a debate on Iraq.

A day earlier, McConnell had won the battle inside the Capitol by lining up his conference against a Democratic Iraq resolution. It was a testament to his tactical skills, but raised concerns about his style.

Was his workmanlike persona better suited for the 7 a.m.-to-11 p.m. media cycle of the 1980s?

Aides quickly regrouped, by conference call and in person. "Do we give up? Do we keep talking about it?" asked McConnell's communications director, Don Stewart.

Within hours, the edict was issued. No more talk about the process. Talk only about funding the troops -- and that's all they did.

"I'm not here to talk about the process," McConnell said at one point, trying to shoo reporters off the procedural maneuverings that aides say he revels in.

Reid balked at side-by-side votes -- one on the Democratic resolution opposing the troop surge and one on the Republican resolution pledging to continue funding the war. But McConnell held firm, insisting that the GOP plan receive a vote.

Eventually, the story line shifted to "Democrats in disarray" as they struggled to craft a resolution that could make it by McConnell's minority.

"His strength is how much he listens to colleagues and is able to develop solutions that benefit them," said Ken Mehlman, the former Republican National Committee chairman who managed Bush's 2004 campaign.

The debate was the first major test of McConnell's commitment at the outset of his term to "a restoration of civility and common purpose" in the Senate -- and of his relationship with Reid.

Both lawyers and longtime legislators, the two leaders meet every Monday, one week in Reid's office, the next in McConnell's, where a National Gallery portrait of his hero, Henry Clay, watches over the proceedings. In between, they talk on the Senate floor.

"We have an understanding of what the institution is like, the rhythm and flow of the institution," McConnell said. "You tend not to get frustrated because of the little impasses that develop along the way. That is just the way the Senate has operated for 200 years. Snags develop and you sit down later and work it out and go on."

McConnell relies on a kitchen cabinet outside his deputy leaders. Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah), an old friend, joins the weekly leadership meetings. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) has acted as McConnell's legislative wingman, taking the lead so often on the floor debates that Reid described him last month as the "designated 'see-if-we-can-mess-up-the-legislation' guy this year."

McConnell's performance has inspired a certain level of assuredness in the ranks. By last week, as Reid announced that the Senate would hold off debating Iraq for another two weeks, Republicans were anxious for the showdown.

"My attitude is, 'Bring it on,'" said a senior Republican leadership aide. "Let's keep going here."

Embattled Abramoff Associate Lobs Charges of His Own at Ex

While he awaits sentencing for his role in the Jack Abramoff scandal, Michael Scanlon is fighting another court battle -- on the home front.

In papers filed in Montgomery County last fall, the former Tom DeLay staffer-turned-mega-lobbyist is suing his ex-wife for $2 million plus all the money in their son's educational trust, claiming she and her new husband spent funds meant for the 8-year-old boy.

In his suit (which he amended last week to include a conspiracy charge), Scanlon claims his ex, Carrie Anne Liipfert Messina, now living in Los Angeles, had him wire money to what was supposed to be a segregated fund but proved to be a joint account with her husband, Matthew Messina. Scanlon claims they withdrew money meant for young John Patrick's education to buy a condo at the Mammoth Lakes ski resort, timeshares in Orlando and Mexico, and concert tickets.

Intriguingly, Scanlon also claims that his ex-wife broke a 2003 "confidential agreement" the two reached on child support by sharing info about Scanlon's finances with unnamed "third parties." But what she allegedly disclosed, and to whom, is unclear: Messina's response and countersuit -- which court records indicate involve "breach of contract" claims, the same as he makes against her -- have been placed under seal.

So it's unclear whether any of this is entangled in the Abramoff fraud/public corruption mess. While an ex-fiancee of Scanlon's reportedly helped federal prosecutors build a case against him, some observers of the case doubt there would have been much incentive for Messina to leak to investigators. Both Scanlon's attorney and Messina's declined comment.HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

The Right To Organize (NYT)

There are many reasons for the long decline in the membership rolls for private sector unions, including powerful changes in the economy and the unions' past corruption scandals. And there is little doubt that federal rules and regulations for union organizing have also become increasingly hostile to labor, helping to drive unions' share of the work force down from a peak of 35 percent in the 1950s to a mere 7.4 percent today.

The House of Representatives passed a bill last week that would strengthen the rights of employees to form unions, and it drew an immediate veto threat from President Bush. But if Mr. Bush were, as he claims, truly concerned about rising income inequality and truly committed to improving the lives of America's middle class, he would support the legislation and urge the Senate to approve it.

The most significant change in the bill is known as a majority signup, which would allow employees at a company to unionize if a majority signed cards expressing their desire to do so. Under current law, an employer can reject the majority's signatures and insist on a secret ballot. But in a disturbingly high number of cases, the employer uses the time before the vote to pressure employees to rethink their decision to unionize.

The bill would also increase the penalty for employers who fired or otherwise discriminated illegally against pro-union employees. An employer currently found guilty of an illegal firing must pay back pay, minus whatever the fired employee might have earned at a new job — a fine so low as to be meaningless. And the bill would require binding arbitration if a newly formed union and company management were unable to agree on a first contract after 120 days. The refusal to bargain is among the most common allegations against employers in filings to the National Labor Relations Board.

Some employers, like Cingular Wireless and the health care provider Kaiser Permanente, have voluntarily embraced the practice of the majority signup. But many others, represented by interest groups like the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, remain rigidly opposed.

The bill's opponents charge that replacing secret ballots with the majority signup would be undemocratic. But the current system is by no means fair. The law prohibits union advocacy by employees during work hours and allows employers to ban organizers from the work place. But employers can require workers to attend anti-union presentations, and can discipline or fire those who refuse to attend.

In 2005, according to the most recent annual report of the National Labor Relations Board, 31,358 employees were receiving back pay after being discriminated against for their union-related activities. In research for a bipartisan Congressional commission in 2000, Kate Bronfenbrenner, a labor relations professor at Cornell University, reported that 25 percent of employers illegally fired at least one employee during organizing campaigns.

Labor unions have a role to play in helping to fix today's economic ills — most notably, worsening income inequality, a problem that's caused in part by unions' decline and the workers' resulting lack of bargaining power. What's needed is a Congressional drive to help Mr. Bush see this obvious connection. The Senate should take up the House bill promptly and send it to the president for his signature.

The No Child Left Behind education law is up for renewal this year, and an independent commission recently released some recommendations for improvement. Not to be outdone, the White House has also put out its own "blueprint" for strengthening the law. The legislation could use a serious reworking, but any fixes won't go far enough unless they do more to expand public and private school choice.

NCLB's political bargain was that, in return for a big increase in federal education spending, the government would hold schools more accountable for results in the classroom. Six years later, taxpayers have done their part. Since 2001 overall NCLB funding has risen by 34%, and federal spending on Title I schools serving low-income students has gone up 45%.

NCLB and the Bush Administration also deserve some credit for shifting the terms of the education debate. The law has focused attention on learning gaps between students of different races and economic backgrounds that persist even at some of the nation's best public schools. The law's requirement that schools test annually in grades 3-8, and report both averages and the results of racial and economic subgroups, has made it much more difficult for administrators to hide the fact that all students aren't learning.

NCLB has been much less successful in bringing pressure to bear on states and school districts that fail to implement the law. That's especially true of the school choice provisions, which are the best way to get the attention of the education bureaucracy. Unfortunately, the Bush Administration abandoned its voucher proposal very early in the 2001 negotiations. What passed was a watered-down version of public school choice, which in theory allows a child in a failing school to transfer to a better public school or get free after-school tutoring from private providers. * * *

In practice, however, the Education Department has too often allowed school districts to skirt even these limited choice provisions, either by granting exemptions or looking the other way. It took a formal complaint from the Alliance for School Choice before Secretary Margaret Spellings did anything about Los Angeles failing to notify parents of their transfer rights as required under the law. So far she's sent the district a sternly worded letter.

And the Chicago public school system, which has been repeatedly labeled "in need of improvement" and thus should be banned under NCLB from offering its own after-school tutoring, has been given a waiver to do exactly that. So while it would be nice if the Bush Administration enforced its own law, the larger lesson is that school choice "lite" turns out to be no substitute for the real thing.

To be fair, some of these problems are structural. Even if more school districts were implementing NCLB's transfer provisions, there often isn't enough room in decent schools to handle all the children who qualify for a transfer. And many of the private after-school tutoring services allowed under the law are simply employing the same teachers from the local public school system who are failing the kids during regular school hours.

There's also the problem of allowing each state to develop its own standards and tests to determine proficiency in reading and math. The Administration was deferring to federalist principles on an issue that's traditionally been handled at the state and local level. But the reality has been a "race to the bottom," with some states constructing easy tests to avoid federal penalties.

"If you're in Oklahoma right now, you're told that 95% or 96% of your schools are doing fine," says Frederick Hess, who follows education at the American Enterprise Institute. "And if you're in Massachusetts, you're told that 40% to 45% of your schools are doing fine. But if you look at the actual achievement data, it suggests that kids in Massachusetts are doing far better than kids in Oklahoma."

Some education reformers are now calling for "national standards" to address this problem. But we tried national history standards in the 1990s, and the politicized results weren't pretty -- unless, of course, you favor a history curriculum that downgrades the Founding Fathers while playing up the working experiences of midwives in 19th-century Nebraska.

Rather than force a national test on states, the best compromise here may be to require them to benchmark their own assessments against the National Assessment of Education Progress (NAEP), a federal standardized test that already exists and that most educators agree is fairly rigorous. "So people at least have a common metric by which to judge the rigor of the state assessment," says Mr. Hess.

It's worth considering, and we wish we could say the same about the Commission on No Child Left Behind, which was funded by private foundations and co-chaired by former Governors Tommy Thompson and Roy Barnes. But the panel's report is more interested in tinkering than fundamental change, and its 75 recommendations don't include the one that would make the biggest difference: school vouchers. * * *

The Administration's proposed fixes are bolder and potentially more consequential. President Bush's 2008 budget sets aside $250 million for "promise scholarships" for low-income students in schools that have consistently underperformed for five years. The scholarships would average about $4,000 and "the money would follow the child to the public, charter or private school of his or her choice."

Them's fightin' words for the Democrats who now control Congress. But Mr. Bush has the bully pulpit, as well as the moral authority from five years of evidence on failing schools. We hope his Administration uses them to explain why real school choice is essential to any reform in K-12 education.

Stocks Decline As Weakness In Asia Trumps Other News (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

A big drop in oil prices didn't stanch the bloodletting in the stock market.

As was the case last week, weakness in overseas markets, especially Asia, trumped any shreds of good news elsewhere. Signs of so-so growth in the U.S. service sector didn't help matters.

"All the things that [investors have] been talking about are not going away," said Michael Mainwald, head trader at Lek Securities Inc., a New York brokerage. "If anything, they're just getting bigger and bigger."

The Dow Jones Industrial Average opened lower, seesawed in and out of positive territory throughout the day, then suffered a late round of selling to end lower for the third straight day. It finished off 63.69 points, or 0.5%, at 12050.41, down 3.3% on the year. Since last Tuesday, when the blue-chip average had a headline-grabbing one-day plunge, it is now off 4.6%.

On a day when it celebrated its 50th anniversary, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.9%, or 13.05 points, to 1374.12, off 3.1% on the year. Still, the broad measure has now risen to nearly 31 times its initial close of 44.42 on March 5, 1957.

The Institute of Supply Management said its nonmanufacturing index, a broad measure of service-sector activity in the U.S., fell to 54.3 last month. That level indicates that the service sector is still growing, but was below both January's reading of 59 and Wall Street's consensus expectation for 57.5.

Concerns that demand could slow pushed crude futures contracts for April delivery sharply lower, off $1.57 to $60.07 a barrel, down 2.5% for the day and 1.6% for the year on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Such declines usually help stocks, since investors figure that lower energy prices will lead to more consumer spending and boost corporate profits. Yesterday's session was an exception, as economic fears held back both stocks and energy, said Raymond Carbone, president of Paramount Options, a brokerage firm active on Nymex's floor.

"What we're seeing is fear of a global slowdown," which could lead to less robust consumption of fuel in the U.S., said Mr. Carbone.

Technology shares, which most investors believe are riskier during periods of slow economic growth, were especially weak. The Nasdaq Composite Index shed 1.2%, or 27.32 points, to end at 2340.68, off 3.1% on the year.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 2.3%, or 5.64 points, to 237.47. Major stock indexes fell in Tokyo and Hong Kong.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks declined1 and bond prices fell2. The 10-year note fell 1/32 point, or 31.25 cents for each $1,000 invested, lifting its yield to 4.518%. The 30-year bond fell 2/32 to yield 4.654%.

The dollar was mixed3. The dollar fell to 115.83 yen from 116.85 yen. The euro fell to $1.3093 from $1.3194.

Unsteady U.S. Markets Take Another Hit (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

Money flowed out of global stock markets again Monday as fears of a coming economic slowdown continued to discourage investors around the world.

That 5.8% slide in the Dow is shy of the 10% drop that defines an "official" correction and is less than some emerging markets have dropped in a single day. But the damage runs far deeper in some sectors on Wall Street, showing the velocity at which U.S. investors are fleeing riskier asset classes such as:

•Subprime mortgage lenders. Investors are hammering companies that gave loans now proving to be problematic to consumers with questionable credit. New Century Financial collapsed $10.09, or 69%, to $4.56 Monday after the industry leader's warning last week that its losses from bad loans have widened, its accounting is being investigated and its survival depends on the large investment banks that lend it money. Scott Valentin of Friedman Billings Ramsey says it's quite possible some subprime lenders will fail.

Investors are bailing out of all subprime lenders and even some diversified mortgage lenders, says Chris Brendler of Stifel Nicolaus. The worries have bled further in the financial ecosystem, infecting shares of real estate investment trusts and investment banks such as Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley, which provide cash to subprime lenders. There are even concerns the subprime industry's problems eventually could hurt the broader financial system.

•Tech and biotech. Suddenly investors want little to do with these traditionally volatile sectors. Networking-gear makers Ciena and PMC-Sierra and biotech Celgene are among the worst performers in the Standard & Poor's 500, down 17%, 15% and 12% since the market cracked last Tuesday and investors scrambled for safety. "Tech is thought to require a firm economy to do well. That's an open question now," says David Joy at RiverSource Investments.

•Turnaround plays. Circuit City and General Motors, companies in the midst of fixing themselves, have been punished, falling 13% and 10% in the past week. Investors now prefer more stable companies, which in some cases are also less expensive, Joy says.

The flight from risk is likely to continue as long as investors, unlike just a few weeks ago, are skeptical of rosy economic forecasts. "Positive statements by economists do not have credibility with some investors," S&P's Sam Stovall says. "It's total uncertainty."

U.S. Stocks Drop As Investors Avert Risk (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton And Tom Petruno

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

Done in by another late-day swoon, U.S. stocks dropped again today as investors continued to dump the type of risky issues they had embraced so strongly last year.

Though most broad-market indexes slid, the worst losses occurred in the financial and housing sectors and among small-company stocks.

Shares of some Southern California-based sub-prime mortgage lenders -- including New Century Financial -- were hammered relentlessly as investors bailed out, fearing that the industry's collapse will worsen.

The blue-chip Dow Jones industrial average fell 63.69 points, or 0.5%, to 12,050.41. The Dow had rallied at the outset of trading but couldn't hold its gains.

Still, big-name stocks were a haven relative to the rest of the market.

The Russell 2,000 small-stock index slid 2% to 760.06, bringing its loss for the last five trading sessions to 7.7%.

The Standard & Poor's mid-size stock index fell 1.8%.

The technology-heavy Nasdaq composite dropped 27.32 points, or 1.2%, to 2,340.68.

Emerging markets in general were broadly lower. The Mexican market gave up 2%.

The market's slump began a week ago with a sharp sell-off in Chinese shares that reverberated worldwide. China's slide caused concerns that had been simmering in the United States to boil over -- specifically, fear that the U.S. economy was at risk of falling into recession this year instead of experiencing a so-called soft landing.

The Dow plummeted 416 points, or 3.3%, on Feb. 27, its worst loss in nearly four years. It has been mostly downhill for markets worldwide since then.

"What we have had is a big change in psychology from [investors] not worrying about anything to looking for things to worry about," said Phil Roth, chief technical market analyst at brokerage Miller Tabak & Co. in New York.

The housing market has figured prominently in those new worries, amid rising defaults by sub-prime borrowers -- those with poor credit histories or no credit histories.

Irvine-based sub-prime lender New Century Financial Corp. dived $10.09 to $4.56 today after its disclosure late Friday of a federal criminal probe into its accounting.

Another sub-prime giant, Countrywide Financial, fell $1.82 to $35.20. Impac Mortgage of Newport Beach dropped $1.91 to $4.05.

Anything real estate-related was targeted by sellers today. The Bloomberg News index of real estate investment trust shares sank 3.7%, its worst one-day loss in the last five sessions.

Despite losses over the last week, key stock indexes are down relatively modestly, by historical standards.

The S&P 500 index, which fell 0.9% today, is down 5.9% from its six-year high reached Feb. 20.

A garden-variety "correction" in a bull market would be a drop of 10% to 15%.

Nonetheless, the selling has amplified fears in financial markets that the economy was weakening more than had been expected under the soft-landing scenario.

"You can say it's just a nasty correction or the start of a bear market," said Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors in Albany, N.Y. "Either way, the stock and bond markets are sending a strong and unambiguous signal that something may have gone wrong for the economy."

In other markets today, the dollar fell further against the yen, to 115.42 from 116.75 on Friday, as speculators continued to unwind their trades of borrowing in Japan to buy high-risk assets elsewhere.

Yields were little changed in the Treasury bond market.

Stocks Fall Further, Mirroring Europe, Asia (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Stocks faltered again yesterday during a global equities sell-off and as concerns mounted about the health of a high-risk part of the home mortgage industry.

Each of the major indicators added to their losses of last week, the worst in several years. The Dow Jones industrial average shed 63.69, or 0.53 percent, to close at 12,050.41. The tech-heavy Nasdaq dropped 27.32, or 1.15 percent, to 2340.68. The broader S&P 500-stock index fell 13.05, or 0.94 percent, to 1374.12.

"I don't think it's the bottom. You've got earnings growth decelerating and no Fed easing in sight," said Jeff Schappe, chief investment officer at BB&T Asset Management, referring to the Federal Reserve's position on interest rates. "So the market is having trouble hanging its hat on something good."

Overnight selling in Asia and Europe appeared to set the tone for U.S. exchanges. The Dow dropped more than 70 points in early trading. The average bounced in and out of negative territory throughout the day as investors took their profits, shopped for bargains or bought safer equities and bonds.

Japan's Nikkei index lost 3.3 percent of its value yesterday, falling 575 points. It recovered slightly in early trading today. Declines were led by exporters, whose overseas profits are being eaten by the rallying yen. It was the fifth consecutive day of losses for the Nikkei since Chinese stocks fell almost 9 percent Feb. 27. The Shanghai index dropped 1.6 percent yesterday. Hong Kong's Hang Seng index posted a 4 percent loss.

The picture was similar in Europe, where worries about weakness in the U.S. mortgage business and the strong Japanese yen lingered. Britain's FTSE 100 lost 0.9 percent, and Germany's DAX index fell 1 percent.

The yen rose 1 percent to hit a three-month high against the dollar. It was trading at about 115.5 to the dollar yesterday, up more than 4 percent in less than a week. The yen gained 2 percent against the British pound.

Analysts are keeping a sharp eye on the yen because of concerns about an unwinding of what's known as the carry trade, which refers to the process in which people borrow in currencies with low interest rates, such as the yen, and invest those assets elsewhere. The rising yen suggests that investors are pulling out of those investments and putting their money, for safety reasons, back into the Japanese currency. This movement could hurt the availability of capital worldwide.

Fresh signs of trouble surfaced in the part of the U.S. mortgage industry known as subprime, further weighing down the market. New Century Financial, which issues the risky, subprime home loans to borrowers with questionable credit records, said late Friday that it was the subject of a criminal investigation into securities trading and warned it may violate loan agreements with its financial backers. Its shares dropped yesterday by $10.09, or 69 percent, to close at $4.56.

David G. Dietze, president and chief investment strategist of Point View Financial Services, said "carnage" in subprime markets had made investors wary of the financial service stocks, which make up roughly a quarter of the S&P 500.

"People are looking at some of the financial services companies and asking, 'To what extent could they be left holding the bag?' " he said, adding that all major banks have some exposure to subprime loans.Movers

Palm dropped $1.80, or nearly 10 percent, to $16.50, wiping out its rally on Friday after speculation that Nokia might buy it.

Fremont General, a subprime lender, lost $2.82, or 32 percent, to $5.89, after saying it would sell its subprime loan business.

Alcoa dropped 97 cents, almost 3 percent, to $31.73.

Shares Continue To Sink, From Hong Kong To New York (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters And Heather Timmons

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

The fallout from last week's global stock dive showed few signs of letting up yesterday, as markets from Hong Kong to New York deepened their losses.

Share prices in the United States fell for the eighth time in the last nine trading days. The combined losses have wiped out more than 5 percent of the American market's value.

Wall Street started the morning in the red, then bobbed in and out of positive territory. At first, investors appeared moved to sell by a report showing that business activity in the service industry fell to the lowest level in almost four years. But those losses were later reversed, and for much of the day it looked as if stock prices would finish the day with some moderate gains.

But in the final half-hour, prices dropped sharply. The Dow Jones industrial average lost 63.69 points, or about 0.5 percent, to close at 12,050.41. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fared even worse, losing 13.05 points, or about 1 percent, to close at 1,374.12.

The Nasdaq composite fell 27.32, about 1.2 percent, to 2,340.68. The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies dropped 15.38, or nearly 2 percent, to 760.06.

Another big sell-off in Asia overnight and more modest declines in European markets later in the day preceded the downturn in the United States. The Nikkei fell for the fifth consecutive session to close down 3.3 percent; Hong Kong's Hang

Seng index fell 4 percent; and the Shanghai composite index fell 1.6 percent. In Britain, the FTSE 100 dropped 0.94 percent, in Germany the DAX index fell 1.04 percent, and in France the CAC-40 declined 0.73 percent.

Analysts in Europe said that the sell-off of assets considered risky was likely to continue for some days. But they said that the decline was probably not a sign of a recession and that it was unlikely to set one off.

In the United States, analysts said that a government report on productivity and labor costs due out today could accelerate losses. The report is expected to show that productivity did not advance as rapidly as first thought and that businesses spent more on employee compensation than first reported.

Tim Bond, head of asset allocation strategy for Barclays Capital, said in a research report yesterday that news about the strength of the United States economy would weigh on stocks in the coming weeks. "We should expect underperfomance of both U.S. stocks and bonds over the next several months, at least in the absence of a surprising recovery in productivity growth."

Others echoed that sentiment. "There is a genuine fear that the correction will be more than 10 percent globally for the developed markets," said Michael Hughes, chief investment officer at Baring Asset Management in London. "We had such a good run that there is a sense that money has been made too easily."

Still, some analysts say they believe the damage will be limited. "This is the way that corrections work," said Garry Evans, a strategist with HSBC in Hong Kong. "A week ago, everyone was very excited about the markets and now no one wants to buy stocks."

The declines extended a downward trend that began last Tuesday when the Shanghai stock market dropped nearly 9 percent. Many economists and strategists predicted that volatility could increase sharply in Asian markets as investors pull back from speculative investments and redirect assets to more mature markets, and as other investors look for buying opportunities.

This flight from risky assets has become particularly evident in currency markets. The Japanese yen, which rose again yesterday against the dollar, has been strengthening even as other Asian currencies have declined because many investors are unwinding some of their transactions, called "carry trades."

In this trading strategy, hedge funds and other investors have been borrowing yen at low interest rates and then converting them into other currencies to buy stocks in markets with higher returns, like Australia, Malaysia, Indonesia and the Philippines. But they are now reversing many of these trades.

The retreat of investors from carry trades is now accelerating regional declines, analysts said. The more the yen rises, the more expensive it becomes for carry traders to pay off their Japanese debt. As they try to sell their holdings faster, they feed a cycle of rising yen and more selling.

Banking stocks have suffered as profit at financial institutions took a hit on bad loans, especially in the American mortgage market. But bonds have still performed well. "If bond markets stop performing well, then it is more difficult for equity markets to recover," Mr. Hughes said.

The benchmark 10-year Treasury bond rose 1/32 yesterday to 101. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, fell to 4.49 percent, from 4.50 percent.

Economists in Asia maintain that the outlook for the region's economies remains sound. Many are comparing it with the sell-off in emerging markets last May, a fall that had been mostly reversed by October.

Some countries published positive economic data yesterday, including strong capital expenditure figures in Japan, and positive news about pension funds in Taiwan.

In the United States, investors await this week's employment report from the Labor Department, which will shed some light on the economy's current strength.

Following are the results of yesterday's Treasury auction of three- and six-month bills:

Fed Governor Says Market Discipline Working Well (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Financial markets are "functioning well amid higher volatility" while "overall liquidity does not appear to be in short supply", the Federal Reserve governor Kevin Warsh said on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0140686

Mr Warsh, who acts informally as a point of contact between the Washington-based Fed governors and Wall Street, said market discipine "appears to be effective, as investors are reviewing their positions".

He added: "Solid fundamentals may help to ease any changes in liquidity should they occur."

His comments suggest the Fed is confident that recent market turmoil will not have drastic -consequences, and may even be beneficial in the long run by reminding investors of the need to pay an adequate price for risk.

Mr Warsh's remarks came in a speech in which he suggested that in the modern financial system, liquidity should be thought of primarily in terms of investor confidence.

He said liquidity conditions "can be assessed through the risk premiums on financial assets and the magnitude of capital flows". On this basis, he said, "it would be hard to conclude that monetary policy has been restrictive" in recent quarters.

While most of the speech did not refer directly to recent market developments, Mr Warsh noted: "If unmoored from fundamentals, confidence can give way to complacency, complacency can undermine market discipline, and liquidity can falter unexpectedly."

He said liquidity was "significantly higher than it would otherwise be due to the proliferation of financial products and innovation by financial providers."

The threefold increase in the amount of interest rate swaps and options outstanding, plus the tenfold increase in the amount of credit default swaps over the past four years "allow investors to hedge and unwind positions easily without having to transact in cash markets".

But Mr Warsh warned that while risk could be sliced up and distributed in ever more sophisticated ways, "even the most sophisticated financial products are not im-mune to the physical law of conservation of matter: the risk must rest somewhere".

Liquidity in US markets was also underpinned by confidence in the US economy, and in particular, the reduction in macroeconomic volatility – the ups and downs of the business cycle. Finally, it was supported by international capital flows arising from "excess savings in some emerging market and oil-exporting countries".

Mr Warsh said the US economy continued to de-mon-strate "extraordinary resilience" and this was "no doubt supported by the ability of financial markets to absorb substantial shocks" – such as the collapse of Amaranth hedge fund with losses of $6bn (€4.6bn, £3.1bn).

But he admitted that it was "hard to know with certainty when investors' confidence will be stirred but not shaken by these events".

Mr Warsh said super-abundant liquidity might also be distorting financial asset prices, including the slope of the yield curve, lessening the usefulness of these metrics as a guide to monetary policy.

Market Flux Doesn't Faze Bank Official (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Liquidity in financial markets isn't "in short supply" despite last week's market turmoil, a Federal Reserve official said.

Fed governor Kevin Warsh yesterday told the Institute of International Bankers in Washington that while "risk premiums"—the additional return an investor demands to hold a risky asset—"rose some last week, markets are functioning well...and overall liquidity does not appear to be in short supply." But he cautioned it is too soon for a "comprehensive" assessment.

Stocks world-wide fell sharply last week and yields on risk debt, such as bonds backed by subprime mortgages, rose sharply. Futures markets priced in a higher probability that the Fed would cut interest rates this year because of the Fed's history of easing monetary policy in response to disorderly market conditions, and because weaker stock prices and higher risk premiums often foreshadow economic weakness.

However, Fed officials have in the last week struck a sanguine tone, even arguing that periods of such volatility are healthy safeguards against investor complacency. That suggests little inclination as yet to cut rates.

Fed governor Randall Kroszner told a community bankers' meeting in Washington that "the outlook for the U.S. economy has not materially changed." Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis President William Poole said in Santiago, Chile, that it would be wise for the Fed not to respond to the trouble through its monetary policy "until you have a better idea of what's actually happening."

Mr. Warsh said by the standard of liquidity conditions in recent quarters, "it would be hard to conclude that monetary policy has been restrictive." He said liquidity has multiple definitions, but he defined it as investors' confidence in their ability to buy and sell with ease because they can quantify risks. In conditions like those of recent months, when investors believe the economic outlook is "benign" and more damaging possibilities remote or easy to measure, he said, liquidity is "plentiful."

While Mr. Warsh, a former investment banker, said investor overconfidence couldn't be "ruled out," he cited fundamental explanations for low risk premiums. The economy is less volatile, there are many new financial products for spreading risk and investors such as hedge funds to buy them, and emerging markets are sending excess savings to developed countries, he said. Even if there is a shakeout, risks will remain easier to disperse and hedge, he said.

US Service Sector Growth Slows (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott In New York

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

The US service sector saw a sharp drop off in activity last month, growing at its slowest rate since during the Iraq war in April 2003, according to data released on Monday.

The Institute for Supply Management said that its index of business activity for the services sector stood at 54.3, down 4.7 percentage points from January.

The report badly missed economists' forecasts of a level of 57.

New orders in the service sector were down 0.6 percentage points at 54.8. But figures on employment in service industries put a more positive gloss on the state of the economy as the index for non-manufacturing jobs rose 0.5 percentage points to 52.2.

The figures added to concerns surrounding the state of the US economy, but the markets did not react strongly when the data was released. Alan Greenspan, former chairman of the Fed, warned last week that a recession was "possible".

Other data released last week showing that the US economy grew less quickly than expected last quarter and that industrial investment slowed at the start of the year worried investors and contributed to the chill in global markets.

The service industries covered by the report make up around 80 per cent of the US economy and are the driver of economic growth as manufacturing faces ongoing weakness in housing, and the auto industry continues to ail.

Some analysts said that although the headline figure of the report was probably somewhat misleading, in the current market conditions it was still worrying.

Alan Ruskin, chief currency strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital, called the numbers "disappointing, but the breakdown is not nearly as poor as the headline would suggest. Both the employment index and orders data were fairly close to the prior months numbers."

But he said that the data would "only add to fears that the economy may be losing a little momentum, even allowing for the breakdown."

"The headline index is usually little more than a lagging indicator of the rate of growth of core retail sales," said Ian Sheperdson, chief US economist at High Frequency Economics. "Given the mood of the markets, however, and the uncertainty surrounding the economic outlook, the report does not look good."

Others warned that the data supported the view that the US economy was heading for slower growth this year.

"With the escalation of pressures on the financial services industry connected with problems in the sub-prime mortgage lending market, the services industries are expected to track in the slow to moderate growth range for several more months," said Brian Bethune, US economist at Global Insight. "For the economy as a whole, this points to "slow speed ahead" - with potentially rough seas and headwinds - in the first half of 2007."

Service Sector Likely Feels Housing's Pinch (WSJ)

By Conor Dougherty

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140688

Business activity among service companies -- from freight haulers to mortgage bankers -- grew at a slower-than-expected pace in February, suggesting that weakness in housing and manufacturing is filtering into the broader economy.

The Institute for Supply Management, an Arizona-based group of purchasing managers, said its index of nonmanufacturing business activity fell to 54.3 in February from 59.0 in January. Any reading above 50 indicates growth in the sector; below 50 indicates contraction. The service sector makes up 80% of the U.S. economy.

Given the weakness in housing and manufacturing, economists had expected the service index to drop: If companies make fewer goods, that will mean less demand for shipping, and with people buying fewer homes it follows that demand for services such as loans and homeowner's insurance would also slow.

Though economists expected a decline, the drop was steeper than anticipated. "I thought it might take two or three months," for the index to fall as far as it did, said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist for consulting firm Global Insight. A large part of the decline was attributed to the financial-services industry, which fell to 49.5 -- representing a contraction -- from 59 in January. Mr. Bethune attributed the sharpness of the decline to the recent pullback in subprime lending, or loans made to customers with shaky credit or high levels of debt.

"The speed with which [subprime lending] has become a major concern in the last month is something that definitely pushed the index down," he said. The nonmanufacturing index was also pulled down by industries that included construction and wholesale trade.

The report showed an easing in prices. In February, the ISM's index of prices paid by nonmanufacturing companies fell to 53.8 compared with 55.2 in January, meaning the cost of services such as commodities, labor and energy is increasing at a slower rate.

"It's a welcome fall. It indicates that there has been a reduction in pipeline inflationary pressures," said Richard Iley, U.S. economist at BNP Paribas.

While the overall index fell, some service sectors continued to chug along. Of the 18 industries that make up the ISM's nonmanufacturing index, nine showed growth as nine showed declines. Industries including education, health care and restaurants remained well in positive territory.

The ISM's nonmanufacturing new-orders index also fell, to 54.8 from 55.4, with the group's members reporting concerns about health-care costs and declines in the housing market. Stability in new orders is the main reason why Anthony Nieves, a supply-management executive at Hilton Hotels Corp. and author of the report, said he doesn't expect business activity to show big losses or gains next month. "This report overall is saying we're stabilizing a bit. We're getting to a level that is more middling."

Small Firm Tops Bernanke Logs (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone And Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A Who's Who of economists from Wall Street, academia, consulting and central banking scored coveted meetings with Ben Bernanke during his first months as Federal Reserve chairman.

Topping a list that included Wall Street heavyweights like Bear Stearns Cos. and Morgan Stanley, however, was a small St. Louis-based forecasting firm: Macroeconomic Advisers.

Former Fed Gov. Laurence Meyer and former Fed economist Brian Sack, both now with Macroeconomic Advisers' Washington office, enjoyed the greatest access to Mr. Bernanke among private-sector economists, the Fed chairman's visitor logs show.

The pair met with Mr. Bernanke three times last year, in March, August and September. Mr. Sack met with Mr. Bernanke an additional time in July, the logs showed.

Mr. Meyer co-founded Macroeconomic Advisers in the early 1980s as Laurence H. Meyer & Associates. While it isn't a household name, the firm carries considerable weight in investment and economic circles.

DOJ_NMG_0140689

Mr. Bernanke's visits with economists and consultants aren't unusual. His predecessor, Alan Greenspan, met often with private-sector economists, including many of the same ones seeing Mr. Bernanke in recent months. Mr. Greenspan's visitor logs for 2004 and the first half of 2005 showed no meetings with Messrs. Meyer and Sack, however.

"Federal Reserve officials find it beneficial to hear perspectives on markets from a wide range of practitioners, academics, forecasters and other specialists," said Fed spokeswoman Michelle Smith.

Mr. Bernanke's visitor log was obtained by Dow Jones Newswires through a Freedom of Information Act request. It lists only the names of people cleared through security to meet with him specifically. He may have also met with other people who were cleared to meet with other Fed officials.

Since taking the helm at the Fed in February 2006, Mr. Bernanke has sat down with several Wall Street economists, including Richard Berner of Morgan Stanley, David Malpass of Bear Stearns and several members of the American Bankers Association's economic advisory panel.

Top academics on his visitor logs include: Martin Feldstein, head of the National Bureau for Economic Research; Princeton Prof. and former Fed Vice Chairman Alan Blinder, and C. Fred Bergsten of the Peterson Institute for International Economics.

Mr. Bernanke also has met with economic consultants such as Larry Lindsey, head of the Lindsey Group and former economic adviser to President Bush, David Hale of Hale Advisers, and Manuel Johnson and David Smick of Johnson Smick International. Mr. Johnson was vice chairman of the Fed in the late 1980s.

Other firms whose representatives met with Mr. Bernanke included Goldman Sachs Group Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, BP PLC and the hedge funds Brevan Howard Asset Management and Tudor Investment Corp.

Asked about his visits to the Fed chairman, Macroeconomic Advisers' Mr. Sack said, "The Fed is often grappling with the same issues about the outlook that we are. ... We assess the economic outlook using an analytical approach that we believe is similar to that used by the Fed staff."

Under Mr. Bernanke, Fed policy is much less shrouded in secrecy than in the past.

EU Economy Is 20 Years Behind That Of US, Says Study (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

The European Union's economic development is only now reaching the level achieved by the US more than two decades ago, according to a study released yesterday.

The US reached the EU's current level of gross domestic product per capita in 1985, according to the report by Eurochambres, the pan-European business lobby.

The EU's employmentrate and level of investment in research and development were reached by the USin 1978, and its level of productivity (expressed in GDP per employed) was reached by the US in 1989, thereport said.

The conclusions suggest that despite last year's growth spurt and an acceleration of economic reforms, the EU is still far from matching America's economic clout.

It will make uncomfort-able reading for EU leaders at their economic summitin Brussels this week, a gathering that traditionally concludes with a call for further reforms to improve competitiveness.

The study illustrates the development gap between the two blocs by establishing how many years earlier the current set of EU indicators was attained in the US.

Compared with the first such report by Eurochambres published two years ago, it shows the time lag widened between 2003 and 2006.

The most drastic gap appears in R&D spending, where the time lag expanded from 23 to 28 years.

Though the deterioration can be explained in part by EU enlargement in 2004, when 10 less developed countries joined the bloc, it also reflects the fact that the US has extended its lead over Europe in many categories.

The study said: "Europe would need to register monstrous yearly performances to reach the current US levels by 2010."

DOJ_NMG_0140690

It pointed out that in order to match the 2005 US level of R&D spending, the EU's expenditure would have to grow by almost 14 per cent every year until 2010.

For the EU to catch up with US GDP per capita by 2010, the bloc would require annual growth rates of more than 8 per cent.

Last year US GDP grew by 3.3 per cent, compared with an average growth rate of 2.9 per cent across the 25 EU member states.

The study warned: "The EU is progressing at an insufficient pace to really compete on the world stage."

From Obama, A Map For A New March (WP)

By Richard Cohen

If you had to pick a winner in last weekend's Selma bake-off between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, it would have to be Obama. It is not just that he performed better than Hillary Clinton; it's that he had something very important to say to black America. It has to do, I think, with the extraordinary promise of his candidacy.

This is not an endorsement of Obama. At 45 years of age, questions about his youth, judgment and experience linger. We all have time to assess him on that score and glean -- and it will be no more than that -- whether, like Teddy Roosevelt (42), he is old enough for the presidency or, like Bill Clinton (46), he is still too young. For the moment, though, I wonder about something else: What impact will he have on America's abiding problems with race?

The cynic in me says that the answer is "not much." Yet the speech he gave commemorating the anniversary of the march by civil rights activists from Selma to Montgomery, Ala., is one that could not have been delivered by a white candidate, not even one with impeccable civil rights credentials such as Hillary Clinton has. Her speech was a recitation of Democratic Party cliches.

Not so Obama's. As Clinton did, he voiced the expected obeisance to Democratic Party shibboleths about school funding, health care, pensions and such, some of which matter, some of which don't. But then he turned to what clearly does matter: "discipline and fortitude . . . sometimes I feel like we've lost it a little bit."

There was a whole paragraph of text between the words "discipline and fortitude" and "we've lost it a little bit." Suffice it to say, it was an homage to the incredibly brave and, yes, disciplined civil rights activists of old -- ordinary people, most of them black, who practiced passive resistance. These were the young men and women -- "backs straight, eyes clear, suit and tie, sitting down at a lunch counter knowing somebody is going to spill milk on you" -- who subordinated their anger to something bigger: their cause. They made this country a much better place.

"But I'll tell you what," Obama went on. "Even as I fight on behalf of more education funding . . . I have to also say that if parents don't turn off the television set when the child comes home from school and make sure they sit down and do their homework and go talk to the teachers and find out how they're doing . . . I don't know who taught them that reading and writing and conjugating your verbs was something white."

Obama went on to urge blacks to couple their complaints with activism. "Put on your marching shoes," he said. "Go do some politics. Change this country!" That's what we need. And then he said, as he had to, that while there are too many children living in poverty -- and, of course, there are -- "don't tell me that it doesn't have a little to do with the fact that we got too many daddies not acting like daddies. Don't think that fatherhood ends at conception."

There is nothing particularly new about this message. You might call it warmed-over Bill Cosby or even an echo of Jesse Jackson. But Cosby is an entertainer and Jackson never stood any chance of getting to the White House. So the uniqueness is not the message; it is the refreshing combination of this particular man and what he is saying.

Will any of this matter? I can only hope so. After all, the problem no longer is widespread racism but the crushing effect that past racism has had on a particular group: young black men. A disproportionate number of them are in trouble -- and so, on that account, are we all. The statistics are appalling. Young black men are a teeny piece of the population, yet they are implicated in 25 percent of the nation's homicides and comprise 15 percent of all murder victims. Black men are more likely than white men to die of AIDS or, if you will, just plain die. Their life expectancy is more than six years shorter.

DOJ_NMG_0140691

Would a black president make a difference? Hard to say. But a black president -- or, for the moment, a black presidential candidate of consequence -- permits others to say what needs to be said, and that is a step in the right direction. It's been 42 years, but maybe a new march is about to begin.

Clinton Opens Door To Gay Activists (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, March 6, 2007

Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton told the nation's leading gay rights group in an unpublicized speech that she wants a partnership with gays if elected president.

Clinton also said she opposes the "don't ask, don't tell" policy regarding gays in the military that was instituted during her husband's presidency.

"I am proud to stand by your side," Clinton said in a keynote speech Friday to the Human Rights Campaign. Neither Clinton's campaign nor her Senate office made any announcement that she would be making the Friday address.

Asked twice at a Monday campaign stop in Iowa why she did not publicize her speech to the group, Clinton said: "You'll have to ask my campaign."

In the speech, Clinton joked that she shares the same initials as the group, and pledged to maintain the same close working relationship that last year helped defeat the federal amendment which would have banned same-sex marriage.

"I want you to know that this is exactly the kind of partnership we will have when I am president," Clinton told the group. "I want you to know that just as you always have an open door to my Senate office, you will always have an open door to the White House and together we can continue this journey."

Clinton's husband Bill Clinton was president when the Pentagon instituted the "don't ask, don't tell" policy, which says gays may serve in the military only if they keep their sexual orientation private. In 1999, as she prepared to run for the Senate from New York, Clinton publicly opposed that policy.

Previous to Bill Clinton's administration, gays were flatly forbidden from serving in the military.

Sen. Clinton said it would be safer for the nation if openly gay soldiers, sailors, Marines, and airmen could wear the uniform.

"This policy doesn't just hurt gays and lesbians, it hurts all our troops and this to me is a matter of national security and we're going to fix it," Clinton said.

Her chief rivals for the Democratic nomination, John Edwards and Barack Obama, also favor repealing the policy.

She also criticized the Bush administration for making political appeals based on gay rights issues, vowing that her presidency would mark "the end of leadership that has politicized the most personal and intimate issues."

Human Rights Campaign vice president David Smith said Clinton's comments were "very well received," though he added the group is not endorsing any candidate and does not anticipate making an endorsement "anytime soon."

Clinton spokesman Blake Zeff said Monday the candidate "affirmed her desire to have a strong partnership with the community as president," adding they were "delighted" the speech was available on the Internet.

Clinton aides said no announcement was made because the group's gathering is traditionally closed to the press. Video of the speech was posted on the group's Web site.

Smith said such annual board meetings have always been closed to the press, but it was the first time he could remember that a speech at such a meeting had been made public afterward.

"There's no contradiction," he said. "The event is always closed to the press and we wanted to make (the remarks) available for people to see."

Clinton spent Monday in Iowa, telling workers energy independence is critical to the country's future and similar to the U.S. fight against communism during the Cold War.

"Today we know that we have to move away from our dependence on foreign oil. Everyone says that," she said. "Our problem is figuring out how we would actually do it."

Clinton Plans Major Appeal To Women (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

DOJ_NMG_0140692

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton will begin an ambitious effort on Tuesday to enlist thousands of women to play roles in her presidential campaign, hoping to build on the enthusiasm her candidacy has stirred among female voters at early campaign events.

Mrs. Clinton will announce the drive, which will unfold through March to coincide with Women's History Month, in a speech at the annual luncheon held by Emily's List, a political group favoring Democratic female candidates who support abortion rights that has already endorsed her.

The campaign intends to use social networking tools and other Web technology to develop a thousands-strong Women's Leadership Network, which would promote Mrs. Clinton's candidacy nationwide and, by this fall, hold campaign events and take part in fund-raising.

"When a woman has an important question, like who's a good doctor, they're more likely to talk to another woman," said Ann Lewis, a senior adviser to Mrs. Clinton. "If we can get a discussion going among women about the campaign, and Hillary as a candidate, it would be hugely important."

Clinton advisers are also devising campaign roles for prominent female supporters who made breakthroughs in their own fields, including the tennis champion Billie Jean King; Geraldine Ferraro, the vice-presidential nominee in 1984; and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Ms. Albright, for instance, recently joined former President Bill Clinton to help raise $1 million in a week for Mrs. Clinton, while Ms. Ferraro, a contributor on Fox News, recently told people there that she or another Clinton surrogate should appear whenever someone known to hold strong views against Mrs. Clinton is invited on air to talk politics.

Another component of the plan would provide a Web platform and networking tool to mothers and daughters to share stories that relate to the theme "I Can Be President." A children's poster contest on the theme is also being planned.

Clinton advisers said their outreach plan had been in the works since Mrs. Clinton's first trip to Iowa in January.

The advisers estimate that 60 percent of voters in the 2008 Democratic primary will be women, and their goal is to win at least twice as many female votes as any of Mrs. Clinton's rivals.

"I've joked that we should put up a big sign on the door that says '54 percent,' since women are 54 percent of the electorate," Ms. Lewis said.

Advisers to Mrs. Clinton say she does particularly well with young women, single women and mothers. At the same time, in interviews, some women in the Democratic Party have expressed concerns about Mrs. Clinton, like her ability to win a general election, her early support for the Iraq war and her proposed legislation to ban flag burning.

Ms. Ferraro said she believed that many women, including Clinton skeptics, would ultimately be impressed with Mrs. Clinton's gutsiness in enduring the scrutiny and attacks that could come along with being a "first."

Listening And Nodding, Clinton Shapes '08 Image (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

BERLIN, N.H. — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton signs autographs meticulously, drawing out each line and curve of "H-i-l-l-a-r-y," "R-o-d-h-a-m" and "C-l-i-n-t-o-n." She leaves no stray lines or wayward marks.

"Hillary, over here, over here," called out a young woman from the mob that formed outside the Berlin Town Hall when Mrs. Clinton, Democrat of New York, arrived for a "conversation," in the parlance of the made-to-order intimacy of her presidential campaign. "Can you sign my Hillary sign, please?" the woman asked.

Mrs. Clinton autographed the poster, carefully. It took a full seven or eight seconds, none of the two-second scribbles of other politicians. She is the diligent student who gets an A in penmanship, the woman in a hurry who still takes care to dot her i's.

"I'm Hillary Clinton, and I'm running for president," she says at campaign appearances. Lamenting that her public image has been distorted by caricature, she often says, "I may be the most famous person you don't really know." In the cliché of contemporary politics, Mrs. Clinton is "reintroducing herself to the American people."

She is, in this latest unveiling, the Nurturing Warrior. She displays a cozy acquaintance ("Let's chat") and leaderly confidence ("I'm in it to win it"). She is a tea-sipping girlfriend who vows to "deck" anyone who attacks her; a giggly mom who invokes old Girl Scout songs and refuses to apologize for voting for the Iraq War Resolution in 2002. Her aim, of course, is to show that she is tough enough to lead Americans in wartime but tender enough to understand their burdens.

Over the years, Mrs. Clinton has evolved through a series of female personas. Her outspoken feminism and perceived putdown of cookie-baking mothers provoked fierce criticism. She became the classic "woman wronged" after the Monica Lewinsky scandal.

As a Senate candidate in 2000, Mrs. Clinton embraced the role of an attentive "listener" as opposed to the power-hungry climber many had suspected. In the Senate, Mrs. Clinton has applied herself to winning over colleagues and becoming one of the boys.

In Mrs. Clinton's campaign now, her operative conceit is "the conversation." It is impossible to attend a Hillary-for-president event and forget you are joining a "conversation," instead of hearing a conventional political speech. Mrs. Clinton relentlessly repeats the catchword, and for those who missed it, there are huge "Let the Conversation Begin" signs on the wall.

After each presentation, Mrs. Clinton engages in a frenzy of 20-second conversations with the rhythmic efficiency of an assembly line.

"What kind of solar panels do you use?" she asked a woman in Berlin, a small city in the mountains of northern New Hampshire. "And do you sell to the grid?" Then she moved to the next person.

She contrasts the give-and-take of her chitchats — even though she does most of the talking — with what she suggests are the pig-headed pronouncements of a male bogeyman, George W. Bush. She rails against what she calls the "one-sided conversation" of Washington during the Bush years, bemoans President Bush's "stubbornness," speaks of her frustration at getting him to hear opposing views. She essentially portrays him as an exasperating husband who is beyond marriage counseling.

It is not easy, though, to humanize a juggernaut, which Mrs. Clinton's well-financed and hyperdisciplined campaign most certainly is. And it is difficult to appear authentic in tightly controlled settings, or conduct intimate conversations amid mobs of people, many wearing press credentials.

But the senator is trying hard. In appearances in Washington and around the country, Mrs. Clinton — Version 08, Nurturing Warrior, Presidential Candidate Model — is speaking more freely of her gender than she has in years. Her campaign knows that Democratic women are her most loyal supporters. Ann Lewis, a senior campaign aide, points out that women made up 54 percent of the electorate in 2004; Mrs. Clinton garnered 73 percent of female voters in her re-election campaign last year, compared with 61 percent of male voters, according to exit polls.

At a Capitol Hill ceremony in February to honor Sojourner Truth, the 19th-century slave turned abolitionist, Mrs. Clinton enveloped a series of women in hugs. She bestowed the "best-dressed and most-stylish" status on one guest and commented that an old, departed friend "has got one of those turbans on, showing that style all over Heaven."

Mrs. Clinton then looked to the ceiling and spread her hand wide over heart, performing a little side-to-side jig with her head.

She invoked Sojourner Truth's iconic quotation, "Ain't I a woman?" and added, "Well, I've been saying that a few times lately, too."

There were whoops, applause and shouts of "you go, girl" for Mrs. Clinton.

As she spoke, a press aide, Philippe Reines, held her purse.

The Listener

Mrs. Clinton is a prodigious nodder. She is always nodding, in an array of distinctive flavors: the stern, deferential nod (at a Senate news conference, when her colleague Evan Bayh described conditions in Afghanistan); the empathetic, lips-pursed nod (when a man in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, tells her about his son's epilepsy); the squinty, disbelieving nod (when a general testifies on Iraq before the Senate Armed Services Committee); the dutiful acknowledgment nod (when being applauded); and the blushing nod (when a veteran in Des Moines tells her "I think you look very nice").

The nodding appears unconscious, but not always. She nodded through a news conference with New York lawmakers discussing medical care for Sept. 11 relief workers.

"Nine-eleven was an act of war," Representative Jerrold Nadler, Democrat of New York, said as Mrs. Clinton stood by, head bobbing.

"The villains aren't the terrorists," Mr. Nadler continued. "The villains live in the White House."

At which point Mrs. Clinton, perhaps sensing that the rhetoric had gotten too hot, stopped nodding.

Bill Clinton was also a great nodder, known for his "I-feel-your-pain" empathy and seeming ability to summon a misty-eyed visage on demand. He will pretty much hug anyone. His wife, who regularly invokes him on the campaign trial — "When Bill had his heart surgery," "Bill used to love Dunkin' Donuts," "Bill always reached out to other people who would be patient and listen" — can suffer by comparison. She keeps a more cautious distance, although when she does hug, she also tends to air-kiss (with a loud "mwwwwwahh").

The former president has a gift for the quick connection, making people feel special. Mrs. Clinton appears more interested in exchanging information. She is quick with questions ("When did you graduate?") and rejoinders ("You're the second person I've met from Park Ridge today!").

Numerous attendees seem to know people who went to college or law school with Mrs. Clinton, or used to live in Arkansas, or the Chicago suburbs, or who have a daughter named Chelsea.

She impresses them and others with her listening prowess.

"She connected with me much better than I expected she would," said Rachel Stuart, in Berlin. "She was right there. There was a real sense of her as a great listener."

Mrs. Clinton clearly likes that portrayal. In face-to-face campaign settings, she brings her head close in, appearing engaged. After the Berlin conversation, Mrs. Clinton stopped in for one of those "spontaneous" campaign drop-bys at a local cafe (thoroughly scoped out by advance-people and Secret Service agents). She sat at a corner table and chatted with a group of local reporters.

The Sister Act

"Conversation" audiences are predominantly female. At her events, Mrs. Clinton is more likely to call on women than men. She gets physically closer to women who approach her. She compliments their clothes and asks about their children.

She is proper and polite, diligent about thanking everybody, including "the janitor who got up at 5 a.m. to open the facility," at Berlin Town Hall, "Tea Birds for the delicious food," and "everyone in Berlin for making me feel so welcome."

In Keene, N.H., in February, Mrs. Clinton said she was so thankful to all of the people "who gave me confidence," not something that male politicians typically say. Nor do they worry aloud about gaining weight.

"I really don't understand why people hate her so much except that they don't like strong women," said the Rev. Eleanor McLaughlin, the rector at St. Barnabas' Episcopal Church in Berlin. "I get a lot of that myself."

Ms. McLaughlin taught at Wellesley College in the 1960s and remembers Mrs. Clinton as a firebrand undergraduate. A few feet away, the senator was between autographs. She popped a red lozenge into her mouth, took a sip of water and shouted out after someone for whom she just signed a copy of her book ("Young man, I have your pen!").

Her eyes bugged out when Ms. McLaughlin introduced herself. "Oh my God," Mrs. Clinton exclaimed.

Afterward, Ms. McLaughlin said: "It's great to be able to talk to her for a few seconds. To be able to say, 'You go, girl.' Wow."

The senator regularly mentions familiar female grievances. "I don't think I'm the only woman here who thinks you have to work harder," Mrs. Clinton said at a high school in Des Moines.

"I expect," she added with a sigh, "there'll be more stories about my clothes and hair than the other people running." That elicits scattered jeers.

The comedian Jon Stewart questions whether her "conversation" conceit will work with men. "I think the typical response would be 'Now?' " he joked recently on "The Daily Show," adding that Mrs. Clinton's new Iraq policy is "America, let's just pull over and ask for directions."

But she tries to connect with women by expressing her frustration with those men now in charge. In Berlin, she waves her hands in the air when discussing Mr. Bush's — and Vice President Dick Cheney's — seeming infatuation with invading Iraq from early on in their administration.

"I'm not a psychiatrist," she declared, "so I don't know all the reasons behind their concern, some would say obsession, with Saddam Hussein."

There is a larger lesson here, girls. "You've got to be willing to talk to bad people," she said. "Sometimes you just have to deal with people you don't agree with."

She asked, "Have you ever tried to have a conversation with a difficult person?"

She nodded for emphasis, and many in the audience nodded back at her.

Tough Hostess

She cannot appear mushy. She drops in periodic tough-talk, glibly mentions the time "my husband bombed Iraq," or says she is willing to "shoot down" violators of a Darfur no-fly-zone. When asked in Des Moines how her campaign would differ from that of Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat and presidential nominee in 2004, she vows, "You can count on me to stand up and hold our ground and fight back."

Everywhere she goes, Mrs. Clinton is invited to apologize for her Iraq vote in 2002, but no dice. "There are no do-overs in life," she says. Tough self-love, in other words, implicitly chiding her girlie-men opponents for running around, saying they had made a mistake.

"I'm in the arena," she said in Concord, quoting Theodore Roosevelt, one of the enduring political alpha-males in American politics. She says so in the high, insistent pitch of a fed-up mom.

Her constant "I'm in to win" affirmations convey a calibrated confidence. She prefers the "when I'm president" construction to the humbler "If you elect me president" qualifier.

"I want to have universal health care by the end of my second term" she announced at an education event in Nevada in February.

She is not above trash talk. In Nashua, Mrs. Clinton boasted that the Republicans Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker; Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader; and Karl Rove, the president's adviser, had "privately" said "I am the one person they are most afraid of."

But there is also a discernible sense of nervousness at the conversations. Her aides are fiercely protective of her, as are many of her supporters.

The crowd booed reflexively, for instance, after Mrs. Clinton called on a man in Keene who promised that he would not ask her whether she wore boxers or briefs — as a young woman once famously asked Bill Clinton on MTV.

The joke fell predictably flat, and Mrs. Clinton smiled tightly amid more boos.

Her staff members hunch visibly and look up from their BlackBerries when audience members unfurl their questions, as if every conversation could be ruined at any moment by an unwelcome remark — about impeachment, Monica, Whitewater or some other unpleasantness. But in an odd way, Mrs. Clinton's unspoken vulnerability also enhances her ability to forge affinities.

"You have to feel bad for her after what she went through with her husband, you know?" said Bruce Bunnell, a forestry worker, in Berlin.

He handed Mrs. Clinton photos of his young son and daughter. She said they were beautiful, asked how old they were, went over the spelling of their names and then signed her own, slowly.

Disinvitation By Obama Is Criticized (NYT)

By Jodi Kantor

DOJ_NMG_0140696

CHICAGO, March 5 — The Rev. Jeremiah A. Wright Jr., senior pastor of the popular Trinity United Church of Christ in Chicago and spiritual mentor to Senator Barack Obama, thought he knew what he would be doing on Feb. 10, the day of Senator Obama's presidential announcement.

After all, back in January, Mr. Obama had asked Mr. Wright if he would begin the event by delivering a public invocation.

But Mr. Wright said Mr. Obama called him the night before the Feb. 10 announcement and rescinded the invitation to give the invocation.

"Fifteen minutes before Shabbos I get a call from Barack," Mr. Wright said in an interview on Monday, recalling that he was at an interfaith conference at the time. "One of his members had talked him into uninviting me," Mr. Wright said, referring to Mr. Obama's campaign advisers.

Some black leaders are questioning Mr. Obama's decision to distance his campaign from Mr. Wright because of the campaign's apparent fear of criticism over Mr. Wright's teachings, which some say are overly Afrocentric to the point of excluding whites.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Obama campaign, said the campaign disinvited Mr. Wright because it did not want the church to face negative attention. Mr. Wright did however, attend the announcement and prayed with Mr. Obama beforehand.

"Senator Obama is proud of his pastor and his church, but because of the type of attention it was receiving on blogs and conservative talk shows, he decided to avoid having statements and beliefs being used out of context and forcing the entire church to defend itself," Mr. Burton said.

Instead, Mr. Obama asked Mr. Wright's successor as pastor at Trinity, the Rev. Otis Moss III, to speak. Mr. Moss declined.

In recent weeks, word of Mr. Obama's treatment of Mr. Wright has reached black leaders like the Rev. Al Sharpton and given them pause.

"I have not discussed this with Senator Obama in detail, but I can see why callers of mine and other clergymen would be concerned, because the issue is standing by your own pastor," Mr. Sharpton said.

Mr. Wright's church, the 8,000-member Trinity United Church of Christ, is considered mainstream — Oprah Winfrey has attended services, and many members are prominent black professionals. But the church is also more Afrocentric and politically active than standard black congregations.

Mr. Wright helped organize the 1995 Million Man March on Washington and along with other United Church of Christ ministers was one of the first black religious leaders to protest apartheid and welcome gay and lesbian worshippers.

Since Mr. Obama made his presidential ambitions clear, conservatives have drawn attention to his close relationship to Mr. Wright and to the church's emphasis on black empowerment. Tucker Carlson of MSNBC called the precepts "racially exclusive" and "wrong." Last week, on the Fox News program "Hannity & Colmes," Erik Rush, a conservative columnist, called the church "quite cultish, quite separatist."

In Monday's interview, Mr. Wright expressed disappointment but no surprise that Mr. Obama might try to play down their connection.

"When his enemies find out that in 1984 I went to Tripoli" to visit Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, Mr. Wright recalled, "with Farrakhan, a lot of his Jewish support will dry up quicker than a snowball in hell." Mr. Wright added that his trip implied no endorsement of either Louis Farrakhan's views or Qaddafi's.

Mr. Wright said that in the phone conversation in which Mr. Obama disinvited him from a role in the announcement, Mr. Obama cited an article in Rolling Stone, "The Radical Roots of Barack Obama."

According to the pastor, Mr. Obama then told him, "You can get kind of rough in the sermons, so what we've decided is that it's best for you not to be out there in public."

Obama: Man Of The World (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

DOJ_NMG_0140697

The conventional wisdom about Barack Obama is that he's smart and charismatic but so inexperienced that we should feel jittery about him in the Oval Office.

But that view is myopic. In some respects, Mr. Obama is far more experienced than other presidential candidates.

His experience as an antipoverty organizer in Chicago, for example, gives him a deep grasp of a crucial 21st-century challenge — poverty in America — that almost all politicians lack. He says that grass-roots experience helps explain why he favors not only government spending programs, like early childhood education, but also cultural initiatives, like efforts to promote responsible fatherhood.

In foreign policy as well, Mr. Obama would bring to the White House an important experience that most other candidates lack: he has actually lived abroad. He spent four years as a child in Indonesia and attended schools in the Indonesian language, which he still speaks.

"I was a little Jakarta street kid," he said in a wide-ranging interview in his office (excerpts are on my blog, www.nytimes.com/ontheground). He once got in trouble for making faces during Koran study classes in his elementary school, but a president is less likely to stereotype Muslims as fanatics — and more likely to be aware of their nationalism — if he once studied the Koran with them.

Mr. Obama recalled the opening lines of the Arabic call to prayer, reciting them with a first-rate accent. In a remark that seemed delightfully uncalculated (it'll give Alabama voters heart attacks), Mr. Obama described the call to prayer as "one of the prettiest sounds on Earth at sunset."

Moreover, Mr. Obama's own grandfather in Kenya was a Muslim. Mr. Obama never met his grandfather and says he isn't sure if his grandfather's two wives were simultaneous or consecutive, or even if he was Sunni or Shiite. (O.K., maybe Mr. Obama should just give up on Alabama.)

Our biggest mistake since World War II has been a lack of sensitivity to other people's nationalism, from Vietnam to Iraq. Perhaps as a result of his background, Mr. Obama has been unusually sensitive to such issues and to the need to project respect rather than arrogance. He has consistently shown great instincts.

Mr. Obama's visit to Africa last year hit just the right diplomatic notes. In Kenya, he warmly greeted the president — but denounced corruption and went out of his way to visit a bold newspaper that government agents had ransacked. In South Africa, he respectfully but firmly criticized the government's unscientific bungling of the AIDS epidemic. In Chad, he visited Darfur refugees.

"My experience growing up in Indonesia or having family in small villages in Africa — I think it makes me much more mindful of the importance of issues like personal security or freedom from corruption," he said, adding: "I've witnessed it in much more direct ways than I think the average American has witnessed it."

As a senator, Mr. Obama has not only seized the issue of nuclear proliferation, but also the question of small arms. For a majority of the world's inhabitants, those AK-47s and R.P.G.'s are the weapons of mass destruction.

So how would an Obama administration differ from the Bill Clinton presidency in foreign policy? One way, he said, would be a much greater emphasis on promoting education, health care and development in Africa and other poor regions — not just for humanitarian reasons, but also with an eye to national security.

"If we can't take what, relative to our military hardware and defense budgets, are a pittance, and put some resources into these areas, we will not be secure," he noted, adding: "The Marshall Plan was part of a security strategy; it wasn't simply charity."

Mr. Obama thumps the White House on trade and foreign investments, like the Dubai ports deal — but he isn't demagogic in the way that too many Democrats have been. And three years ago, Mr. Obama was quoted in The Chicago Tribune as making hawkish comments about a military strike on Iran, but in the interview he pirouetted and noted that one of the lessons of Iraq is that "being trigger-happy ... is a recipe for disaster." That's a welcome sign of growth.

So, granted, Mr. Obama lacks the extensive experience at top levels of diplomacy of, say, Dick Cheney or ... oh, never mind.

What sets Mr. Obama apart is the way his training has been at the grass-roots rather than in the treetops. And that may be the richest kind of background of all, yielding not just experience, but also wisdom.

Edwards: Jesus Would Be 'Appalled' (AP)

By Mike Baker

AP, March 6, 2007

Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards says Jesus would be appalled at how the United States has ignored the plight of the suffering, and that he believes children should have private time to pray at school.

Edwards, in an interview with the Web site Beliefnet.com, said Jesus would be most upset with the selfishness of Americans and the country's willingness to go to war "when it's not necessary."

"I think that Jesus would be disappointed in our ignoring the plight of those around us who are suffering and our focus on our own selfish short-term needs," Edwards told the site. "I think he would be appalled, actually."

Edwards also said he was against teacher-led prayers in public schools, but he added that "allowing time for children to pray for themselves, to themselves, I think is not only OK, I think it's a good thing."

In the interview, the former North Carolina senator discussed how he lost touch with his day-to-day faith during college, but that it "came roaring back" after the death of his 16-year-old son, Wade, in 1996.

Edwards has often cited religion as a part of his politics, frequently linking his efforts to fight poverty as a matter of morality.

Edwards was interviewed by David Kuo, a conservative Christian who served as deputy director of President Bush's Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until 2003. Kuo wrote a book, "Tempting Faith, An Inside Story of Political Seduction," that said Bush aides privately called conservative Christians "nuts," "ridiculous" and "goofy."

Edwards told Kuo he stood by a decision to keep two bloggers on his staff despite their provocative writings criticizing the Catholic Church. Edwards said he also found the writing offensive, but "decided to forgive them and stand by them, knowing there would be potential political consequences for that."

The bloggers later quit, saying they didn't want to be a liability to the campaign.

Prominently featured on John Edwards' presidential campaign Web site is a video of conservative commentator Ann Coulter insulting him. And with just a mouse click you can hear the invective and get a chance to donate at the same time.

On Friday, Coulter, a writer and columnist known for provocative remarks, told an audience at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington: "I was going to have a few comments on the other Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, but it turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I — so kind of an impasse, can't really talk about Edwards."

The Edwards camp is now seeking to capitalize on the slur by soliciting $100,000 in "Coulter Cash" to "show that inflaming prejudice to attack progressive leaders will only backfire."

Meanwhile, conservatives were none too pleased with Coulter, either. Rev. Patrick J. Mahoney, Director of the Christian Defense Coalition, said: "Frankly, I would have loved to have heard Ann expose and dissect the radical agenda of Senator Edwards instead of resorting to cheap name calling."

On Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes" Monday night, Coulter said the word "isn't offensive to gays, it has nothing to do with gays. It's a schoolyard taunt."

ORANGEBURG, S.C. (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Joe Biden on Monday called Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad a "madman" and raised the possibility that he could be assassinated by foes within his country.

"Ahmadinejad, the madman, is in competition with mullahs and ayatollahs who think he's overstepped his bounds," Biden told members of a local Kiwanis Club in this early voting state.

Ahmadinejad may be "assassinated, not by the good guys, but by the bad guys," said the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

At a campaign stop Sunday, Biden called Ahmadinejad "that wacko guy, the crazy president," and said he would only be in office for a little more than a year before being "taken out" because he threatened Shia interests.

DOJ_NMG_0140699

Last week, Connecticut Democratic Sen. Chris Dodd told a University of South Carolina audience he endorsed the Bush administration's recent willingness to hold joint talks on Iraq with Syria and Iran. But Dodd, also a presidential hopeful, said the United States needs to avoid talking with Ahmadinejad and called him "a thug."

Biden's campaign on Monday also announced he was endorsed by state Sen. Gerald Malloy and state Rep. Jerry Govan, both members of the Legislative Black Caucus.

NEW YORK (AP) — New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg had a slightly different answer on Monday for that same old question he's dismissed over and over: Are you going to run for president?

"I don't think so — and if I was going to do it, I don't think I'd announce it right here," he said during a brief appearance Monday morning on Fox News.

The host noted that the billionaire businessman had a similar answer when asked, years ago, if he planned to run for mayor.

"And then fast forward, here you are," she said.

"You never know," he said.

For the record, just days ago Bloomberg told an audience at Harvard University that he was not, in fact, a presidential candidate.

Ever since the Democrat-turned-Republican won re-election in 2005, there has been some talk of a Bloomberg presidential bid. Most of the talk has been fueled by one of his aides, Kevin Sheekey, who has publicly acknowledged his efforts to cajole his boss into the race.

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. (AP) — Democratic presidential contender John Edwards is mailing Iowa caucus voters some 70,000 DVDs that argue he is the only candidate with a health care plan for all Americans.

The Edwards campaign hoped to reach a significant number of Iowa's Democratic caucus voters with the DVD. Slightly more than 100,000 participated in the 2004 caucus.

"What America really wants in their next president is to be able to trust their president," Edwards says in the six-minute video. "In order for that to be true, they want to feel like ... the president is a good and decent and honest human being who's trying to do what's right."

The video and pamphlet specifically address health care problems and statistics in Iowa, where the state's leadoff caucuses will begin the nomination process.

Sen. John Kerry won Iowa in 2004 and went on to earn the party's nomination. Edwards placed second in Iowa and later earned a spot as Kerry's vice presidential nominee.

Edwards has proposed a tax increase to fund a universal health care plan that would cover the estimated 47 million Americans who do not have insurance. The plan would create "health markets," including a government-run plan like Medicare, to create competitive prices. It would also subsidize insurance for low-income Americans and require businesses to help cover the insurance costs of their employees.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Judicial Watch, a conservative investigative group that dogged the Clinton presidency, is asking for an investigation of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for filing an incomplete financial disclosure report.

The group filed a complaint with the Senate Ethics Committee and the Justice Department, noting that Clinton had failed to report that she was secretary-treasurer of the Clinton Family Foundation in documents that must be filed annually with the Senate. In the face of an official complaint, Senate rules require the ethics committee to begin a preliminary inquiry.

Clinton amended her disclosure report on Feb. 26 to include her foundation affiliation after The Washington Post reported the omission. Data about the foundation, and Clinton's role in it, also is available from other public records. According to Internal Revenue Service records, the foundation had nearly $1.8 million in income in 2005.

"This was an inadvertent omission that was immediately corrected," said Clinton spokesman Philippe Reines.

Giuliani Seeks Privacy On Family Issues (AP)

By Michael R. Blood

AP, March 6, 2007

Republican presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani asked for privacy on Monday to deal with strained relationships within his family, including the estrangement between his son and his third wife.

Campaigning in Southern California, Giuliani faced questions about his family after his son, Andrew, publicly said their relationship had become distant after Giuliani's messy divorce from Andrew's mother, Donna Hanover, and his later marriage to Judith Nathan.

"My wife Judith is a very loving and caring ... mother and stepmother. She has done everything she can. The responsibility is mine," the former New York mayor told reporters gathered outside the Los Angeles County Sheriff's headquarters.

"I believe that these problems with blended families, you know, are challenges — sometimes they are," he said. "The more privacy I can have for my family, the better we are going to be able to deal with all these difficulties."

The New York Times reported Saturday that Andrew Giuliani and his father have recently tried to reconcile after not speaking "for a decent amount of time." In the Times article, Andrew said, "There's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife."

He told the newspaper he would not participate in his father's campaign, saying he intended to concentrate on becoming a professional golfer. The 21-year-old Duke University student told ABC News' "Good Morning America," "I got my values from my mother. She's a strong influence in my life. She's a strong woman. I have problems with my father, but that doesn't mean he won't make a good president."

The dispute with his son sidetracked a Giuliani event that was intended to highlight his crime-fighting credentials. He met privately with sheriffs from Southern California and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who later introduced him at a brief news conference.

The Republican governor, who had not endorsed a 2008 candidate, called the former mayor "very successful," but his praise was more restrained compared to the compliments he lavished on rival candidate John McCain last week.

Giuliani's personal life was a staple of New York tabloid headlines during his later years at City Hall. Hanover accused Giuliani of having an affair with a former staffer, which he denied. At one point, the mayor began staying away from the official mayoral residence, Gracie Mansion, and sleeping at a co-op owned by friend and fundraiser Howard Koeppel. Giuliani and Hanover reached a divorce settlement in 2002.

The couple had two children, Andrew and Caroline, now 17.

Giuliani's first marriage was annulled.

Hizzoner The Curmudgeon (WP)

By Jonathan Capehart

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Forget about whether Rudy Giuliani is too moderate to win over the conservatives who dominate the nomination process in the Republican Party. The real story is whether the opera buff's nascent presidential bid will be crushed under the weight of the Pucciniesque life of the 107th mayor of New York.

We all know about the first wife who was his second cousin, the second wife who found out she was being divorced while watching television and the third wife who was barred by court order from the mayor's residence or from meeting Giuliani's children, Andrew and Caroline, there before the divorce was final.

Now come the public comments from Andrew that he won't be stumping for pops in Iowa, New Hampshire or anywhere else. Not only did he say "I have problems with my father," but he also added, "There's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife."

If past is prologue, the younger Giuliani's phone must have crackled with Rudy rage once his comments came to light. See, when Giuliani was mayor, he brooked no criticism -- no matter how minor, no matter how constructive. Having been on the receiving end of one of Giuliani's withering verbal assaults, I know of what I speak.

The phone rang around 9 a.m. on Jan. 7, 1999. It was Giuliani's personal assistant, Beth Patrone. "Please hold for the mayor." He had never called me before. His skin-peeling tirades against reporters, politicians, community leaders, perceived enemies and those deemed too weak to fight City Hall were legendary. Now it was my turn.

Giuliani was spitting fire over my column in that morning's New York Daily News, in which I likened his second term to the sitcom "Seinfeld." The thesis was summed up in the first paragraph: "The show has been reincarnated as Mayor Giuliani's second term, which has turned into a term about nothing."

"Jonathan," he said.

"Good morning, Mr. Mayor," I said, "How . . ."

For the next 10 minutes, Giuliani ripped me apart, calling my column "intellectually dishonest," among other things. He hung up when he couldn't find a favorable editorial that I'd written on his State of the City speech the previous year. But he called back, spouting off the headline and launching into another 10-minute monologue.

His press secretary, Sunny Mindel, called me afterward. "Consider yourself flattered," she said. "You're important enough to warrant a phone call. You got under his skin." I knew that I had accomplished no great feat. The mayor's skin is as thin as America's Next Top Model.

People disagreed with me all the time. I encouraged discussion and accepted that others had different viewpoints. But Giuliani's reaction was over the top. I tell this story because it points to other aspects of hizzoner's personality that were more troublesome.

Giuliani could be vindictive. He had no qualms about using government to settle a score. When the City Council overrode his veto of a bill to change the operations of homeless shelters in December 1998, Giuliani sought to evict five community service programs, including one that served 500 mentally ill people, in the district of the bill's chief sponsor, and to replace them with a homeless shelter.

What's more, he released a list of sites for other shelters that would be housed in the districts of council members who voted in favor of the override. (He backed down two months later, after much public outrage.)

Rather than take the high road earlier that year, Giuliani erupted when the Rev. Calvin O. Butts, a prominent Harlem minister who had endorsed Giuliani for reelection, said, "I don't believe he likes black people." In fact, Giuliani put a lockdown on city funding for projects affiliated with the politically connected cleric.

But it was his reaction to racially charged incidents involving the police that highlighted Giuliani's other affliction: tone-deafness.

Amadou Diallo was reaching for his wallet when undercover police officers gunned him down in a hail of 41 bullets in the vestibule of his apartment building in 1999. New Yorkers of all colors and political stripes trouped to police headquarters to be arrested in protest of not only the officers' actions but also of Giuliani's inability to grasp why everyone was appalled by what happened.

The visionary mayor who brought law and order to the ungovernable city and who became the face of a bloodied but unbowed nation on Sept. 11, 2001, was a difficult mayor. Many wonder whether the trauma of that day has mellowed Giuliani. We'll soon know. There's nothing like the stress of a presidential campaign to find out for sure.

Giuliani Is Selling Investment Firm; Spokeswoman Calls Step Part Of Focusing On Campaign (NYT)

By Russ Buettner And Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani announced yesterday the planned sale of his boutique investment bank to an Australian company, a transaction that a company official said was part of Mr. Giuliani's increasing focus on his presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0140702

The firm, Giuliani Capital Advisors, is being sold to the Macquarie Group, a financial services business based in Sydney, Australia, with more than 9,600 employees worldwide. Terms of the sale, which is expected to be final in June, were not released.

"It's indicative of his gearing up and focusing on his candidacy," said Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Giuliani Partners, Mr. Giuliani's core consulting business.

Giuliani Capital Advisors, a subsidiary of Giuliani Partners, advises parties in bankruptcy proceedings and has a practice in mergers and acquisitions. It has about 100 employees and reported revenues of $47.8 million in 2005, its most recent filing, and the firm's officials have described Mr. Giuliani's role as very limited.

The firm would be the easiest of Mr. Giuliani's business interests to break off for sale. Giuliani Partners, the parent company, relies to a far greater extent on the name value and expertise of Mr. Giuliani and his closest advisers, many of whom are expected to join his campaign.

Another division, Giuliani Safety and Security, suffered a setback in 2004 with the unexpected departure of Bernard B. Kerik, who faced ethical and legal problems after his withdrawal from consideration to be President Bush's secretary of homeland security. The division has since grown under the leadership of a respected former F.B.I. official, but it still had only about 10 clients as of January.

Company officials have previously said that Giuliani Capital's client list could pose problems for the Giuliani campaign. So, too, could his other businesses and affiliations. Giuliani Partners has advised companies facing accusations of financial improprieties. And Bracewell & Giuliani, a law firm based in Houston, represents many companies often accused by environmentalists of being excessive polluters.

Similar companies have been selling for about 1.6 times their annual revenue, but that multiple assumes that key personnel sign on with the new owner, said Tobey Sommer, an analyst with SunTrust Robinson Humphrey Capital Markets who covers leaders in the sector. Such a multiple for Giuliani Capital Advisors would generate a price of about $76 million, based on the 2005 revenue figure.

That would mark a substantial gain. Giuliani Partners bought a majority interest in the firm from Ernst & Young in 2004 for $9.8 million.

Eight of Giuliani Capital's original 22 managing directors left last year, which can be indicative that a firm is not paying its top executives competitively, said Mr. Sommer, the analyst.

"Turnover is the bugaboo you've got to manage against," said Mr. Sommer, who is based in Nashville.

The transaction is contingent upon regulatory approval and the signing of Giuliani Capital's employees by Macquarie, which currently has 350 investment banking professionals in North America, a Macquarie spokesman said.

During an appearance yesterday in Monterey Park, Calif., Mr. Giuliani for the first time addressed remarks by his son, Andrew, in The New York Times in which he said he felt estranged from his father because of his marriage to Judith Nathan, Mr. Giuliani's third wife.

"My wife, Judith, is a very loving and caring and good mother and grandmother, good mother and stepmother," Mr. Giuliani replied to a barrage of questions from dozens of journalists about his relationship with his children. "She has done everything she can. The responsibility is mine.

"And I believe that these problems with blended families are challenges. Sometimes they are. And the challenges are best worked on privately. In other words, the more privacy I can have for my family the better we are going to be able to deal with all these difficulties, and the best way to kind of handle that is to make as little comment about this as possible."

Giuliani Sells Bank In Campaign Move (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington And James Politi In New York

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, on Monday provided further evidence that he is stepping up his presidential campaign for 2008 when he sold his boutique investment bank, Giuliani Capital Partners, addressing concerns about potential conflicts of interest and adding to his warchest of campaign financing.

The terms of the sale to Macquarie Group, an Australian financial group, were not disclosed but analysts said that Giuliani Capital Advisors could be worth as much as $100m. It represents a large chunk of Mr Giuliani's business interests, which he began building in early 2002, shortly after leaving his post as mayor.

GCA advises on mergers and acquisitions and restructurings in sectors such as infrastructure, energy, and property. Although largely US-based, it has advised on several international deals, particularly in Germany and the UK. It came under Mr Giuliani's umbrella in 2004, trebling the size of his business interests, which were mostly confined to Giuliani Partners, a management consultancy. A spokesman for GP declined to comment on whether it would also be sold.

After months of being coy about his intentions Mr Giuliani has emerged as the Republican frontrunner, benefiting from strong name recognition, celebrity status from 9/11 and doubts about Senator John McCain and his advocacy of the unpopular troop surge in Iraq.

A Newsweek poll at the weekend showed that in a head-to-head contest with Mr McCain, he jumped into a 25-point lead, with 59 per cent to 34 per cent for McCain. That compared with just a 4 per cent edge in a January poll. Mr Giuliani came second this weekend in a straw poll of conservative activists at the Conservative Political Action conference.

On Tuesday Mr Giuliani will add to his resources with a fundraiser in Palo Alto hosted by Floyd Kvamme, a leading technology veteran from Silicon Valley who served on the National Finance Committee for President George W Bush.

Although he is a social conservative, Mr Kvamme is willing to overlook Mr Giuliani's liberal positions. "You can't help but be impressed by his leadership on 9/11. He was the bright shining star that day," he said, adding: "Rudy Giuliani is a strict constructionist and wants judges who don't make laws from the bench. I'm comfortable with that."

Charlie Cook, editor of the Cook Political Report, warned that three-quarters of those surveyed in a recent Gallup poll were unaware of Mr Giuliani's views on abortion and gay marriage.

"His backers are mostly conservatives and evangelicals drawn by his 9/11 strong leadership. That support will melt like an ice cream cone in August once abortion, guns, gay rights, Vietnam draft, marriage to his second cousin, and infidelities come out."

In a hint of those potential problems, Andrew Giuliani, his son from his second marriage, told ABC this weekend that he "got his values from his mother" and had "problems with my father", but added that he would still make "a great President".

Giuliani Sale May Portend A Presidential Campaign (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper And Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani has sold the investment-banking arm of his consulting firm to an Australian banking company, a move that may help clear the decks for his 2008 presidential campaign.

Giuliani Capital Advisors LLC and Macquarie Group, of Sydney, announced the deal yesterday without disclosing terms. The sale is expected to close in June, the companies said.

Giuliani Capital, which does investment-banking work for small companies and restructurings for larger ones, is one of a handful of businesses Mr. Giuliani has run since leaving office in 2002. Although leading the Republican field in many early polls, he hasn't formally entered the race, which appeared to be the catalyst for the sale.

REACTION FROM DEAL JOURNAL

• Dana Cimilluca: Potential Tie to Future President? Priceless1

A person at the New York company said the former mayor indicated some time ago that he wanted to concentrate on the campaign, in which he has set up an exploratory committee and is traveling to key primary states.

Giuliani Capital and Giuliani Safety and Security are units of Giuliani Partners LLC. Mr. Giuliani also is a partner in the Houston-based law firm Bracewell and Giuliani, and he has been a fixture on the lucrative speaking circuit, which his campaign says he would suspend during his presidential run.

Although not a major player in the investment-banking world, Giuliani Capital has maintained a steady list of clients, particularly for its restructuring work. Its clients include Delta Air Lines Inc., which sought bankruptcy protection in 2005. It handled similar work recently for US Airways Group Inc. and Aloha Airgroup Inc., a regional carrier.

Mr. Giuliani bought the firm, formerly Ernst & Young Corporate Finance LLC, from the Big Three accounting firm in December 2004 for $9.8 million. Of the two units of Giuliani Partners, it is thought to have the greater value.

It also may be the most problematic politically for a potential presidential candidate. Analysts say the nature of the firm's client list may make Mr. Giuliani politically vulnerable. It remains to be seen whether a sale of the company will quiet such criticism.

The Democratic Party said in a memorandum sent to some reporters that Giuliani Capital Advisors had displayed "greed" when it sought millions of dollars in fees from troubled airlines.

"Rudy Giuliani is very proud of his business endeavors," said Sunny Mindel, a Giuliani Partners spokeswoman.

Macquarie Group is perhaps best-known in the U.S. for operating public infrastructure such as toll roads and bridges under long-term government leases. Macquarie also has an investment-banking operation in North America that employs about 350. Macquarie said the acquisition of Giuliani Capital would have no effect on the company's balance sheet, and it suggested it planned to absorb all 100 of the smaller company's employees.

The purchase "is a significant strategic step forward for Macquarie and a highly complementary addition to our North American investment-banking business," said Murray Bleach, head of Macquarie's Investment Banking Group in North America and co-CEO of Macquarie Securities (USA) Inc. "GCA provides Macquarie with an opportunity to build upon and expand our existing U.S. capabilities, particularly in corporate-restructuring transactions."

Giuliani's Firm Sells Investment Business (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani's consulting firm sold its multimillion-dollar investment banking component yesterday in a move intended to free him to concentrate on his presidential bid, even as the former New York mayor was confronting some of the campaign season's first scrutiny of his personal life.

Campaigning in California, the Republican asked reporters to keep out of his private life after they quizzed him about the strained relationship between his college-age son, Andrew, and Giuliani's third wife, Judith Nathan.

The sale of the investment banking business offered a rare glimpse into the complex financial enterprise that Giuliani helped create after leaving the mayor's office in 2001.

An Australian-based firm bought Giuliani Capital Advisors LLC for an undisclosed amount. A source close to the Republican candidate who spoke on condition of anonymity said the sale is intended to free Giuliani from distractions as he pursues the White House.

"This enables him to sustain his intense focus on his candidacy," the source said.

Others viewed the sale as Giuliani's first step away from the lucrative private-sector career he built during the years he spent outside the public spotlight. Eric Abrahamson, a Columbia Business School professor, said he thinks Giuliani will have little choice but to start building a higher wall between his campaign and his business activities.

"The organization has dealt with all varieties of clients over time, some of whom would expose his image to certain perception problems," Abrahamson said yesterday. "I would imagine that, fairly soon, he would have to completely distance himself from the business."

Giuliani has held sizable leads in several independent polls and has tried to frame his campaign for the Republican nomination around the image of strength he built after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

His multifaceted consulting firm, Giuliani Partners, primarily advises security companies and promotes their products, many of which have been marketed to federal agencies. That proved problematic for one of Giuliani's early business partners, Bernard B. Kerik, a former New York police commissioner who withdrew as President Bush's nominee for Homeland Security secretary after potential conflicts were exposed.

The 100-member banking outfit that Giuliani sold to the Macquarie Group yesterday specialized in helping companies restructure after bankruptcy. Giuliani Partners bought the boutique investment firm from accounting giant Ernst & Young in 2004 for $9.8 million.

Since then, the company has had tepid earnings, according to Jennifer Payne, an industry analyst with SNL Financial. In 2005, the company's federal filings show it took in $47.8 million in revenue, but its net income showed a loss of $1.4 million, she said. The parties involved declined to provide financial details of the sale.

Giuliani is also a partner in a Texas law firm and has maintained a lucrative public speaking career.

As a candidate, he will be required to reveal only broad information about his business relationships on personal financial statements that he will be asked to provide to federal elections regulators by May 31.

Shortly after he announced the sale of his investment firm, Giuliani faced reporters in Southern California and took responsibility for what he called a strained relationship between his son, Andrew, and Nathan.

"I believe that these problems with blended families, you know, are challenges," he said. "The more privacy I can have for my family, the better we are going to be able to deal with all these difficulties."

Giuliani's bitter and messy divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover, produced headlines for months, as did his courtship of Nathan, his longtime companion. Giuliani's first marriage, to a second cousin, was annulled after a little more than a year.

In the New York Times last weekend, Andrew Giuliani, 21, said that he and his father had resumed speaking after "a decent period of time." He added that "there's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife."

Rudy Giuliani Sells Financial Arm Of Consulting Firm (NSDY)

By Amy Westfeldt

Long Island Newsday, March 6, 2007

NEW YORK -- Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani is selling off the investment banking arm of his consulting firm to an Australian company, his company said Monday.

Giuliani Capital Advisors LLC, a 2{-year-old firm offering advice on business and investment banking, will be acquired by Macquarie Group of Sydney, Australia. Financial terms of the deal weren't disclosed.

Giuliani's business interests have come under closer scrutiny lately as his presidential campaign progresses. The former New York City mayor, who led the city through the aftermath of Sept. 11, has emerged as the front-runner for the 2008 GOP nomination in most national polls.

Doug Muzzio, a politics professor at Baruch College, said Giuliani is trying to head off any future conflicts in the campaign.

"Doing it now signals that they consider what they're doing for the clients will be politically problematic for a run for president, so they're getting rid of it early so that even if a story emerges, they will be politically inoculated from it," said Muzzio. He added that it's hard to know how much Giuliani's personal financial considerations played a part in the sale.

Giuliani Partners spokeswoman Sunny Mindel said the sale had nothing to do with potential client conflicts.

Giuliani has earned millions through his consulting firm, other business interests and his high-priced speaking appearances since leaving office in 2001. He recently said he will stop accepting invitations to give paid speeches.

It is largely through his post-Sept. 11 popularity that he built up Giuliani Partners LLP, which focuses on emergency preparedness, public safety and corporate governance. He is also a partner at Bracewell & Giuliani, a well-established law firm best known for its energy company clients.

Giuliani Capital Advisors, formerly the investment banking arm of accounting firm Ernst & Young LLP, was acquired by Giuliani Partners in 2004. It has over 100 employees in Chicago, New York, Los Angeles, Atlanta and Michigan.

Mindel wouldn't disclose the extent of Giuliani's ownership in the subsidiary.

"Joining the Macquarie team will allow the professionals of GCA to benefit from the vast resources of a leading global investment bank," Giuliani said in a statement.

Murray Bleach, head of Macquarie's investment banking group in North America, said Giuliani's firm will provide the company "with an opportunity to build upon and expand our existing U.S. capabilities, particularly in corporate restructuring transactions."

The Romney Rehab Plan (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, March 6, 2007

Mitt Romney may be low in the polls right now, but he is a man with a plan, a plan to make him the Republican nominee for president.

Though he is at only 4 percent in national polls, The Politico has learned that in the coming weeks and months, he will:

--- Game the system. Romney intends to take advantage of the various and complicated rules governing the primaries.

The prime example is the change in the way California will conduct its Republican primary on Feb. 5.

Unlike Democratic primaries, Republican primaries are winner-take-all. Whoever wins statewide gets all the delegates at stake. This favors front-runners, who, with their early money and early support, can wrap up the nomination quickly.

But, in a barely noticed move, California Republicans have changed the system. Now it is winner-take-all by congressional district.

That means a candidate no longer needs to win the whole state to get delegates. It also means a candidate does not need a $25 million TV budget to do a serious statewide media buy.

Romney not only will target his TV ads to certain congressional districts, but he intends to treat California as if it were a "retail" political state instead of a tarmac state. (Because California is so large geographically, candidates spend most of their time flying from airport to airport, standing on the tarmac, doing a sound bite for local TV and then flying on.)

Romney intends to emphasize more intensive, face-to-face campaigning in select congressional districts in which he has the best chance of winning delegates.

--- Feel the burn. While Romney expects to raise significant amounts of money, his "burn rate," or expenses, will be high. (Howard Dean impressed the media by raising tens of millions of dollars on the Internet in 2003, but his campaign burned through it so fast that he had almost nothing left by the time he faced the New Hampshire primary in early 2004.)

Romney says he'll spend his money wisely -- but spend it. Although it is early, he's already putting TV commercials on the air. He has to raise his poll numbers, which are in the single digits.

True, early polls measure little but name recognition. But contributors read polls, and nobody wants to back a loser. Romney must raise his profile to make his poll numbers bounce and compete seriously for money and support.

For More Info Visit Our Candidates Page

Further, he is not buying the commercials willy-nilly but in states that may be key for him in the early contests: Florida, Iowa, Michigan, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

--- Make clear both explicitly and implicitly the differences between himself, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain, whether on issues or on lifestyle.

Unlike the Democratic top tier, in which the candidates agree on virtually all issues, there are significant differences among the candidates of the Republican top tier.

Romney intends to exploit what he perceives as two of McCain's great vulnerabilities in the Republican primaries: the McCain-Feingold law, which restricts campaign contributions, and the McCain-Kennedy bill, which would change immigration laws and allow for a guest-worker program. And while Romney disagrees explicitly with Giuliani on issues such as abortion, gun control and gay rights, he implicitly draws distinctions between Giuliani's rather turbulent personal life -- he has been married three times -- and Romney's own marriage of nearly 38 years.

"There are issues on a social basis that I think are critical for the future of America," Romney told The Politico. "One of them relates to the family. I really fundamentally believe the strength of America derives from the American family."

"The breakdown of the family," Romney continued, "is an issue that needs to be spoken about."

When I asked Romney if it was legitimate to ask people to vote for him because of his stable family life, his wife, Ann, who was sitting next to him, interjected: "We'll take that! I'll take it!"

Romney also drew implicit differences between himself and McCain, who has been a U.S. senator for more than 20 years.

"I don't think America wants another lifetime politician leading the country," Romney said.

Also, when I asked about whether, in a post-Sept. 11 world, Americans might want a president with national security experience, Romney replied: "Well, just because someone gets elected senator doesn't make them a foreign policy expert."

DOJ_NMG_0140707

--- Make a splash. Romney intends to make a big effort at the splashiest event on the primary calendar: the straw poll in Ames, Iowa, on Aug. 11. The straw poll is the "American Idol" of political events. The hoopla and spectacle, which includes fireworks, bands, barbecue and body-painting, is unlike any event except the nominating conventions themselves.

But unlike the nominating conventions, the winner at Ames is not known in advance.

And the media coverage will be enormous. Failure at Ames can end candidacies, because campaign contributions can dry up for those who do not do well.

In 1999, George W. Bush decisively won the Ames straw poll with about 24,000 votes. In the next 10 weeks, Lamar Alexander, Dan Quayle and Elizabeth Dole dropped out of the race and Pat Buchanan left the Republican Party.

Top-tier Republicans (Democrats ban straw polls) could spend in excess of $2 million each at Ames to bus supporters in and entertain them, while the bottom-tier candidates will depend on speaking skills and message to win support. Romney intends to makes Ames a summer showdown.

--- Encourage the media to look into the background of his opponents. In his interview with The Politico, Romney decried opposition research directed against him.

"There is going to be a lot of opposition research folks on other campaigns trying to put up things that aren't accurate (about me)," Romney said. But his campaign is already predicting reporters will find plenty to write about when it comes to Giuliani's ex-police chief, Bernard Kerik, and Giuliani's complex business associations.

--- Minimize his own negatives. Romney is vulnerable to accusations of being a flip-flopper -- he admits he was not pro-life until just a few years ago, and he joined the National Rifle Association just last August -- but his biggest negative, according to the polls, is his Mormon religion.

Two recent Gallup Polls found that 46 percent of Americans have an unfavorable opinion of Mormonism and 24 percent would not vote for a well-qualified candidate who was a Mormon.

Romney intends to recast the issue by emphasizing that he is a person of faith and that that is more important to voters than what faith he is. Second, his Mormon faith has been fundamental to his commitment to family, which he believes people of all faiths can respect.

--- Mend a fence. Romney formally announced for president last month in Dearborn, Mich., at the Henry Ford Museum. Aside from being an inventor and a highly successful businessman, however, Ford was a notorious anti-Semite.

That is not the message Romney wanted to send, and in the interview, he said, "Catholics, evangelical Christians, Mormons, Jews will find me to be an attractive candidate. I've gotten great support financially from members of the Jewish faith. I am a strong supporter of Israel and feel the need to defend Israel."

--- Be funny, even if he has to borrow the jokes. Romney quoted Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, a Mormon, telling other senators the difficulty he has raising money among members of his own faith.

"You'd have had trouble raising money, too, if all the people you were asking money from were sober," Hatch said.

Health Care Already A Key Issue In 2008 Race (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) says providing health coverage to the 47 million Americans who lack it is so important that he is willing to raise taxes to do it.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) says he is determined to enact universal health care by the end of his first presidential term.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), no novice on the subject, calls universal coverage "not only a moral and health imperative, but an economic and jobs imperative as well."

Although health care is usually a bigger factor in Democratic primaries than in Republican contests, at least two GOP contenders -- former governors Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Tommy G. Thompson of Wisconsin -- are expected to use their extensive track records on the issue as campaign selling points, especially if either emerges as the party's nominee.

All of which illuminates the reality that no White House hopeful can be taken seriously in the rapidly evolving 2008 race without confronting what many Americans have long said is one of their biggest concerns: the availability and affordability of health care.

"Every candidate is going to have to have a health-care plan, because it is the number one domestic policy issue on the minds of voters," said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, an industry group whose "Harry and Louise" television ads in the early 1990s helped torpedo the last big push to overhaul health care.

Although fixing health care is back in vogue, some analysts worry that the prescriptions of the presidential candidates miss the heart of the problem. All the talk about creating universal coverage has obscured the fact that most voters already have insurance, some analysts say, and what they are most concerned about is curbing costs.

"They want some more active government effort to change the way the insurance system works, and to put some more pressure on doctors and pharmaceuticals and hospitals to give a better deal to working people," said Robert Blendon, a professor and public opinion expert at the Harvard School of Public Health. "The cost issue is a very important driving issue, and politicians haven't figured out how to touch that nerve yet."

Taking on costs is more difficult politically because it generally involves challenging powerful interests with a financial stake in the current system, including hospitals, doctors, and drug and insurance companies, said John Rother, policy director for AARP, the seniors lobby.

"The heavy lifting from a candidate's point of view is what they would do to control costs," Rother said. "Getting everybody covered is significant, but it doesn't take you right up against the power of the $2 trillion-a-year medical lobby the way that cost containment does. That's what's missing in the debate."

Since 1999, health insurance premiums have risen faster than wages and inflation. U.S. spending on health care, already the highest per person in the world, is expected by 2016 to nearly double, to $4.1 trillion. One in six Americans has no health insurance, and a shrinking share of those who do can get coverage through their jobs, census figures show.

The burden of rising costs on employers has led to calls for major change, even from some business groups that opposed earlier efforts to revamp the system. Pressure is also bubbling up from states, most notably California, Massachusetts and a few others that have begun, or are considering, statewide experiments to make health insurance affordable for everyone, through state subsidies and new fees on businesses if necessary.

"We're at the beginning of the next great debate about health reform," said Drew Altman, president of the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonpartisan source of health-care information. "This is an issue which was very much on the minds of the American people as an economic worry for quite some time, but was just nowhere as a national political priority even six months ago. Now it's front and center again, and the words 'universal coverage' are back at the center of the debate."

Indeed, analysts say national politicians are approaching the subject with a zeal not seen since the Clinton administration's health plan collapsed in 1994, amid concerns that it would give big government too much control over the health-care system.

Edwards has so far staked out the most detailed position. His plan would require employers to provide health coverage for workers or pay a portion of their payroll into a fund that would help individuals buy private insurance through new regional health-care purchasing pools. He would also expand Medicaid and the state-federal Children's Health Insurance Program, and would provide tax credits to help make insurance more affordable for lower-income families.

Most of the $90 billion to $120 billion annual cost could be paid for by eliminating President Bush's tax cuts for households earning more than $200,000 and by increasing Internal Revenue Service efforts to collect unpaid capital gains taxes, Edwards has said.

"I want to start putting universal health care in place as soon as I am sworn into office in January of 2009, which is what America needs," he said at a Feb. 22 candidate forum in Carson City, Nev. "We can't wait."

His campaign sent a mailing yesterday touting the plan to more than 70,000 Iowa households, the first such large-scale voter contact effort by a Democratic presidential candidate.

The 12-page booklet notes that 265,000 Iowans have no health coverage and argues that only Edwards has a plan "that will cover all of them and lower healthcare costs for everyone." It does not mention the program's cost.

Obama has not released a detailed plan, but in announcing his candidacy last month he said he would deliver universal health care by 2012. "Let's be the generation that finally tackles our health-care crisis," he said. "We can control costs by focusing on prevention, by providing better treatment to the chronically ill, and using technology to cut the bureaucracy."

Clinton said last month that she wants universal health-care coverage by the end of her second term, but she has not offered a plan to achieve it. She has said that she "learned from experience" that no comprehensive proposal will work unless employers, government and labor organizations support it, and that simply throwing money at the problem will not solve it.

"I am looking for answers that will not have us spend more money," Clinton said while campaigning in New Hampshire last month. "I am convinced we can do that."

Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio) has proposed expanding Medicare to cover everyone, a plan he says would eliminate any role for for-profit insurance companies. Their certain opposition would be a major political obstacle.

Polls by Gallup and other organizations routinely show that Democrats are more likely than Republicans to rate health care as an extremely important issue for Congress and the president. Still, some Republican presidential hopefuls have considerable bona fides on the issue. In 2006, Romney signed legislation requiring that all Massachusetts residents have health insurance by July of this year. Thompson served as President Bush's health and human services secretary at a time when the administration successfully sought to create a drug benefit under Medicare.

Whoever wins the presidency will have trouble converting voters' desire for change into politically viable legislation, analysts say. There is broad agreement on health-care problems, but a consensus on how to fix them remains elusive -- a reality Bush encountered when his recent proposal to overhaul the tax treatment of health insurance fell flat in the Democratic Congress.

"One thing that history really shows us is that the enthusiasm at the beginning of these debates often wanes when you get to the details at the end," said Altman, the Kaiser president.

GOP Protectionists (WSJ)

By Jack Kemp

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

As the GOP stumbles around Washington trying to be the party of Herbert Hoover, it's sad to see so many Republicans drifting so far and so fast from the Reagan model that helped pave the way for the great, non-inflationary economic and jobs expansion of the past 25 years.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, (R., S.C.) threatens China with a 28% tariff for daring to tie the yuan to the dollar. Rep. Tom Tancredo, running for president, is miffed at President Bush for trying to design comprehensive immigration-reform legislation. The president wants a guest-worker program that could help alleviate border problems in the Southwest.

But Mr. Tancredo is a sissy compared to my old pal Duncan Hunter, the congressman from San Diego. He's also running in the GOP primaries as an unambiguous Hoover-like protectionist and anti-globalization candidate. Then there's my other old friend Pat Buchanan, railing against Japan and Toyota for having the chutzpah to sell so many cars in the U.S., even going so far as to build manufacturing plants right here under our noses.

Mr. Buchanan resigned from the GOP a few years ago because Republicans weren't tough enough on trade, tariffs and immigration for his so-called "economic nationalism" model. His answer to the competition faced by U.S. automakers from abroad is to bash Japan, and to accuse those of us who believe in classical free-trade policies of being "fanatics" who cause U.S. manufacturing to move offshore. Adam Smith and David Ricardo are spinning in their graves!

In the interest of full disclosure, I'm on the advisory board of Toyota North America and now drive a hybrid Lexus. But I also believe that the real answer for U.S. auto companies is a decrease in tax rates, lower costs of labor and greater flexibility in future union contracts. The attack on a trading partner like Japan is misguided when the real enemy of American jobs and auto production comes from Washington and Detroit. Having driven American automobiles for 50 of my 71 years, my long-term, (and short-term) solution to the profound challenges faced by U.S. manufacturers is to reform the complex, confusing and confiscatory U.S. tax code, and to ease the onerous regulatory burden that undermines our ability to compete in the global economy.

The suggestion that Japan manipulates its currency for trade advantages -- even though the yen has appreciated against the dollar by 75% since 1985 -- is misleading. The same attack could have been made against the U.S. when the Fed lowered the federal-funds rate to 1% in 2003 in order to boost the economy. Every central bank manipulates its currency to some degree in that they control the printing of the supply of money that determines the value of their currency.

Protectionists claim that the trade deficit threatens the dollar and causes it to fall, further de-industrializing America and diminishing our freedoms. In reality, the trade deficit is just the other side of what President Reagan correctly called the capital account surplus, which reflects foreign investment leading to increased production, output and job creation in the U.S.

As a case in point, since coming to America 50 years ago Toyota has invested more than $14 billion in our domestic economy and set up 10 manufacturing plants. It has "insourced" more than 380,000 jobs since 1981, and just announced an 11th plant, with more U.S. jobs. Toyota pays close to $15 billion in wages to American workers.

Overall, since the 2001 recession, according to David Malpass of Bear Stearns, the U.S. economy has created 9.3 million jobs; Japan only 350,000. As for the legacy health costs and pension costs for U.S. auto workers, protectionists would better spend their time lobbying for Detroit to move to health-savings accounts and defined pension-contribution plans. Defined-benefits pension plans are far too costly for auto makers, as economist Arthur Laffer has written and lectured about for years.

Protectionist views on trade resemble Al Gore on global warming: Pessimism permeates their arguments and they misuse statistics to drive their propaganda on these very important issues. Mr. Buchanan, for example, argues that the U.S is witnessing the passing of our nation as the greatest industrial power the world has ever seen. Nonsense: Half the wealth our nation has ever produced was generated in the last 25 years or so.

With the recent passing of Milton Friedman and Ronald Reagan, we've lost two great champions of the free-enterprise and free-trade policies that helped lay the groundwork for the last two decades of low unemployment and low inflation, fostering the growing class of working families who own stocks, bonds and property.

The answers to our challenges in today's global marketplace can be found in sound money, lower tax rates on capital and labor, an easing of regulatory burdens, and the welcoming of foreign investment and trade with nations like Japan. Isolationism and protectionism are not worthy of 21st century America.

Mr. Kemp is founder and chairman of Kemp Partners and former Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

Jenna Bush Embarks On Book 'Journey' (USAT)

By Bob Minzesheimer

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Jenna Bush, in a rare interview, says her forthcoming book for teens — about a 17-year-old single mother in Panama who is living with HIV — will end with a "call to action."

HarperCollins announces today that it's publishing Bush's Ana's Story: A Journey of Hope this fall. It will be illustrated with photographs by Mia Baxter, a former classmate of Bush's at the University of Texas.

The president's daughter, 25, says the book is not political. It's aimed at "getting kids thinking and involved," Bush said Monday by phone from Panama, where she has worked since September as an unpaid intern for UNICEF.

Bush, a former public school teacher in Washington, D.C., says: "I'm aware that not all kids can pick up and fly to Panama. I'm very lucky."

But, Bush says, "there's so much they can do" to deal with issues of "exclusion" — from research on HIV discrimination to "inviting new kids to sit with them in the cafeteria."

The book grew out of her UNICEF job to "put a face on statistics" and document the lives of children in Central and South America who live in extreme poverty.

Jenna and her sister, Barbara (who works at a New York museum), have tried to avoid publicity and have been protected by the White House. But, she says, "I'm willing to give up some of my anonymity" to promote the book and "start a dialogue with kids."

A book tour is planned in schools, libraries and bookstores. "This is not about me," she adds, "but the kids I met here."

The Bush twins have been fodder for tabloids and gossip columnists for their partying and underage drinking. Jenna Bush, who campaigned for her father in 2004, says she doesn't worry about her media image: "I care what people who know me think of me. I think they would disagree (with her image). I like to go to bed early."

Kate Jackson, editor of HarperCollins Children's Books, says she was impressed by Bush's "intellect, drive and passion." A first printing of about 500,000 copies is expected.

Bush says she will donate her earnings to UNICEF. She says she "very, very modestly" hopes her book will have some of the influence of two books about girls caught up in the Holocaust: Lois Lowry's novel Number the Stars and Anne Frank's The Diary of Anne Frank.

Bush Reaches Out To Latin America (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Monday that the United States will help the working poor of Latin America as part of a plan meant to show the region it has not been forgotten by the United States.

Preparing for a seven-day, five-nation swing, Bush outlined past efforts to help the region while offering new plans for health care, education and business development.

"The working poor of Latin America need change," Bush told members of the United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce.

During a Monday briefing, national security adviser Stephen Hadley said the trip will emphasize the continuing U.S. efforts to bolster Latin American democracies and economies.

Those efforts, Hadley said, have not received the attention they deserve. "That's one of the reasons we're doing this trip."

Bush leaves Thursday for São Paulo, Brazil, the first stop on a trip that includes Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

Latin Americans believe that the Bush administration has ignored the region since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, said pollster John Zogby, who recently conducted a survey in seven Latin American nations.

"There is a sense that the United States is so focused on other parts of the world that Latin America is just not on the radar screen," he said.

Zogby, whose respondents included government and business leaders, said most also believe the United States benefits more from one of its key Latin American policies — free trade.

In his speech, Bush said expanded trade, democracy and educational exchanges have improved conditions in Latin America.

"Despite the advances," he added, "tens of millions in our hemisphere remain stuck in poverty and shut off from the promises of the new century." Almost 25% of Latin Americans live on less than $2 a day, he said.

Bush said he was sending a Navy medical ship to 12 Latin American and Caribbean nations to treat an estimated 85,000 patients and perform up to 1,500 surgeries.

He also touted a $75 million program to allow Latin American youths to study English in the USA and a $100 million effort to provide mortgages to working families.

The proposals seem aimed at countering the appeal of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, said Peter Hakim, president of the Inter-American Dialogue. Chávez has blamed U.S.-style economic policies for the persistence of poverty.

Hakim said Central and South Americans will be skeptical until they see results and that the United States "is there for the longer term."

Hadley said the trip wasn't an anti-Chávez trip. Instead, the region has long been one of the president's top priorities.

Much of Bush's work in Latin America, he said, was overshadowed by the continuing war on terror.

Bush Outlines Agenda For Latin America Trip (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140712

WASHINGTON -- Ahead of a six-day swing through Latin America, President Bush unveiled plans to send a Navy vessel to dispense medical care throughout Latin America, spend $75 million over three years on English-language training for the poor and develop a new small-business loan initiative.

Mr. Bush's trip to Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala, and Mexico is officially designed to tout the benefits of democracy and open markets in fighting poverty and improving health care and education. But the tour is also designed to let the White House provide a counterweight to Venezuela's popular Bush-bashing President Hugo Chavez.

During a speech to the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce Monday, Mr. Bush never mentioned Mr. Chavez Monday's speech, but the Venezuelan leader is expected to cast a shadow over the president's trip. Mr. Chavez has been discussing confrontation with Mr. Bush and is expected to appear at a public demonstration in Buenos Aires while Mr. Bush is in Uruguay. Mr. Bush is viewed with skepticism in many Latin American countries, particularly those with close ties to Mr. Chavez.

Mr. Bush also didn't touch on energy issues, expected to be high on the agenda during his meeting with Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said earlier Monday that Messrs. Bush and Lula will agree to cooperate on the development of ethanol, encourage greater cooperation on local biofuels production in Central America and the Caribbean, and participate in the International Biofuels Forum, an attempt to standardize the industry.

During his speech, the president said an important priority for the U.S. is "helping our neighbors to the south of us build a better and productive life." The region "has made great strides toward freedom and prosperity," he said. "Despite the advances, tens of millions in our hemisphere remain stuck in poverty."

To help alleviate the situation, Mr. Bush said he's sending the USNS Comfort to make medical stops in 12 countries, including Panama, Nicaragua, Colombia and Haiti. The mission is expected to provide care to 85,000 patients and result in 1,500 surgeries. Another initiative will provide training for nurses, technicians and health-care workers in Panama.

"It is in our national interest ... to help the people and democracies in our neighborhood succeed," Mr. Bush said. "When our neighbors are prosperous and peaceful, it means better opportunities and more security for our people. When there are jobs in our neighborhood, people are able to find work at home and not have to migrate to our country."

Since taking office, Mr. Bush has doubled U.S. foreign assistance to Latin America to about $1.6 billion a year. The money includes development assistance, military assistance and counter-narcotic assistance. Colombia is the largest recipient of U.S. aide outside the Middle East and Afghanistan, with most of the money earmarked for anti-drug efforts.

Bush OKs Aid Programs For Latin America (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, March 6, 2007

President Bush, facing criticism he has ignored Latin America, said Monday the region's grinding poverty is a scandal that has caused some to question the value of democracy. He said the United States will spend tens of millions of dollars to improve education, housing and health care across the region.

"The United States of America is committed to helping people rise out of poverty," the president said.

Many children in Latin America do not finish grade school and many mothers never see a doctor, Bush said in a speech at the Ronald Reagan Building to about 400 invited guests, most of them members of the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce.

"In an age of growing prosperity and abundance, this is a scandal and it is a challenge," Bush said.

The speech came three days before the president leaves on a weeklong trip to Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said Bush's efforts in Latin America have been overshadowed by the global war on terror, the fight against illegal drug trafficking and trade issues.

"It's something we have not done well enough, getting out the full scope of the president's message," Hadley said at a briefing before the president's address.

Since taking office, Bush has doubled U.S. foreign assistance to Latin America to about $1.6 billion a year. The money includes development assistance, military assistance and counter-narcotic assistance. Colombia is the largest recipient of U.S. aide outside the Middle East and Afghanistan, with most of the money earmarked for anti-drug efforts.

Bush announced a series of steps to help the region:

_A Navy medical ship, the Comfort, will make port calls in Belize, Guatemala, Panama, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Peru, Ecuador, Colombia, Haiti, Trinidad and Tobago, Guyana and Suriname. Its staff will treat 85,000 patients and conduct up to 1,500 surgeries. Other military medical teams will provide medical care through 62 medical readiness training exercises in 14 countries.

_A health care professional training center will be established in Panama to serve all of Central America, training students to be nurses, technicians and health care workers.

_The United States will commit $75 million over three years to help thousands of young people improve their English and study in the United States. Over the past three years, the United States has provided $150 million on education programs throughout the region.

_A program to make housing more affordable will be expanded with an additional $385 million. The United States already has provided more than $100 million through the Overseas Private Investment Corp. to help underwrite mortgages to working families in Mexico, Brazil, Chile and the countries of Central America.

Later this year, the administration will convene a White House conference on the Western Hemisphere, bringing together representatives from the private sector, non-governmental organizations, faith-based groups and volunteer associations, to explore more effective ways to deliver aid.

Peter DeShazo, who oversaw Western Hemisphere affairs for the State Department until last year, said Bush's trip is intended to offset "the widespread perception that the U.S. has shown little attention" to the region.

DeShazo, speaking at a briefing of the Center for International and Strategic Studies, said Bush's visit "underscores that the administration is willing to work with democratic governments" whether they are on the left, like Brazil's Lula da Silva or on the right, like Mexico's Felipe Calderon.

DeShazo currently is CSIS' Americas program director.

Bush To Set Out Shift In Agenda On Latin Trip (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

SÃO PAULO, Brazil, March 5 — President Bush arrives here on Thursday with an energy partnership plan to create jobs and decrease poverty and inequality, a marked shift in Washington's priorities for Latin America aimed at countering the challenge posed by President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela.

Since 1990, when Mr. Bush's father was in the White House, United States policy toward the region has focused on free-trade agreements and related economic measures, with a secondary emphasis on drug interdiction.

But the growing leftward and anti-American trend in regional politics, led by Mr. Chávez — who plans a countertour to coincide with Mr. Bush's trip — has led to a modified agenda and a renewed effort to rebut complaints by Latin Americans that the president has ignored their concerns in favor of the campaign against terrorism.

"When something isn't working after 15 years, that's a sign there are insurmountable obstacles and it's time to change direction," said Rubens Ricupero, a Brazilian diplomat and former secretary general of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in an interview here. "This is a very intelligent initiative on the part of the U.S., because there's no point in tying the whole relationship to something that has only produced frustration and stagnation."

The Bush administration has also signaled a new willingness to consider including workers' rights guarantees in trade accords. [Page C1.]

Mr. Bush's trip will be his longest to the region. But his promises of American support and assistance are likely to fall short of what Mr. Chávez, with his oil wealth, has been delivering recently.

On Monday, in a speech in Washington to the United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Bush said ties between the United States and Latin America had helped advance peace and prosperity in the Western Hemisphere. But he also appeared to acknowledge the need to reach out more to America's southern neighbors. "The fact is that tens of millions of our brothers and sisters to the south have seen little improvement in their daily lives," Mr. Bush said, "and this has led some to question the value of democracy."

Mr. Bush's first stop will be here in Brazil's industrial capital. He and the president of Brazil, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, are expected to sign a memorandum of understanding for a recently negotiated program that calls for the countries to promote the production and use of ethanol, a renewable fuel that Brazil manufactures from sugar cane. Mr. da Silva, a former labor leader who controls the leftist Workers Party, is also scheduled to visit Mr. Bush at Camp David at the end of the month.

But the convergence of strategic interests of the Western Hemisphere's two most populous countries clearly goes beyond energy. Brazil fancies itself, not Venezuela, as South America's natural leader. It has also recently shown signs of alarm at Mr. Chávez's substantial arms purchases and irritation with his involvement in neighboring Bolivia, including providing military assistance and support for the nationalization of Brazilian-held energy assets there.

"I don't think Brazil will accept the idea of being any type of American surrogate in the region, or to moderate or contain Chávez," said Felipe Lampreia, Brazil's foreign minister from 1995 to 2001. "But the United States wants to bolster Lula as a counterweight, to show that you can have a leftist government with a strong focus on social issues, income distribution and poverty reduction, without being radical."

Mr. Bush will be sending much the same message at his second stop, Uruguay, which signed a trade and investment framework agreement with the United States in January. There, he and President Tabaré Vázquez, a physician who leads a leftist coalition called the Broad Front, plan to meet at the presidential ranch to commemorate Uruguay's emergence, with American help, from a fiscal crisis in 2002 and to discuss how to expand commercial ties.

Dr. Vázquez's government includes former Tupamaro guerrillas; the guerrilla group kidnapped and killed an American official in Montevideo in 1970. But Dr. Vázquez, like Mr. da Silva, has migrated toward the center and largely abandoned the kind of fiery rhetoric that is Mr. Chávez's specialty.

"One must be pragmatic," Dr. Vázquez said in an interview last year. "Uruguayans want jobs that provide dignity, an adequate salary, and security. To have that, you must have economic growth, which is achieved only through production and investment."

Mr. Bush's itinerary also includes stops in Colombia and Guatemala, two countries where political scandals have recently erupted, weakening the pro-American governments there. He will end his trip next week in Mexico, where the agenda is sure to include immigration, a constant source of tension in relations between the two neighbors.

As a candidate in 2000, Mr. Bush vowed that "should I become president, I will look south, not as an afterthought but as a fundamental commitment." But after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the United States quickly relegated Latin America to the ancillary role it played during most of the cold war, creating openings that Mr. Chávez, China and even, more recently, Iran have moved to exploit.

Now, however, "there is a sense that things are not going well for the U.S. in the region," said Peter Hakim, president of Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington-based policy research and advocacy group. "There has probably never been so much anti-Americanism and so little confidence in U.S. leadership since the cold war."

That trend has been aggravated, he said, by the emergence of "such a vehement and reasonably effective adversary" in the form of Mr. Chávez.

An overwhelming majority of government officials and academic analysts in Latin America take it as a given that the United States has been jolted into action by the inroads Mr. Chávez has made. But American officials dispute that notion.

"We are aware of the shortcomings of the Venezuelan government and the kind of unhelpful role it has played in certain countries in the region," Deputy Secretary of State John D. Negroponte said in a recent interview. "I think the president's intent is to accent the positive, and talk about the positive, things we want to get done in the relationships with the countries that he is visiting rather than to call undue attention to this issue, which is Venezuela."

And when asked at a press briefing Monday if Mr. Bush's trip was "an anti-Chávez tour," Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said, "It's really not."

But Mr. Chávez is acting as if the trip, which he mocks as doomed to failure, is aimed solely at combating his influence, and has responded with a maneuver of his own. While Mr. Bush is in Uruguay on Friday and Saturday, Mr. Chávez plans to be leading anti-Bush demonstrations just across the River Plate in Buenos Aires, Argentina, where he has cultivated an increasingly friendly relationship with that country's Peronist president, Néstor Kirchner.

There, as elsewhere in the hemisphere, Mr. Chávez has used Venezuela's oil riches to win friends and influence. He has bought more than $1.5 billion in Argentine bonds, flown poor slum residents to receive medical care abroad and proposed a new regional development bank to make low-interest loans.

In contrast, American assistance for the region has lagged far behind. Mr. Hadley said that the United States has nearly doubled aid to the region since President Bush took office to $1.6 billion annually, although he acknowledged that figure was slated to drop next fiscal year. But recent research by the Washington Office on Latin America, a group that is often critical of American policy in the region, found that the largest portion of money has gone to Colombia for military and counterdrug assistance, that Congress has consistently trimmed aid requests, and that not all funds authorized have been disbursed.

On Monday, Mr. Bush announced several relatively small new initiatives that he would ask Congress to finance. They included $75 million for a new education program promoting study in the United States, $385 million for programs promoting home ownership for low income families, and the development of a health care training facility in Panama to serve all of Central America.

"In the short term, Chávez has more to offer because our aid is peanuts," said Riordan Roett, director of the Latin American studies program at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies in Washington. "We're talking hundreds of thousands of dollars, and he's tossing around a billion here and a billion there."

Mr. Bush's shift away from an almost exclusive focus on free trade, with its calls for austerity and sacrifice in return for access to the American market, also reflects domestic political realities. His trade promotion authority expires in July, and there are doubts about Congress's willingness to approve free trade agreements that have been signed with Colombia, Peru and Panama.

"It would not be realistic to expect much" from Mr. Bush's visit, said Mr. Lampreia, the former Brazilian foreign minister. "But there is a fresh look at Latin America, very much derived from the fact Chávez is there, and a new approach that is positive, which is a good thing."

Bush Prepares For Trip To Latin America (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

He talked of grinding poverty and called it "a scandal" that democracy and capitalism have not delivered more to Latin Americans. The working poor need change, he declared. He invoked Simon Bolivar, the "great liberator," and vowed to "complete the revolution" and bring true "social justice" to the region

Hugo Chavez? No, George W. Bush.

As he prepares to embark on a six-day trip to Latin America this week, the president is launching a new campaign to compete with Chavez for the region's hearts and minds, employing language mirroring the Venezuelan leader's leftist populism but rooted in traditional American conservatism. After six years of focusing elsewhere in the world, Bush in his final two years wants to convince the nation's neighbors that, as he put it yesterday, "we care."

But he faces an enormous gulf between ambition and reality, analysts say. While Bush cited John F. Kennedy's effort to help lift up the region through the Alliance for Progress, the president has limited tools at this point. He offered some modest initiatives on education, housing and health care yesterday; but the new Democratic Congress has shown no eagerness to ratify three new free-trade pacts he has brokered with the region. And many in Latin America have already rendered their judgments about Bush and are awaiting his successor.

"It's a visit after six-plus years of neglect," Sidney Weintraub, a longtime U.S. diplomat and specialist in the region, said at a forum sponsored by the Inter-American Dialogue center yesterday. "There's little that the Latin Americans expect from him anymore."

Bush wants to counter that perception with a message of empathy for Latin Americans who have not seen much benefit from free markets and elections -- the core constituency that has fueled the rise of Chavez and other leftists in the region, such as Evo Morales in Bolivia and Daniel Ortega in Nicaragua. One in four Latin Americans lives on $2 a day or less.

"In an age of growing prosperity and abundance, this is a scandal -- and it's a challenge," Bush said yesterday in a speech previewing his trip to the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. "The fact is that tens of millions of our brothers and sisters to the south have seen little improvement in their daily lives. And this has led some to question the value of democracy."

Bush never used Cha¡vez's name but cited his hero, Bolivar, and implicitly seemed to offer an alternative in an address spiced with Spanish phrases. "The millions across our hemisphere who every day suffer the degradations of poverty and hunger have a right to be impatient," he said. "And I'm going to make them this pledge: The goal of this great country, the goal of a country full of generous people, is an Americas where the dignity of every person is respected, where all find room at the table and where opportunity reaches into every village and every home."

Bush announced an additional $75 million over three years to teach more Latin Americans to speak English and help them study in the United States, and an additional $385 million to help underwrite mortgages for working families in Mexico, Brazil, Chile and Central America. He also said he will order the USNS Comfort, a U.S. Navy hospital ship, to make port calls in 12 Caribbean and Latin American countries to treat 85,000 patients and perform 1,500 operations.

"The president wants to show a rededication to Latin America," said Peter DeShazo, who was deputy assistant secretary of state for the Western Hemisphere in Bush's first term and is now a scholar at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "This comes at a time when there's a widespread sense that the administration hasn't paid a lot of attention to Latin America, which is understandable because of Iraq. . . . This is a signal. They're trying to show they're committed to the region."

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley disputed the premise that the administration has neglected Latin America, but he agreed that the government's efforts have been overshadowed by the Middle East and other issues. "It's not gotten the attention it deserves," he said. "That's one of the reasons we're doing this trip."

Hadley and other White House officials said it is not an anti-Chavez tour, but the Venezuelan leader may yet haunt the president along the way. Chavez, who called Bush "the devil" during a U.N. speech last year, has suggested that he would send sulfur to Brazil and plans to lead a protest in Argentina when the president arrives in neighboring Uruguay.

Bush will leave for Brazil on Thursday and will then travel to Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico before returning March 14. In Sao Paulo, he will seal a deal with Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva to help Central American and Caribbean nations develop ethanol, an alternative to oil that has become a big focus of Bush's energy plan. Although Bush has been to Colombia before, he will be the first U.S. president since Ronald Reagan in 1982 to visit Bogota, a decision intended to showcase improvements in security in a country torn by civil war and cocaine trafficking -- although he will not spend the night.

When he visits Mexico, he will bypass Mexico City, where his presence would surely generate large protests, and instead meet with President Felipe Calderon in the Yucatan city of Merida. It will be the first meeting between the two since Calderon was inaugurated, and the session is bound to be marked by tension over the U.S. political debate on immigration. Bush has pushed for easing rules for illegal immigrants but has also signed legislation calling for more barriers along the border.

The itinerary will put Bush in the same room with both leftist and rightist leaders, a schedule intended to show that he can work with any "right-thinking governments," as Hadley put it, that support democracy and reasonable economic policies. To further make that point, Bush plans to host Lula at Camp David at the end of the month, making him the first Latin American leader at the presidential retreat in 16 years.

In some ways, the trip will bring Bush full circle from his days as a candidate in 2000, when he cited his experience as governor of Texas and vowed a robust engagement with the region. "Latin America was going to be more than just an afterthought -- remember those days?" said Michael Shifter, a vice president of Inter-American Dialogue. "I think he's going to try to repair some of the damage. . . . There has been a lot of damage in terms of distrust with the region over the last couple years, and I think he wants to keep that in check."

Bush To Visit Latin America, Chavez's Backyard (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Chris Kraul

DOJ_NMG_0140717

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush, eager to counter the growing influence of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, declared Monday that he was heading to Latin America this week as a social reformer committed to alleviating poverty and social injustice.

The emphasis on addressing inequality marks a shift for the president, who has been assailed for stressing free trade and democracy south of the border and ignoring the social ills that continue to stymie the region.

"For too long and in too many places, opportunity in Latin America has been determined by the accident of birth rather than by the application of talents and initiative," Bush said in a speech to the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce.

Bush is set to leave Thursday on a weeklong hemispheric trek that is to include stops in Brazil, Colombia, Uruguay, Guatemala and Mexico.

Bush's itinerary doesn't include Venezuela, but the pugnacious Chavez, who has used his oil riches to take up the mantle of Fidel Castro and generations of Yanqui-bashers, looms large in a region Washington has historically considered its "backyard."

With no major trade deal or political breakthrough imminent, Bush in effect has signaled his intention to present a counter-version of Chavez's well-crafted image of a social crusader standing up to U.S. "imperialism" at every opportunity.

However, Bush, whose poll numbers are at least as bad in Latin America as at home, is likely to meet skepticism and protests as he tries to portray a kinder, gentler face of U.S. policy.

"Evidently the principal reason for Bush's trip to the region is to try and put back together the United States' network of alliances in Latin America, where Chavez's influence is stronger each day," said Atilio Boron, an Argentine political analyst.

A top Bush administration official rejected the widely held notion in Latin America that the president's longest trip to the region is aimed at checking the influence of Chavez.

"We want to remind people that there is another side to U.S. policy," said the senior U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

While the Bush administration has been tied down in the Middle East, Chavez has helped redraw Latin America's political map, in large part by doling out billions of dollars' worth of oil subsidies for allied nations and re-energizing socialist strategies consigned to the scrap heap a decade ago. Critics call his influence overblown, but Chavez has befriended a new generation of populist and leftist leaders and inspired political allies from Panama City to Santiago, Chile.

Chavez has also reached out to U.S. archenemy Iran, embarked on a buying spree of Russian arms and cemented an oil deal with China, at a time when Chinese trade in the region is surging and Asia is seen as an alternative to U.S. markets.

Chavez's voluble followers have vowed to take to the streets during Bush's trip, just as tens of thousands applauded Chavez's tirades against "Mr. Danger" during the U.S. president's 2005 trip, in which a disappointed Bush failed to persuade South America's major economic powers to join a hemispheric trade zone.

Unlike most of the president's previous trips to the region, this one is not built around a large multinational conference. Instead, Bush will meet one-on-one with the leader of each nation and take time to visit cultural sites and engage long-marginalized minority and indigenous populations.

Bush's first stop, Brazil, holds significance on several fronts, beyond that nation's position as Latin America's largest and most populous nation, and the world's ninth-largest economy.

Washington and Brasilia are launching a biofuels partnership that could lessen the sway of Venezuela and its vast oil and gas reserves and heighten the regional standing of President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva. Despite his left-wing roots as a labor leader, the Brazilian leader has embraced free-market policies and is viewed in the White House as a Bush ally who is a moderate alternative to Chavez.

The prospective U.S.-Brazilian biofuels pact, with possible accords on future markets and technology sharing, constitutes the White House's first major foray into the raging Latin American energy debate. It also signals a shift, or at least a detour, from Washington's dominant post-Cold War concerns: drug interdiction, free trade and immigration.

But despite the buzz about an "ethanol OPEC" composed of the two countries that produce about 70% of the world's ethanol, the administration faces a daunting task in countering Chavez's standing as a major supplier of crude oil in a world that still runs on petroleum.

Even temperate leftist regimes, such as those in Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Chile, have maintained cordial relations with Chavez while pursuing a more measured path.

Paying lip service to Chavez's anti-globalization rhetoric also provides regional leaders with "ideological cover" to appease their own leftist blocs, said Bruce Bagley, a political scientist at the University of Miami. Thus, Argentine President Nestor Kirchner's broadsides against the "dictatorship" of the International Monetary Fund draw no public rebuke from Washington.

State Department officials have boasted of a Kennedy-esque "Pan-Americanism" for the 21st century, and Bush on Monday outlined a program offering tens of millions of dollars in scholarship aid and mortgage assistance, and a regional health initiative.

But that promise is no match for Chavez's tangible largesse, be it cheap oil for Cubans, doctors and teachers for Bolivians or a $3-billion bond purchase to help prop up Argentina. Chavez also has promised subsidies to newly elected leftist governments in Ecuador and Nicaragua.

In return, he has gained some measure of the international legitimacy he craves.

He has embraced Iran and championed a political and economic bloc aligned against U.S. supremacy, and even his failed effort last year to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council provided him with a bully pulpit. In the meantime, the State Department denounced Venezuela last week as soft on drug trafficking.

The Chavez-sponsored trip of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to Latin America in January stunned many U.S. officials, whose view of Chavez's global evangelization quickly shifted from disparaging bemusement to alarm about a potential security threat.

"That caught our attention," said U.S. Rep. Eliot L. Engel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Western Hemisphere subcommittee.

(INFOBOX BELOW)

The diplomacy of largesse

Venezuela's Hugo Chavez has helped redraw Latin America's political map, in large part by doling out billions of dollars in oil subsidies for allied nations and re-energizing socialist strategies.

Refineries

Chavez has promised to build or finance refineries in more than half a dozen countries, including Panama, India, Brazil and Jamaica. None is under construction.

Gas pipeline of the south

Chavez has promised to invest in a $25-billion, 6,000-mile pipeline to send Venezuelan natural gas to Argentina. Venezuela does not have the proven gas reserves to keep the pipeline full.

Cut-rate petroleum

Chavez is sending or has promised to send discounted oil or refined products to Ecuador, as well as Cuba and more than a dozen other Caribbean nations. He also is sending subsidized fuel oil to the poor in New York and Massachusetts.

Bonds

Chavez has purchased more than $3 billion in Argentine bonds.

Medical care

Chavez is underwriting the cost of sending Cuban doctors to Venezuela and Bolivia, and is paying for eye operations in Cuba for hundreds of poor patients from countries including Panama and Bolivia.

Bush Says Aid Boost To Go With Latin America Trip (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0140719

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

President Bush yesterday announced that his five-country trip to Latin America will be accompanied by an increase in U.S. aid to the region, to promote "social justice," democracy and increased economic opportunity.

"Tens of millions of our brothers and sisters to the South have seen little improvement in their daily lives. This has led some to question the value of democracy," Mr. Bush said. "It is in our national interests ... to help the people in democracies in our neighborhood succeed."

Mr. Bush, during a speech to the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce at the Ronald Reagan Building, said that ongoing poverty in Latin America, despite overall economic growth, is "a scandal" brought about by corrupt leadership.

"In too many places ... a government official is seen as somebody who serves himself, or serves only the rich and the well-connected," Mr. Bush said. "We're working with our partners to change old patterns and ensure that government serves all its citizens."

Mr. Bush, who leaves for Brazil Thursday and returns March 14, announced he is sending a U.S. Navy hospital ship -- the USNS Comfort -- to 13 South and Central American countries, to treat an expected 85,000 patients and perform an estimated 1,500 surgeries. Mr. Bush also will visit Colombia, Guatemala, Mexico and Uruguay.

In addition, the United States will spend $75 million over three years to teach English to young Latin Americans, and bring students to the United States on scholarships. The United States will also spend $385 million to increase homeownership and is working with Latin American banks to increase loans to small businesses.

Bush administration officials denied that the president's weeklong trip has been prompted by concerns about anti-American leaders such as Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, or by resentment that the United States has not paid enough attention to the region.

"[The president] has been involved and committed to Latin America throughout his presidency," said National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley, who said Mr. Bush's focus on the region "has not gotten the attention it deserves."

But regional analysts said both Mr. Chavez and weak U.S. relations with the region are driving the president's trip.

Eric Farnsworth, vice president of the Council of Americas, an advocacy group for businesses with interests in Latin America, said "the specter of Chavez [is] overhanging the region right now," and that "the standing of the United States in the region has decreased."

Mr. Farnsworth, however, applauded Mr. Bush's speech, which he said pushes back against Mr. Chavez's populism in the right way.

"You can't have a year of engagement every six or seven years and think it's going to answer the mail," Mr. Restrepo said.

Mr. Bush's policies, Mr. Restrepo said, "aren't particularly bold given the holes that we've dug over the last few years."

Mr. Bush made no mention of his plans to encourage Brazil to increase ethanol production for alternative fuels, and made only passing mention of the need for immigration reform.

"I think that was a very important statement, because it shows that at least for this trip there really does seem to be an emphasis on social development in the hemisphere, and that's something that is new and positive," Mr. Farnsworth said.

G.O.P. Shift Is Seen On Trade (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — When the Democrats swept to victory last fall, after a campaign fueled partly by attacks on President Bush's trade policies, trade deals promoted by the administration seemed doomed in the new Congress. But that was then.

In the last week, the administration and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill have signaled a new willingness to work with Democrats to try to secure their support for three pending trade deals — with Panama, Peru and Colombia. The focus of their talks has been guarantees for the rights of workers in countries with which the United States has negotiated trade accords, including a ban on child labor and forced labor.

"There's no question that there's been a change on the Republican side," Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said Monday. "They refused to talk about these things before, and now they're talking."

But it is still not clear how Democrats will respond. Mr. Rangel said that they remained highly skeptical about signs of Republican flexibility on trade and that he had not seen anything "acceptable to a broad number of members" on his side.

"The question will be whether, at the end of the day, things really have changed," he added. "So far the answer would be no."

Mr. Rangel's Republican counterpart on the Ways and Means panel, Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana, was more hopeful.

"We've made a lot of progress, but we certainly have not concluded our efforts," he said Monday. "I'm very encouraged by what's happened so far."

The talks over labor standards were due to accelerate this week, with Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative, on one side, and Mr. Rangel and Mr. McCrery on the other. Another crucial negotiator is Representative Sander M. Levin, a Michigan Democrat who is chairman of the trade subcommittee of Ways and Means.

The negotiators are trying to complete a broad agreement leading to passage of the Panama, Peru and Colombia deals before the end of March.

They are striving for language that would guarantee the right to organize and would ban child labor and forced labor for American trading partners. Such rights were incorporated into trade deals negotiated by President Bill Clinton in the 1990s, and upward of 90 Democrats in the House voted to approve them.

But for the last six years, the Bush administration and the Republican Congressional leadership refused to include any such guarantees in trade deals, and few Democrats voted for them. An accord lowering tariff barriers between the United States and Caribbean countries passed by only two votes in the Republican-led House in 2005.

Administration officials say they recognize that without flexibility on labor, trade deals are dead. But if language on labor rights is negotiated that is acceptable to Democrats and the administration, it could become a "template" for future deals, including a possible global trade accord that is still being negotiated.

There would even be a chance, administration officials say, for incorporating such language into approval of Mr. Bush's request to renew his authority to negotiate trade deals and get an expedited vote for them. That authority expires June 30, and Democrats say they would not support it right now.

An administration official, asking not to be identified while discussing the talks, also insisted that some progress had been made. "They're not there yet, but both sides are trying to look at the options available to make it happen," he said.

But Democrats assert that there has not been as much progress as Republicans are saying, and that they do not want to be stampeded.

Both sides say that there is a fundamental impasse over insistence by Democrats that the trade deals be amended to incorporate a requirement that a trading-partner country adhere to International Labor Organization standards, including the right to organize, and the ban on slave labor, child labor and employment discrimination.

The administration responded first by offering language requiring a country to adhere to its own labor laws, a concession rejected by Democrats. The administration now is offering to require that countries adhere to the "equivalent" of American laws.

Representative Levin, the Democratic chairman of the trade subcommittee, said Monday that the equivalency requirement would open a huge loophole. "They continue to resist addressing the basic issue," he said of the administration.

But the administration, backed by industry groups, charges that organized labor is working with Democrats to adopt standards that are really aimed at loosening American restrictions on labor at home. A generous labor amendment could lead to challenges against American laws that bar strikes by American government employees, they say.

"They don't want this to be a boomerang that rewrites U.S. labor laws," the administration official said.

Another issue is whether any guarantees on labor rights would be incorporated in the body of the three pending trade agreements, requiring them to be renegotiated, or adopted as a side letter as Republicans want. Democrats say only embodying them in the negotiated accords would make them enforceable.

Democrats caution. meanwhile, that even if a breakthrough occurs on labor issues, the Colombia, Panama and Peru deals must also be amended in other ways, particularly by adding a requirement respecting environmental regulations in the trading-partner countries.

Other concerns of the Democrats and of organized labor include clauses in the trade deals that critics say would permit lawsuits in the United States that could undermine American laws, like those requiring prevailing wages for contracts on which foreign countries might bid.

"If the Democrats fix the labor piece, they have to start talking about the other things that are also extremely important to us," said Thea M. Lee, chief international economist for the A.F.L.-C.I.O.

That organization, which has long charged that labor deals have led to a loss of American jobs, is scheduled to reiterate its criticism of the administration's approach on trade at a convention on Tuesday, and to warn Democrats not to take its support for granted, especially with a presidential election heating up.

Democrats say they doubt that the administration would be prepared to let Ms. Schwab, who has been in the job for only eight months, negotiate a deal that would be so politically sensitive.

The administration has been adamantly opposed to Democratic attempts to push for the agenda of organized labor. Vice President Dick Cheney, for example, has asserted that President Bush will veto a bill recently approved in the House that would make it easier for workers to form unions without holding a secret ballot.

In addition, the administration has opposed Democratic attempts to expand the rights of workers to organize and keep control over their work rules in the new Homeland Security Department. The White House political strategy has long seen organized labor as the Democrats' most loyal constituency.

Some Democrats say they do not think the White House will agree to any of the changes they are pushing until there is involvement in the negotiations by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., a leading advocate of trade deals in many speeches, or by the advisers around President Bush like Karl Rove.

Administration officials, on the other hand, say they do not trust the Democrats and worry that if they give in on organized labor, the leadership under Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, and Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, will find other reasons to oppose trade deals for fear of antagonizing organized labor.

Freshmen To Meet With Rangel, Who Is Pressured To Win Concessions From Bush Administration (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, March 6, 2007

Freshman Democrats seeking a direct role in congressional trade policy have won a meeting this week with Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.).

No freshmen sit on the prestigious Ways and Means Committee, which oversees trade policy, but class members pressed for a role in trade in a Jan. 17 letter to Rangel that said opposition to the Bush administration's trade policies had been "vital to our electoral successes."

A spokesman for freshman Rep. Betty Sutton (D-Ohio), a former labor lawyer who has led the freshman efforts, said the meeting was scheduled with the hope that all 39 Democrats who signed the Jan. 17 letter would be able to attend. Spokesman Linden Zakula described the meeting as a positive step and said Sutton was optimistic it would be constructive.

The meeting with the freshmen is the latest sign of the pressure Rangel is under from members of his own caucus to win concessions from the Bush administration on trade that go beyond talks on the labor provisions of pending trade deals, which have dominated the debate.

For example, House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) is preparing a letter to U.S. Trade Representative (USTR) Susan Schwab demanding changes to provisions affecting generic drugs in the pending Colombia and Peru free-trade deals. He sees the pending free-trade agreements (FTAs) as setting up hurdles to poor countries accessing generic drugs.

Several House aides described the labor talks as only a starting point if the administration wants to move any free-trade deals through Congress. “If they want to be able to pass FTAs in this Congress, USTR will have to open their eyes to other issues,” one House aide said.

Reps. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.), Mike Michaud (D-Maine) and Tom Allen (D-Maine) are also circulating a letter to Rangel and trade subcommittee Chairman Sandy Levin (D-Mich.) asking for changes to the environmental chapter of the Peru deal. They say safeguards must be included in the agreement to prevent oil exploration, logging and other activities from threatening endangered plant and animal species in Peru.

Separately, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a leading Democratic voice on Iraq and a close ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), has called for changes to the Peru FTA intended to prevent enterprises there from investing in U.S. landside port activities.

Privately, representatives of organized labor, environmental organizations and advocacy groups have been wary that Rangel may be cornering himself by emphasizing the labor talks with the administration. If a deal on labor is reached, the administration could charge that Democrats are moving the goalposts if they demand other changes.

Partly because of the activity from other members, some activists are feeling confident that trade deals will have to include more than changes to labor to pass muster with Rangel.

“I would say we’re cautiously optimistic that he’s ready to take on the environmental issues,” David Waskow of Friends of the Earth said of Rangel. At the same time, Waskow added, “It would be helpful for those issues to be addressed in a more public way by Rangel.”

The pressure comes at a critical time for the Bush administration, which has been negotiating with Rangel over the labor standards that should be included in pending FTAs with Peru and Colombia. The administration, with some input from Ways and Means ranking member Jim McCrery (R-La.), came forward with a proposal last week, but Democrats initially indicated it was insufficient.

If the administration cannot reach an agreement with Rangel by the end of this month, it also could make it more difficult for USTR to conclude negotiations with Korea on a deal that could be submitted to Congress under fast track. The Korean FTA talks must be concluded by the end of the month to be submitted under fast track.

U.N. Official Discusses Brazil Biofuel (AP)

By Michael Astor

AP, March 6, 2007

A proposed ethanol alliance that President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva is expected to forge with President Bush later this week poses both opportunities and risks for the environment, a top U.N. environmental official said Monday.

Achim Steiner, executive director of the U.N. Environment Program, said growing international demands for ethanol and other biofuels can threaten the Amazon rain forest if safeguards are not put in place because the world's largest remaining tropical wilderness is a target area for agriculture.

Brazil's main biofuel is ethanol made from sugarcane. While sugarcane cultivation is minimal now in the Amazon, some environmentalists fear that growing demands for the fuel could push cane growers into the rainforest.

"I think at the end of the day ... it's a question of whether the Amazon is sufficiently protected and whether the expansion of the ethanol production happens in the context of government policies that try and direct that growth potential in a sustainable base," Steiner told The Associated Press after meeting with Brazil's ministers of environment, energy and foreign relations in the capital of Brasilia.

Bush and Silva are expected to forge an "ethanol alliance" Friday aimed at creating quality standards for the alternative fuel, while joining forces to promote production of ethanol in nations lying between Brazil and the United States.

Brazil is the world's second-biggest producer of ethanol after the United States, and is the biggest exporter. The country has also taken the lead in producing soybean-based biodiesel.

Steiner praised Brazil for reducing Amazon deforestation by 11 percent last year. But many environmentalists say much of the reduction in deforestation was due to an overvalued currency and stagnant prices for soybeans on the international market, which made it far less lucrative to cut down remote forest plots to grow soy beans.

In the near term, soybean growers likely will continue to expand into the Amazon as farmland in Brazil's south and central regions move to sugarcane, which requires greater infrastructure.

"While the whole process of alcohol fuel is less damaging to the climate than fuel from gasoline or oil, what can be positive for the environment can turn negative depending on the extension of the plantations," said Paulo Adario, director of the Greenpeace's Amazon Campaign.

The Amazon region, which covers nearly 60 percent of Brazil, has lost 20 percent of its forest — 1.6 million square miles — to development, logging and farming.

Guatemala To Ask Bush For Drug Fight Aid (AP)

By Juan Carlos Llorca

AP, March 6, 2007

Guatemala knows it is losing the battle against drug trafficking — its police, military and justice system are beholden to traffickers who use the country as a way station for Colombian drug shipments to the U.S.

In a case that has laid bare the extent of corruption in the Central American nation, FBI agents are trying to help discover who ordered the murders of three Salvadoran politicians and the Guatemalan police officers who said they were told to kill them.

The killings and apparent cover-up has exposed the seemingly insurmountable challenges President Oscar Berger faces as he tries to regain control of a defiant and even criminal police force.

"We were shocked by the brutality of the killings, but it was really no surprise to us that organized crime has infiltrated the government," Vice President Eduardo Stein said.

FBI officials met with Guatemalan and Salvadoran authorities last week to discuss the case of the three slain politicians and to offer the help of six forensic scientists, who are to arrive this week. They "will help us in every aspect of the investigation, from crime scene evidence collection to the tests that we need to run," lead prosecutor Alvaro Matus said.

Many suspect the nation's powerful drug gangs are behind the Feb. 19 killings of three Salvadoran members of the Central American Parliament and their driver, whose charred bodies were dumped just outside the capital.

Four police officers, including the head of the Guatemalan National Police, confessed to the killings after a satellite transponder in their unmarked squad car put them at the scene of the crime. But before they could testify against anyone else, they were killed inside their cells.

Witnesses said masked gunmen from outside the prison stormed the high-security facility; another theory is that imprisoned gang members carried out the slayings using weapons hidden inside their cells.

Guatemalan officials have detained two dozen guards and the prison's director for questioning, fired the head of the criminal investigations unit and forced the country's second-highest police official to resign. But they appear no closer to identifying who ordered the string of killings.

Berger says he needs more help in fighting organized crime and will ask President Bush when he visits March 12 to provide U.S. helicopters, planes and radar equipment.

The U.S. government complains that three-quarters of the cocaine reaching U.S. consumers moves through Guatemala. Traffickers use speed boats and planes to carry tons of drugs along the narrow Central American isthmus, dropping off shipments in the Guatemalan jungle before sneaking them into Mexico and up across the U.S. border.

Guatemala relies on a U.S. system of radar-equipped planes to track these drug shipments, but much of those resources have been redirected to support the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. And even when radar does detect traffickers, Guatemala lacks planes and helicopters to intercept the drugs.

Berger took office three years ago promising to reverse the drug policies of his predecessor, Alfonso Portillo, whose lack of action against smuggling prompted Washington to drop Guatemala from its list of anti-narcotics allies. But interdictions fell sharply last year to 620 pounds of cocaine, compared with more than nine tons in 2003 and four tons in 2004.

Guatemalan authorities argue that seizures are not a good measure of their anti-drug efforts because in the past, traffickers have offered corrupt authorities huge amounts of cocaine to stage busts.

Guatemala has tried to change that by purging police forces — including its elite anti-narcotics unit. In 2005, the group's director, Adan Castillo, was arrested in Virginia for conspiring to import cocaine to the U.S. and his 401 agents were given drug and lie detectors tests. Only 50 passed.

Part of the problem is a culture of violence, fueled in part by youth gangs that flourished here after their members were deported from Los Angeles, and a brutal civil war that ended 10 years ago and claimed more than 200,000 lives, mostly civilian. Many allege the death squads during the nearly four-decade conflict live on, inside the nation's police forces.

National Police director Erwin Sperissen says anti-corruption efforts are further complicated because judges often reinstate police officers who have been fired, creating a revolving door of impunity.

In an attempt to counteract that, Guatemala and the United Nations are working to create an International Commission Against Impunity in Guatemala, an independent office that would use foreign investigators to investigate organized crime and police agencies corrupted by criminal organizations. Guatamala's Congress must still approve the U.S.-backed proposal.

At the U.S. government's request, the Guatemalan Congress has passed laws to strengthen law enforcement's investigative abilities, such as allowing undercover agents and phone taps. Guatemala's Interior Ministry has yet to implement the measures, however.

The Short Road From Hostage To Envoy (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, March 5 -- Just weeks ago, Fernando Araújo's only connection to the outside world was his shortwave radio. In six years as a hostage of Marxist rebels, his life had been reduced to a grim routine of forced marches, a diet of soggy beans and rice and the realization that freedom might never come.

Now, after a confused and miraculous dash to freedom that has captivated Colombians, Araújo has become foreign minister, a critical post in a country highly dependent on foreign aid, especially from Washington. When President Bush arrives here on Sunday to meet with President Ãlvaro Uribe, he will also meet a man who is a potent symbol for the hundreds of hostages, including three Americans, still in rebel hands.

In the two months since his escape, Araújo has scrambled to catch up with a world of new technology and shifting geopolitics. He has learned about iPods, and that cellphones take pictures. He has marveled that Google Earth displays the mountains where he was held. He has also gone through emotional lows.

"There are things that hurt, and things that surprise," said Araújo, who was sworn in last week. "What's hurt me? The people who died, the friends and acquaintances I had. For me, they all died in one month because I learned about them all in a short period of time."

He also had to face what he long feared -- that his wife had left him, a revelation he called his first painful blow since emerging from the bush haggard and dehydrated on Jan. 5.

In a relaxed meeting last week with a group of foreign correspondents, Araújo, 51, bespectacled and trim in a blue pinstripe suit, was affable and frank, often answering questions with panache. When an attractive female reporter asked him if he expected to fall in love again, a reference to the loss of his wife, he quipped: "Of course. Are you single?"

But Araújo also talked of having to undergo physical and psychological exams while adjusting to his newfound freedom. "Sometimes I dream about my kidnappers, and I have nightmares," he acknowledged.

Araújo was 45, a successful businessman and former minister of development in President Andres Pastrana's administration when two men forced him into a car on a street in Cartagena on Dec. 4, 2000. For most of the next six years, he was transported from one camp to another in the Maria Mountains, a heavily forested coastal range laden with land mines.

DOJ_NMG_0140725

His only contact with those he left behind were the radio programs in which the families of kidnapping victims talk to their loved ones, filling them with hope. He exercised religiously. He also listened to the news programs of Caracol Radio, Colombia's main network, the BBC, Radio Netherlands and others.

"It was a way to stay busy, to carry out mental exercises, to follow those themes," he said. "For me, it was very important."

In December, Uribe contacted Araújo's family to inform them that military intelligence had located the camp where he was being held. Army commanders wanted to attempt a rescue but needed the family's permission, because rebels have killed captives in the past when the military has approached. The family approved, and on Dec. 31, helicopters carrying troops descended on the camp.

"When the helicopters attacked, I felt it was the chance I had been waiting for," Araújo said.

With the guerrillas momentarily distracted, Araújo dashed into the bush, where he spent the next five days wandering, eventually reaching the hamlet of San Agustin. He approached a farmer, who led him to the outside world. None of his captors was ever arrested.

As foreign minister, Araújo is expected to speak passionately about a crime that the largest rebel group here, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, has long used to generate ransom money and wield leverage to win the release of jailed guerrillas.

Two rebel groups and assorted criminal organizations hold hundreds of people against their will, most for ransom. But the FARC, as the main rebel group is known, is also holding about 60 big-name captives as bargaining chips.

Araújo was among them. The rebels' most valuable hostage is Ingrid Betancourt, a senator with Colombian and French citizenship, who has been held for five years; at time of her abduction, she was a presidential candidate. Also in FARC hands are three Americans -- Marc Gonsalves, Keith Stansell and Thomas Howes -- who were working for the Pentagon when their plane went down in rebel territory in 2003.

Yolanda Pulecio, Betancourt's mother, said she does not know Araújo personally and is unclear whether his appointment will benefit the families of kidnapping victims, who have clashed with Uribe over the government's inability to reach a deal with rebels.

"He knows what kidnapping is, what families suffer, what this signifies, and also the great danger that a rescue can mean for the victims," said Pulecio. "I can't say if he'll help us or not help us. For the government, his appointment helps its image."

Araújo said one of his most important tasks will be to explain the difficult challenges the Uribe government faces in reaching a deal with the rebels. "The important thing is to change the perception and show the world that those who are responsible for these people not being freed are the kidnappers themselves," said Araújo.

Araújo will also be the international face of a government that has been whipsawed by a widening scandal that has linked several members of Congress, the head of the intelligence service and other officials with right-wing paramilitary groups. Indeed, Araújo was named foreign minister because the brother of the former foreign minister, MarÃ-a Consuelo Araújo, who is not related, has been charged with collaborating with paramilitary groups.

Araújo might seem an odd choice for the post. He's missed key events in recent world history, from the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon to the invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq. He was in guerrilla hands as President Hugo Chavez consolidated power in neighboring Venezuela and when Uribe rose to power. Araújo also does not speak English fluently, usually imperative for an official who will make frequent trips to Washington.

He did not play down the shortcomings but said he is scrambling to prepare by reading books on diplomacy and talking to former foreign ministers. And he noted that, over the past few years, the radio programs he listened to helped him keep up with at least some current events.

"Maybe the six years as a captive prepared me to be foreign minister," Araújo said.

Bolivia's Rural Women Are Remaking Cities, Lives (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140726

EL ALTO, Bolivia -- The women attending Esperanza Mitta's community meetings moved here from tiny mountain villages and worn-out mining towns, and now they are fashioning a modern metropolis out of whatever they have in hand.

Toilet paper serves as decorative bunting on the walls of their meeting hall. A rocky vacant lot, surrounded by several leafless trees, serves as their "central plaza." A nearby soccer goal, recently used by neighborhood vigilantes to hang a thief, is considered a local law enforcement tool.

For all the ways they have changed this city, though, the women have altered their own lives even more.

"We don't have educations, so we get together and talk about how we can teach ourselves skills," said Mitta, 51. "A lot of the women just need to work out some of the fears that they have about living in a city, and they all do it, little by little."

For the first time in the world's history, more people next year will live in cities than in rural areas, according to U.N. population experts. Women are leading the urban push, leaving the countryside at higher rates than men, lured in large part by domestic service jobs. They tend to gravitate to places like this: a sprawling expanse in a developing nation struggling to provide basic infrastructure.

Because of people like Mitta, this former hamlet is now larger than the neighboring city of La Paz. El Alto had a population of about 11,000 in 1950, exploded to about 400,000 people by the 1990s and could surpass the 1 million mark next year, according to city officials. The majority of houses lack indoor plumbing and sewer service. Collecting local taxes to pay for services is difficult because about 70 percent of the economy is off-the-books.

It was in those conditions that Mitta started organizing women's meetings several years ago. About 30 of her neighbors get together to talk, many of them dressed in the same shawls and pleated skirts they wore in the indigenous communities where they were born. Newcomers are often shy; the lifestyle changes they are going through can be so overwhelming that they don't know where to start. Unlike some of the men, who had held jobs that exposed them to broader social systems, many of the women had rarely strayed from immediate family and neighbors before moving here.

"The women have to make a lot more changes than the men when they move to a city like this," acknowledged David Apaza, whose family is part of the migration wave to El Alto. "In the countryside, they've lived the same way for hundreds of years, but everything is different here."

The process of change can send women's personal relationships into dizzying spins, but it also can give them collective opportunities previously unknown. One of the most important things they have found in these unpaved streets, many said, is something unimaginable in the countryside: a voice.Social Transformation

El Alto stretches across a plateau more than 13,000 feet above sea level. In the early evening, one's gaze is drawn to the distance -- snow-covered peaks, the lights of La Paz flickering in a bowl-shaped valley below. The immediate surroundings are less inviting: an imprecise grid of dirt streets, block after block of low-slung adobe and brick houses, abandoned tires, stray dogs nosing through trash piles.

Mitta's neighborhood is known as Villa Mercedes G, and she lives there with about 10,000 other people. She commutes each day in a series of minibuses to a housekeeping job in La Paz. The trip -- an hour and a half each way -- consumes nearly a third of her monthly salary of about $50.

One recent evening, she arrived at her simple two-bedroom brick home as the sun disappeared behind the mountains. In the electric light of the kitchen, her husband, Celadonio, stood before a stove spreading dough to make fritters for their dinner. His sun-browned hands were gloved in white flour. His left hand was missing a finger, the result of an accident when he worked in a copper mine.

"He cooks," Mitta said, and behind the frame of her glasses her eyebrow arched playfully. "He also washes clothes. We do things together because we both have to work so much."

Times have changed since Mitta became one of El Alto's urban pioneers, seeking opportunity after the mine where Celadonio worked closed in the mid-1980s. Her evolution -- replicated thousands of times over by the multitudes who follow the same route -- started as soon as she reached El Alto's point of entry and main commercial drag, La Ceja.

Then, as now, it was a sensory riot: Minibuses loaded beyond capacity nudge bumpers while jockeying for space. Street vendors hawk tea, watches, T-shirts, chickens and just about everything else. At night, men and women spill out of dance halls, the dark mud underfoot sucking at their heels. Witnessing a spontaneous street fight is the norm, not the exception.

It's a heady gateway for newcomers from mines or subsistence farms who never carried a coin in their pocket. The transition into a monetary society -- which usually occurred over generations in most developed nations -- happens immediately here.

"When a woman moves here, she can't be a housewife and take care of her family like she used to -- she has to work to survive," Mitta said.

Celadonio couldn't find a job at first after they arrived. But Mitta agreed to clean the offices of a nongovernmental organization, in exchange for a room where the couple and their four children could sleep and a little bit of food. She worked from 5 a.m. to 10 p.m. seven days a week for three years. Eventually, Celadonio found work at a minibus station, and Mitta landed her housecleaning job in La Paz.

"The men at first don't want the women to work," Mitta said. "There's a lot of chauvinism, and they often treat the women badly. I have seen so many separations. I almost split with my husband -- twice. The kids always suffer, because they are alone so much. This isn't just my family that I'm talking about -- the majority of families go through this."

Her women's group meets about once a week. The variety of topics is wide: nutrition, cooking with the different types of foods available in the city, the challenges of raising children in an urban environment. Delinquency is a problem, they say. Some blame it on the hours they have to work away from home.

Conversations like theirs could probably be overheard in any city, because the women here increasingly conform to universal urban prototypes. Their personal transformations -- particularly the shift in emphasis away from complete dedication to family -- have become visible in national statistics. The Bolivian fertility rate, for example, has dropped from about 6.5 children for each woman to about 3.9 over the past 30 years. In the same period, the country's population has gone from mostly rural to about 65 percent urban.

Mitta said one of the most visible barometers of change in her neighborhood is the appearance of day-care centers.

About six blocks from her house, two men struggled with a heavy wooden pole at the side of a dirt road. They were helping a woman install electricity in a day-care center -- all on their own, with no help from city or utility officials.A Growing Influence

The dean of Mitta's group is Bertha Vargas, who has lived in the neighborhood for nearly 30 years and claims to know everyone in it. Ask her, and she'll guess that the ratio of women to men in El Alto is 5 to 1. Ask Mitta, and she'll guess 3 to 1. Ask Mitta's husband, and he'll guess 6 to 1.

Census figures say the ratio is almost even, which is one reason many here don't put much faith in census figures.

"It seems like if there's any kind of public gathering or meeting here -- it doesn't matter what kind -- there are always more women than men," Mitta said. "I'm not sure why, but there are."

The members of the women's group say they came together out of a simple desire to share one another's burdens. When faced with such elemental changes in their personal lives, people naturally seek comfort in the community, Vargas said.

"If you have a group of women in one place, they'll always get together and make plans," she said.

Those plans are getting more political as the women expand their connections. The day before a recent group meeting, Mitta and several other women spent the morning sitting at a roadblock outside their neighborhood in a protest against the local governor.

Although La Paz is Bolivia's seat of government, El Alto is its capital of political activism. Unrest among El Alto's residents -- more than 80 percent of whom describe themselves as indigenous -- has led to massive protests and strikes that forced the resignations of successive presidents in 2003 and 2005.

The migration of rural families to El Alto has sparked the unrest, said Mayor Fanor Nava Santiesteban. Thousands come here from the countryside each year carrying little but high expectations.

"They come directly from rural areas, and when they get here, they have a lot of needs and demands," said Santiesteban, who moved to the city 23 years ago from the mining community of Llallagua. "They arrive, get together, form groups and make their demands known."

The women have been part of that, in many cases becoming far more active in civic life than they had been in the countryside. Over the past several years, the number of women helping to lead the neighborhood federations, which serve as entryways to civic activism, has increased to about 20 percent of the total.

It might not sound like much, but Mitta and the other women have definitely noticed the change.

"It feels like we are starting to get some power," she said. "That's new."

US, N. Korea Discuss Relations In N.Y. (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, March 6, 2007

More than 50 years after the end of the Korean War, the United States and North Korea opened historic talks Monday on steps to establish diplomatic relations following Pyongyang's agreement to dismantle its nuclear program.

Kim and Hill are to meet again Tuesday amid rising expectations of improved U.S. relations with a country President Bush called part of an "axis of evil" five years ago, along with Iran and prewar Iraq.

This is the first U.S. visit by Kim, North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, since the international standoff over the North's nuclear ambitions flared in late 2002.

Under an agreement reached at six-nation talks in Beijing last month on the North's nuclear program, the U.S. and North Korea are supposed to open bilateral talks on establishing diplomatic ties. The North, which tested a nuclear weapon last October, agreed to shut down its main nuclear reactor by mid-April as a step toward abandoning its nuclear program in exchange for aid.

U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack cautioned that this week's initial meetings would focus on setting the agenda for the U.S.-North Korea working group led by Kim and Hill, the top American nuclear negotiator.

"I think that he (Hill) will talk to them about how the process might proceed regarding normalization," McCormack said, including taking North Korea off the U.S. list of state sponsors of terrorism and opening the way for a normal trading relationship with the U.S. for the first time.

Kim's first stop Monday was the Korea Society, a nonprofit organization that promotes greater understanding and cooperation between Americans and Koreans. He spent 4 1/2 hours with an array of academics and VIPs including former secretaries of state Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright.

"We had a very good and fruitful and friendly meeting," Albright told reporters.

A statement issued afterward said participants at the meeting, sponsored by the Korea Society and the National Committee on American Foreign Policy, discussed a range of U.S.-North Korean issues including normalization of relations "in a friendly and forthcoming atmosphere."

Kim arrived in New York late Friday and met over the weekend with South Korea's chief nuclear negotiator Chun Yung-woo. Chun told reporters afterward that "without a doubt, the North is committed to taking initial steps" to implementing its recent agreement to start dismantling its nuclear weapons program, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported Sunday.

A senior aide to South Korea's president will visit North Korea this week, an official said Tuesday, amid media speculation the trip may be aimed at setting up a summit with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

Lee Hae-chan, a former prime minister and current member of parliament, will travel to Pyongyang on Wednesday, said Seo Hye-seok, a Uri Party spokeswoman.

"The trip is aimed at discussing establishing a peace regime on the Korean peninsula with regard to implementing the Feb. 13 agreement," Seo said, referring to the six-nation deal that was reached last month on North Korea's nuclear program.

The announcement spurred speculation that Lee, one of South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun's closest confidants, may discuss setting up a meeting between Roh and Kim Jong Il. Yonhap said the trip is apparently aimed at arranging a summit but Seo denied the media speculation.

In Vietnam, meanwhile, envoys from Japan and North Korea met Tuesday ahead of two-day talks aimed at establishing relations and fulfilling pledges made in Beijing.

Japan has refused to give energy aid to North Korea until Pyongyang clears up its abduction of Japanese citizens, an emotional dispute that has served a major stumbling block between the two nations.

DOJ_NMG_0140729

Japan's chief envoy Koichi Haraguchi said Japan wants to spend ample time discussing the abduction issue. North Korea wants Japan to atone for the 1910-1945 colonization of the Korean Peninsula and wartime atrocities, including sex slavery of tens of thousands of Korean women.

Japan and North Korea have never had formal diplomatic ties.

The first phase of North Korea's disarmament process under the Feb. 13 six-party deal calls on North Korea to shut down its main nuclear reactor and allow U.N. inspectors back into the country within 60 days.

In return, it would receive aid equal to 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil from the other countries participating in the nuclear talks — the United States, South Korea, Russia, China and Japan.

McCormack stressed that the process of normalization must proceed "step by step."

"It is going to have to be a process by which good faith actions are met in turn by good faith actions," he said. "We, of course, intend to abide by our commitments under the agreement. We'll see how the North Korean side lives up to its responsibilities."

The United States has had no diplomatic relations with North Korea since the country was created after World War II, when Korea was split into a communist-dominated North and a U.S.-backed capitalist South.

U.S. Discusses New Relations With N. Korea (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, March 6, 2007

The United States and North Korea, enemies for more than half a century, began talks Monday on establishing formal diplomatic relations.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack downplayed expectations for quick progress. He called the meeting in New York between North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan and Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "just an initial discussion."

McCormack said it will take "some time" to build trust and for North Korea to prove that it is scrapping its nuclear program.

The talks were made possible by a deal last month in which North Korea agreed to freeze nuclear development and allow international inspections in return for fuel and economic aid.

Before meeting Hill on Monday, Kim met with a group of former U.S. diplomats and foreign policy experts. Some of them said they were optimistic the United States and North Korea would agree to formal relations before President Bush leaves office in January 2009.

"Both sides see an opportunity," said Donald Zagoria, president of the National Committee on American Foreign Policy, which seeks to resolve conflicts that threaten U.S. interests. "They understand that time is important and a new administration is chancy."

Zagoria's group co-hosted the meeting along with the Korea Society, a group that promotes U.S.-Korean cooperation.

Other participants were Victor Cha, an official on the National Security Council, and former secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright.

"There have been a lot of lost opportunities on both sides," said Evans Revere, head of the Korea Society and a former U.S. negotiator on Korea. "The stars may never be aligned as well as they are now to put the whole process back on track."

The United States and North Korea fought each other in the 1950-53 Korean War and have never had formal diplomatic relations. They came close to establishing such ties toward the end of the Clinton administration. The United States reversed course when Bush took office and began a lengthy review of a 1994 nuclear agreement between North Korea and the United States.

That deal collapsed in 2002 over U.S. accusations that North Korea had started a secret program to enrich uranium. North Korea then resumed production of plutonium, another bomb fuel. It tested a nuclear weapon in October.

Bush dubbed North Korea, Iran and Iraq the "axis of evil" in 2002. Last month, though, he endorsed a deal with North Korea that resembles the 1994 accord. China, Russia, Japan and South Korea also are part of the new agreement, which calls for economic and diplomatic benefits for North Korea.

"The tone and language today was light-years away from where we were a year ago," said Jim Walsh, a Korea expert from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who also took part in Monday's meeting. "Both sides were talking about momentum and wanting to move faster."

The meetings took place on the same day the United Nations Development Program said it had suspended operations in North Korea. Spokesman David Morrison said the suspension affects $4.4 million in projects. He said the decision was made because of U.S. allegations that aid money has been diverted to the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

Nuclear Dialogue Opens On U.S. Soil (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

U.S. and North Korean negotiators began two days of groundbreaking talks yesterday in New York as part of a deal to end the North's nuclear-weapons programs in exchange for aid and normalization of relations.

Bush administration officials were trying to tamp down expectations of a major breakthrough, saying difficult issues such as U.S. financial sanctions and designation of Pyongyang as an official sponsor of terrorism will require many negotiating sessions.

"I would caution that this is a first meeting and that it is more about setting the norms on how this working group will proceed," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack yesterday.

Still, the meeting of North Korea's top nuclear envoy, Kim Kye-gwan, with U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill represents the highest-level negotiation between the two countries on U.S. soil since 2000, and a sharp change in relations with a country President Bush once included in his "axis of evil."

The meeting occurs three weeks after a breakthrough in the "six-party talks" in Beijing, which established a schedule for the North to scrap its nuclear programs in exchange for economic and diplomatic concessions from the United States and its allies. Also taking part in the talks were South Korea, China, Russia and Japan.

The North enters the U.S. talks under fresh economic pressure as the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) announced yesterday it was suspending all work in the country because of concerns Pyongyang was diverting aid money to other purposes.

The highly unusual suspension affects some 20 projects with a budget of more than $4 million dealing with food security, biodiversity and economic management, UNDP officials said. Eight UNDP staff members in the country may be withdrawn if the North fails to answer the charges of misuse, the agency said.

Mr. Kim and Mr. Hill had a working dinner last night, and the two delegations will have a full day of talks today, U.S. officials said.

The U.S. and North Korean delegations make up one of five "working groups" created by last month's deal. Under a timeline of step-by-step concessions, the talks are supposed to lead in the end to full diplomatic ties between Pyongyang and Washington.

The first deadline in the deal, set for April 13, calls for the North to shut down its nuclear-reactor plant at Yongbyon and allow U.N. inspectors expelled from the country four years ago to return. Mohamed ElBaradei, the top U.N. nuclear-nonproliferation official, plans to visit Pyongyang next week.

In exchange, the United States and its allies will provide the strapped North Korean economy with 50,000 tons of fuel oil, with pledges of up to 1 million tons on tap if the North follows through on all its disarmament promises.

Mr. Kim met with U.S. specialists on Korea in San Francisco and again in New York in private sessions before his meetings with Mr. Hill. He also met with South Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Chun Yung-woo, in New York over the weekend.

A second working group involving North Korea and Japan begins two days of talks tomorrow in Hanoi, [a wire service] news agency reported. Japanese officials said they will press the North to resolve the emotional issue of Japanese nationals abducted by Pyongyang in the 1970s and 1980s, saying there can be no full normalization of ties until the question is resolved.

Japan has urged the United States to hold off on removing North Korea from its list of terrorism-sponsoring countries until the abduction issue is resolved.

Mr. McCormack said there have been "initial bureaucratic discussions" within the U.S. government on removing North Korea from that list, a necessary step before normalization can occur. The Bush administration has also promised to resolve financial sanctions imposed on the North.

Former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, who has emerged as a leading critic of the six-party deal, said in a Wall Street Journal opinion piece yesterday that the North's "aggressive mendacity" in violating past arms deals made it vital that any deal struck now be closely monitored and verified.

Without strong oversight, "what is already a bad deal will become a dangerous deal," he warned.

U.N. Development Agency Suspends Its Work In North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, March 5 — The United Nations Development Program announced Monday that it was suspending work in North Korea because the country had failed to meet conditions set up in response to American complaints that United Nations money was being diverted to the government of Kim Jong-il.

"We have decided to suspend our operations, and the ball is really now in the court of the D.P.R. Korean authorities," said David Morrison, director of communications for the agency, referring to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the country's official name.

The decision, which curtails 20 programs with a budget of $4.4 million, was made Friday, a day after Pak Gil-yon, the North Korean ambassador to the United Nations, met with Ad Melkert, the development program's associate director, to say that his country would not agree to new conditions for assistance.

Those conditions were that the United Nations would stop furnishing payments in hard currency to the government, local vendors and individuals, and stop making in-country hirings subject to government approval.

The demands, with a March 1 deadline, were imposed by the development program's executive board on Jan. 25 after the United States mission charged that the United Nations program had been "systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong-il regime rather than the people of North Korea."

Mr. Morrison said there was no connection between the announcement and the beginning on Monday, at the Waldorf-Astoria hotel in New York, of two days of talks between North Korea, represented by Kim Kye-gwan, and the United States, represented by Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, on the North Korean nuclear program.

"The timing was driven by our undertaking as made explicit in the board decision of the 25th of January to only continue our operations in the D.P.R.K. if certain conditions were met by March 1, which was Thursday," he said.

The development program also said in January that it was narrowing its program to what Mr. Morrison said were "activities designed more directly to benefit the North Korean people rather than to build capacity of the North Korean government."

Mr. Morrison said the North Koreans responded that this action "represented a politicization of the foreign assistance process."

He added that a decision on whether to end the work of the eight international staff members and 15 Koreans involved would be made within two or three days.

In a letter to Ambassador Pak on Friday, the program's administrator, Kemal Dervis, said, "Should circumstances change at a later date, we would be willing to reconsider this position."

The program's Web site lists agricultural recovery, productivity and rural energy as developmental activities in North Korea.

Mr. Morrison said aid would continue under two other United Nations organs, the World Food Program and Unicef, the children's agency.

In the aftermath of the American charges in January, Secretary General Ban Ki-moon ordered a full external audit of United Nations operations in North Korea, beginning with the development program.

Kim The Kidnapper (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Megumi Yokota is among the Japanese citizens kidnapped by North Korea in the 1970s and '80s and still missing today. "There will be no normalization of ties if the abductee issue is not resolved," Japan's lead negotiator, Koichi Haraguchi, told reporters in Hanoi yesterday. Japanese diplomats aren't known for their bluntness, yet Mr. Haraguchi's direct statement echoes the words of virtually every other senior Japanese official on this subject. North Korea says the matter is closed.

This week's meetings are part of the elaborate six-party agreement reached in Beijing last month under which North Korea promises to give up its nuclear program in return for aid. Tokyo signed on to the accord, reportedly under U.S. pressure, but refuses to participate in the energy assistance that is part of the deal unless progress is made on the abduction issue.

Japan's firmness comes directly from Prime Minister Shinzo Abe. He became aware of the abductees' plight in the 1980s, when he was private secretary to his father, Shintaro, then Secretary-General of the Liberal Democratic Party, and family members went through the younger Mr. Abe to request a meeting. When he won his own election to the Diet, in 1993, he became the first politician to fight for return of the abductees. He feels their suffering and the pain of their families "in his heart," says a politician who is close to him.

Megumi, who was abducted in 1977, has become the symbol of the movement to free the abductees. She was 13 years old and on her way home from school when she was snatched off the streets of the western Japanese city of Niigata by North Korean agents. Imprisoned in the hold of a ship and taken to Pyongyang, she was forced to teach spies how to pass as Japanese. In 2002, North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il admitted to kidnapping Megumi and 11 other Japanese citizens.

Their stories are equally heart-rending: A young couple disappear in Kagoshima Prefecture while on a date at a beach, where they had gone to watch the sunset. A 23-year-old woman vanishes in Europe; the last her parents hear from her is a postcard from Copenhagen. A mother and daughter go missing during a shopping trip in Niigata Prefecture. At the time, police who investigated these and other disappearances had no notion of North Korean involvement. In recent years, Japan has reopened many of the missing-persons files from the era but the scent has grown cold. There are only 17 people on the official list of abductees -- the most recent was added in November -- but officials say privately that the victims may number in the "hundreds." South Korea, whose appeasement-minded government prefers not to talk about the kidnappings of its citizens, has 485 people on its list of abductees.

Pyongyang allowed five of the Japanese abductees to return home in 2002. (They were required to leave behind their Korean spouses and children as guarantees that they wouldn't badmouth their captors.) It claimed the rest of the abductees had all died, but the causes of death they cited were so absurd as to be unbelievable -- a 20-something young woman who dropped dead of a heart attack; a man who drowned while swimming in the ocean during a typhoon; and so forth. Megumi was reported to have hanged herself. But the DNA evidence provided by Pyongyang in her case and others proved to be fraudulent.

"Megumi" is a household name in Japan, thanks largely to the efforts of her parents to keep her story alive. Her mother, Sakie, met with President Bush in the White House last year. At the World Economic Forum meeting in Davos in January, the Japanese government hosted a sushi reception and screening of "Abduction," a documentary about her disappearance. Last month, in Tokyo, Mr. Abe attended a press conference at which American folk singer Noel Paul Stookey, of Peter, Paul and Mary fame, debuted his plaintive "Song for Megumi." Meanwhile, a Japanese advocacy group last week announced it would use balloons to scatter 100,000 waterproof leaflets over North Korea offering a $10,000 reward for information on the abductees.

Among the promises the U.S. made to North Korea as part of the Feb. 13 nuclear disarmament deal is a pledge to begin the process of removing it from the list of terror-sponsoring states. When Vice President Dick Cheney visited Tokyo last month, Mr. Abe urged the U.S. not to do so until the abduction issue is resolved. While President Bush has spoken eloquently in the past about human-rights violations in North Korea, that issue appears not to be high on the U.S. agenda these days. Chief U.S.

Israeli Says Iran Is Training Hamas Men (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

TEL AVIV, March 5 — The chief of Shin Bet, the Israeli internal security service, said Monday that the Islamic movement Hamas had sent dozens of men from Gaza to Iran for military training.

"We know that Hamas has started to dispatch people to Iran, tens, and a promise of hundreds," the intelligence chief, Yuval Diskin, told a small group of correspondents here in a rare on-the-record briefing.

The training would last months, perhaps years, he said, adding, "I see this as the strategic danger, more than any weapons smuggled into Gaza."

Ahmed Youssef, an adviser to Ismail Haniya, the Hamas-backed Palestinian prime minister, responded from Gaza by telephone that Hamas "has not sent anyone to Iran," and that Mr. Diskin's comment was "propaganda, to hurt a new government."

Mr. Youssef said there "are attempts to send some men from the Executive Force," a Hamas-led parallel paramilitary police force, "to Arab countries for police training."

Mr. Diskin said that his comments were based on hard intelligence, but Mr. Youssef insisted that Egypt, which shares a border with Gaza, is very strict about Gazans traveling to Iran.

Mr. Diskin's agency is charged in part with understanding Palestinian views. In his assessment, the main Palestinian secular party, Fatah, is continuing to fragment under weak leadership from the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, and would lose another election, if it were held now, to the radical Hamas movement.

Hamas, which rejects Israel's right to exist, won legislative elections more than a year ago and formed a government. "I'm not optimistic about Fatah," Mr. Diskin said. "Fatah is disintegrated and nearly destroyed, with no strong leadership."

He had harsh words for Mr. Abbas, known as Abu Mazen. "Abu Mazen is a good negotiator but doesn't know how to deal with internal party affairs," he said. "He has done nothing to revive Fatah, either its institutions or its military power. He wanted to become the national leader of the Palestinian people, but he forgot that he needs a strong Fatah to do it."

The international isolation of Hamas and an embargo on direct financial aid to the Palestinian Authority it runs has convinced Hamas that it cannot rule alone without any international legitimacy, Mr. Diskin said. "But it also drove Hamas toward Iran," he said, adding, "One of the bad fruits of the isolation of Hamas is the influence of Iran and its money."

He predicted that despite their current difficulties, Fatah and Hamas would agree on a unity government as laid out in principle on Feb. 8 in an agreement in Mecca, Saudi Arabia. But he noted that they were rivals for power and wanted different things from such a government, which might not last.

"This is the ticking bomb inside the unity government," said Mr. Diskin, 50, a former army commando and Shin Bet field operative. But he also predicted that the unity of Western and other nations in boycotting a Hamas-led government would crack.

Hamas, part of the larger Muslim Brotherhood, would never change its fundamental beliefs, he said, and he contended that Hamas's offer of a long-term truce with Israel had been intended to allow the movement to consolidate its control over the Palestinians and to mask a buildup of military armaments and power that would eventually be aimed at Israel.

He predicted a long struggle, arguing that Israel and Hamas would not reach "even a temporary political agreement," but "maybe temporary cooling-down periods."

The Palestinians say Israel, and Shin Bet, have aided the chaos by waging war against the Palestinian security forces in 2002, after a spate of suicide bombings, and by the continuing Israeli occupation of the West Bank. Hamas officials have said they will never recognize Israel's right to exist.

But Hamas says that if Israel returns to 1967 boundaries, allows Palestinian refugees and their families to return to their pre-1948 homes and recognizes Palestine, it will offer a 15-to-20-year truce.

Some suggest that Hamas has shifted position enough that the West should begin to talk to the movement or to finance the government again.

Mr. Abbas has said that he wants to bring Hamas into Palestinian politics and the Palestine Liberation Organization, and that as head of the P.L.O., he would negotiate a settlement with Israel then bring it to the judgment of the Palestinian people.

Mr. Diskin said Hamas and Islamic Jihad were building an "internal military industry" in Gaza to manufacture rockets and antitank weapons, sending men to Lebanon and Iran for training and strengthening their forces.

They are also smuggling in weapons and explosives from Egypt, Mr. Diskin said, and the Egyptians, themselves now worried about terrorist cells in the Sinai, are only now beginning to work hard to stop it.

Elements of what he called "global jihad" are creating "ties" and "connections" to local Gaza groups, especially to Mumtaz Dagmush of the powerful Dagmush clan, Mr. Diskin said, refusing to elaborate. "We don't say Al Qaeda in Shin Bet," he said.

But he said Shin Bet had no evidence that Al Qaeda or its followers were present and active in Gaza.

Asked if, given his analysis of Hamas and Gaza, a large Israeli military operation was inevitable in Gaza, he said a lot depended on what action Egypt took to stop smuggling. "I don't want to say inevitable," Mr. Diskin said. "But if the buildup continues, and if rockets and tunnels continue, at the end of the day we will have to do something about it."

There are others in Israel's security services with more extreme views than Mr. Diskin's, and he has been among those to caution against a large Israeli operation in Gaza now.

Even Amir Peretz, the Labor Party leader and defense minister, says that he would prefer to negotiate peace with Palestinians, but that Hamas's strong position in the Palestinian leadership makes negotiations highly unlikely. Mr. Peretz has pushed for easing travel and access restrictions on Palestinians.

Shin Bet can deal only with the abilities of Israel's adversaries, Mr. Diskin said, pointing to a decrease in Israeli deaths from suicide bombings and terrorism. "Dealing with their motivations," he said, "is up to the politicians."

Spy Chief Sees Hamas Driven To Tehran (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

TEL AVIV -- The international community's decision to cut off financial aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian government has helped drive Hamas into the embrace of Iran, the chief of Israel's domestic spy agency said yesterday.

"One of the bad fruits of the international siege on Hamas is that once all the doors were closed, the only window open was to Iran," said Yuval Diskin, head of the Shin Bet security agency.

Mr. Diskin's analysis of the Palestinian political and military scene painted a bleak prognosis for peace negotiations with Israel and included a warning about a possible Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip.

Yesterday's press briefing came amid renewed fighting between Palestinian factions on the streets of Gaza City and another day of failed negotiations between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh on the makeup of a unity government.

In the eyes of the Shin Bet, Hamas emerged as "the great winner" from a power-sharing deal with the rival Fatah party, Mr. Diskin said. He was referring to a unity agreement signed in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, last month.

The Mecca agreement on a Palestinian unity government could help the Islamic militants break the international aid boycott without requiring it to concede its ideological rejection of the Jewish state, Mr. Diskin said.

At the same time, Hamas would retain control over key ministries to deepen the hold of militant Islam in Palestinian society.

Mr. Diskin said that the bad blood between Hamas and Fatah after weeks of gunbattles in Gaza leaves the probability at 1 in 3 that the Mecca agreement will collapse before a unity government is formed.

He said Mr. Abbas has failed to rebuild his Fatah party into a cohesive political or military force capable of challenging Hamas or providing the backing Mr. Abbas needs for peace negotiations with Israel.

Fatah has become a political party without a clear leader, divided between ex-security chief Mohammed Dahlan in Gaza and Marwan Barghouti, the legislator serving five life sentences in Israeli prison.

DOJ_NMG_0140735

"I don't think Abbas knows where he is headed," Mr. Diskin said. "Abbas is a good negotiator, but he doesn't know how to deal with the internal affairs of his political party."

Mr. Diskin, who dressed in a knit black pullover shirt with jeans, heads the security branch responsible for locating and interrogating Palestinian as well as Jewish militants.

When questioned by reporters about the impact of the international aid boycott on the Hamas government's ties to Iran, Mr. Diskin declined to criticize the aid embargo. Hamas' ties to Iran existed independently of the boycott, he said.

At the same time, it was the economic pressure and instability from the boycott that convinced Hamas leaders that the party was incapable of ruling alone.

Strengthened ties with Iran have reportedly produced tens of millions of dollars in financial aid for the Palestinian Authority.

Mr. Diskin also said that Hamas militants have left Gaza for training in Iran. Though Israeli officials have consistently sounded alarm bells that Hamas is exploiting the Gaza Sinai border to smuggle in weapons, Mr. Diskin said the training activity worries him more.

The intelligence chief said the Sinai Peninsula has moved from being a haven for tourists to a terrorist haven for global jihadists, who are likely in the future to link up with Palestinian militants inside of Gaza.

"If the Egyptians stop the smuggling activity in the Sinai desert," Israel will not need another major operation in Gaza, he said.

Israeli Intelligence Chief: Iran Training Hamas (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

TEL AVIV — The head of Israel's domestic intelligence agency said Monday that Iran was giving advanced military training to members of Hamas, a move he called a "strategic danger" to the Jewish state.

Yuval Diskin, the director of Shin Bet, said that the militant movement had dispatched "tens" of fighters from the Gaza Strip to Iran for "months, maybe years" of instruction, and that Iran had promised to train hundreds more.

A Hamas spokesman denied the assertion. The training, if confirmed, would mean that Iran is expanding its alliance with Hamas, which Israel and the United States list as a terrorist organization and which has controlled the Palestinian Authority government for nearly a year.

Since Western nations cut off funding to the Palestinian government last spring because of Hamas' ascendance, Iran has given it at least $120 million in aid.

Reports of Iran training Hamas militants, previously attributed to unnamed Israeli and Palestinian officials, have been circulating for weeks. Diskin's remark at a rare briefing for foreign reporters was the first such official claim and echoed a drumbeat of charges by the Bush administration that Iran exports terrorism.

The intelligence chief, a burly man with a shaved head, said Hamas was continuing to stockpile weapons smuggled into the Gaza Strip through Egypt. But he said Hamas' development of arms factories in Gaza and its alleged training in Iran were greater long-term threats to Israel.

Mushir Masri, a Hamas member of the Palestinian parliament, said Diskin was spreading a false allegation about training to undermine Hamas and build a case for renewed attacks in Gaza.

Israel fought a five-month offensive in Gaza last year after Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid. Diskin said Hamas was taking advantage of a cease-fire accord reached with Israel last November to prepare for a future military confrontation. The soldier is still being held.

Whether Israel continues to abide by the cease-fire depends on Egypt's ability to stop weapons smuggling into Gaza, Diskin said.

With support from the Bush administration, Israel has tried for months to isolate Hamas politically by strengthening Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of the rival Fatah movement and engaging him in peace talks.

That strategy hit a roadblock last month when Fatah, seeking to end months of armed clashes with Hamas, agreed at a meeting in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, to join the Palestinian government as a minority partner, despite having failed to persuade Hamas to recognize Israel and forswear violence against the Jewish state.

"Hamas is the big winner in the Mecca agreement," Diskin said in one of the starkest official Israeli assessments to date.

The accord, he noted, keeps the prime minister's job in the hands of Hamas, along with ministries involved in education and social welfare, which are crucial to spreading the movement's influence. Diskin predicted that Saudi Arabia's role in the accord and its pledge of financial support would not shake Iran's influence over Hamas, which he said would happily take aid from rival Middle East powers.

The intelligence chief offered an unusually blunt public assessment of Abbas. Israel's Palestinian ally "doesn't have a clear strategy … doesn't know how to run a political movement," he said, and has allowed Fatah to "disintegrate" rather than building its military prowess to gain the upper hand over Hamas.

Diskin said it was still possible that the power-sharing accord would collapse amid lingering factional bloodshed and disagreements over who will control Hamas' and Fatah's various security services and militias. He said the rival factions were amassing forces against each other — a "ticking time bomb inside this unity government."

On Monday, the two sides waged a gun battle for control of a police training compound in Gaza City. Meanwhile, Ismail Haniyeh, who has retained his job as prime minister, said negotiations on the makeup of a new Cabinet would take at least another two weeks.

U.S. Aid To Palestine Hinges On Hamas (AP)

AP, March 6, 2007

The State Department said Monday full funding of a proposed $86 million in security assistance for the Palestinian Authority hinges on whether U.S. officials receive assurances that none of the funds can benefit Hamas.

Spokesman Sean McCormack commented after four House Foreign Affairs Committee members, including Chairman Tom Lantos, D-Calif., urged Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to reconsider the plan in light of the recent agreement between Fatah and Hamas to form a national unity government.

Hamas, which controls most of the Palestinian government, is considered a terrorist organization by the United States, European countries and Israel. Fatah is led by moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

The two groups agreed to form a government after weeks of street fighting left scores dead.

McCormack said the administration is asking the same questions as members of Congress about whether Hamas would benefit from the program.

"Our intention is to move forward with the program," McCormack said. "Whether or not that includes the full $86 million will depend upon the answers to the questions we have and obviously the answers to the questions that the Congress has," he said.

The intent is to assist with training in non-lethal equipment of forces under Abbas' control.

In calling for reconsideration of the plan, the House members said, "This agreement has immensely complicated the search for peace."

They said they were "deeply disappointed" Abbas had committed his Fatah party to forming a government with Hamas without insisting that the group recognize Israel, renounce violence, and accept all previous agreements with Israel.

France Calls For Closer EU-Palestinian Ties (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

France pushed on Monday for the European Union to step up preparations for deeper ties with a Palestinian government of national unity – despite misgivings from countries such as Germany and the Netherlands.

The move came as Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, called for a “more even-handed” approach from the EU and accused Israel of “provocative and illegal actions”.

The question of whether to resume contacts with and direct funding for the Palestinian Authority is set to race up the EU’s agenda as the rival Fatah and Hamas factions move closer to working together.

While France argues that the momentum of last month's Mecca agreement to set up a unity government cannot be wasted, other countries give greater emphasis to making sure the administration fully meets international demands that it recognises Israel.

The US and Israel have much less patience for arguments that some sort of "implicit recognition" of Israel – by, for example abiding by past agreements – would be good enough for resuming ties.

"We have thought about what the EU's attitude should be towards this new government once it is formed," said Catherine Colonna, France's Europe minister, at an EU foreign ministers meeting. "From the start we should take account of elements such as contacts and funding ... We should be prepared to fine-tune this position depending on the acts of the government."

She added that she was not calling for the EU to hurry but to return to the issue in the future.

Diplomats at Monday's meeting said that the Netherlands had given greater emphasis to the importance of the Palestinians meeting the demand to recognise Israel, while Germany is traditionally reluctant to upset its close relationship with Israel.

In unusually strong language for the PA president, a letter written on Mr Abbas's behalf by Rafiq Husseini, his chief of staff, demanded that conditions placed on the PA be matched by reciprocal demands on Israel.

"Despite flagrant Israeli violations of previous agreements and commitments ... Israel continues to benefit from close political and trade relations with the EU, while the Palestinian people suffer the consequences of a crippling international boycott," said the letter, to Frank-Walter Steinmeier, German foreign minister.

It said recent Israeli military incursions into the West Bank, the continuing expansion of illegal settlement in occupied territory and construction work near Jerusalem's al-Aqsa mosque demonstrated the "sheer disregard with which the state of Israel views its commitments, both under previous agreements and toward the international community."

The issue of funding is less pressing than that of contacts, since the EU was able to deliver €700m in aid to the Palestinians last year, despite the election of a Hamas government, largely through constructing other means of providing humanitarian assistance.

Monday also saw a delay in the announcement of the government of national unity itself. The parties had planned to reach agreement at the weekend. However, Ismail Haniya, Hamas prime minister, said Monday a deal was now not expected until the end of next week.

Although the two parties reached agreement in principle in Mecca on February 8, there are differences on the allocation of cabinet posts.

Yuval Diskin, head of Israel's Shin Bet domestic intelligence agency, said Monday he thought there was a 70 per cent chance a Palestinian unity government would be established.

"Hamas is the great winner [from the Mecca agreement]," he told foreign journalists. "Fatah accepted the agreement but I'm not sure Abu Mazen [Mr Abbas] knows exactly where he is headed ... Abu Mazen is not a real leader these days."

Webb Bill Limits Iran Fight (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

Freshman Sen. James H. Webb Jr. yesterday introduced legislation to force President Bush to seek congressional authorization before using force against Iran.

Democratic leaders, who indicated general support for the Virginia Democrat's plan last week, are still deciding whether they will attach it to an upcoming spending bill.

"This presidency has shot from the hip too many times for us to be able to trust it to act on its own," said Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam veteran who won a hotly contested Senate race last fall in part because of his opposition to the Iraq war. "We need the Congress to be involved in any decision to commence military activities absent an attack from the other side or a direct threat."

The backdrop of the discussion is the continuing Capitol Hill debate over the Iraq war. Democrats are still negotiating details of what legislative proposals they will offer to try to block Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Mr. Webb's proposal comes in the form of an amendment to the Bush administration's $100 billion supplemental war-spending request, which Congress will consider in the coming month.

He said the measure is meant to restore a system of legislative checks on executive power that he thinks Mr. Bush has skirted since Congress approved the Iraq war in October 2002. Though Mr. Webb wants troops to come home from Iraq as soon as possible, he noted Congress' inability to block funding U.S. forces in that conflict.

"Unlike the current situation in Iraq, where cutting off funds might impede or interrupt ongoing operations, this legislation denies funding that would be necessary to begin such operations against Iran in the first place," Mr. Webb said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said on Thursday before the bill was drafted that he would be "very, very confident" that he can support Mr. Webb's plan "in real generalities."

"The reason we have to look at Iran every day of our legislative lives is there are many out there much smarter than I am who believe that the administration is ramping up to have the same thing happen in Iran that happened in Iraq," he said, noting intelligence suggesting Iranian involvement with Iraqi insurgents.

A Reid spokesman yesterday said the leader's position has not changed but declined to say whether the amendment would be attached to the supplemental-spending bill. Democratic leaders in the House are discussing similar language and are generally supportive of Mr. Webb's efforts, according to a senior aide in that chamber.

Aides for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky did not respond to calls for comment, but House Minority Leader John A. Boehner labeled Mr. Webb's measure as "a solution in search of a problem."

"We should continue to work with responsible members of the international community to put pressure on the Iranians to dismantle their nuclear-weapons programs and to halt their support for terrorism," the Ohio Republican said. "I don't think it is productive or responsible to place arbitrary restrictions on what is now a hypothetical national security scenario, especially since the language -- if not carefully worked -- could hamstring our efforts against insurgents and terrorists in Iraq."

The Webb amendment as drafted outlines that no funds may be "obligated or expended for military operations or activities within or above the territory of Iran, or within the territorial waters of Iran, except pursuant to a specific authorization of Congress."

Mr. Webb also noted he worked carefully to craft a bill that wouldn't impede any ongoing tactical missions or intelligence gathering and so it would allow the U.S. to "directly repel an attack" initiated from or about to be launched from Iran. It also includes an exception for when troops are led into Iran in "hot pursuit" of forces outside that country.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, last week told senators the U.S. is not planning to attack Iran, but Mr. Webb and others worry the 2002 Iraq resolution is viewed by the president as broad authorization for military action against other nations.

Mr. Webb, a former Republican who served in the Reagan administration as Navy secretary, declined to name supporters at this early stage, but he said it should not be a "party" issue, noting a measure sponsored in the House by anti-war Rep. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican.

Mr. Jones said his bill makes it "crystal clear that no previous resolution passed by Congress authorizes such a use of force."

"If the president is contemplating committing our blood and treasure in another war, then he and his administration must come to Congress and make their case," Mr. Jones said.

In 1999, Mr. Jones was one of two dozen lawmakers who went to the Supreme Court to block President Clinton's military action in Yugoslavia, arguing Congress must grant him such authority.

Still, because of potential nuclear capability and the possibility Iran is providing weapons to terrorists in Iraq, Congress "should never underestimate the potential that Iran might act irresponsibly," Mr. Webb said.

"My hope is we can calm this issue down a bit," he said. "[A]nd hopefully over a period of time bring Iran into the world community. That should be our goal."

IAEA: Iran May Have Halted Nuke Program (AP)

Iran seems to have at least temporarily halted the uranium-enrichment program at the heart of its standoff with the U.N. Security Council, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency said Monday.

The pause could represent an attempt to de-escalate Iran's conflict with the Security Council, which is deliberating a new set of harsher sanctions on the Islamic Republic.

Iran has enriched small quantities of uranium to the low level suitable for nuclear fuel generation. The U.S. and its allies fear that Iran could build nuclear weapons with larger amounts of more highly enriched uranium.

Hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had been expected to announce last month that Iran had started installing 3,000 uranium-enriching centrifuges at a facility in the desert outside the central city of Natanz, where it has about 500 centrifuges above and below ground. But the announcement never materialized, an apparent step back that IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei appeared to confirm Monday.

"I do not believe that the number of centrifuges has increased, nor do I believe that (new) nuclear material has been introduced to the centrifuges at Natanz," he said.

ElBaradei, whose agency has spent more than four years probing Tehran's nuclear activities, warned that, despite the new bit of positive news, lack of Iranian cooperation left the IAEA unable to establish that Tehran's nuclear activities were purely peaceful.

Unless Tehran takes "the long overdue decision" to cooperate with the IAEA, it "will have no option but to reserve its judgment about Iran's nuclear program," he told reporters.

And a senior Iranian official dashed hopes that any short-term pause could translate into Tehran accepting a U.N. Security Council demand to freeze its enrichment activities. Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, Iran's chief IAEA delegate, said his country would "never give up its inalienable right" to enrich uranium, a refrain repeated almost daily by Iranian representatives in the standoff.

Diplomats familiar with the agency's Iran file said Tehran continues to refuse IAEA requests to install cameras that would give agency monitors a full view of its underground hall at Natanz, which Iran says will ultimately house 54,000 enriching centrifuges — enough to produce dozens of nuclear weapons a year.

Iran has produced and stored 250 tons of the gas used as the feedstock for enrichment. That would be enough to produce more than 40 nuclear bombs.

Lack of full remote monitoring means the agency cannot keep tabs on all activities at the bunker, said one diplomat, who demanded anonymity because he was not allowed to discuss the issue. Iran continues to assemble individual centrifuges without connecting them into the cascade needed to enrich uranium in the hall, he said.

Up for review as early as Tuesday will be a Feb. 22 report from ElBaradei finding that Tehran has set up hundreds of centrifuges.

The board was expected to approve last month's decision by ElBaradei to suspend nearly half the technical aid his agency provides to Iran. Only North Korea and Saddam Hussein's Iraq have faced such punishment in the past.

The United States, its key allies and most European nations have in the past been opposed by nonaligned board members who were against harsh punishment.

But the diplomats said that even nations normally backing Tehran — including key U.S. critics such as Cuba and Venezuela — would likely agree to the suspensions because they were backed by the U.N. Security Council.

The European Union, in a statement made available in advance to The Associated Press, said it backed the suspensions, saying it "supports the (IAEA) ... views" on the 18 projects that could be suspended.

The board will also be reviewing North Korea's apparent willingness to ultimately dismantle its nuclear arms-making capabilities.

ElBaradei plans to go to Pyongyang on March 13 as part of the six-nation agreement under which North Korea agreed to allow a return of his agency's experts after more than four years under its commitment to eventually scrap its nuclear program in exchange for economic aid and security assurances.

IAEA Unsure Of Iran's Nuclear Program Goal (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0140740

Iran's lack of cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency means the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency can't determine whether the Islamic state's nuclear activities are purely peaceful, IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei said Monday. "Quite a few uncertainties still remain," he said. ElBaradei said Iran seems to have put its uranium-enrichment program on hold as it awaits U.N Security Council deliberations on whether to impose harsher sanctions. He reported Feb. 22 that Iran had expanded enrichment.

Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, Iran's chief delegate, said his country would never give up its right to enrich uranium, which can be used in weapons or as fuel for power plants. Iran says its program is to produce electricity.

Palestinian unity government delayed

A Palestinian unity government will not be formed before the end of next week, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of the Islamist Hamas group said after meeting in Gaza City with President Mahmoud Abbas of the more moderate Fatah Party. Government spokesman Ghazi Hamad said the two leaders would meet again today to discuss who would be Interior minister, a position that controls security forces. The parties agreed to a division of most Cabinet posts last month.

Most terror suspects in Britain not charged

More than half of the 1,166 people held under security laws in Britain between the 9/11 attacks in 2001 and the end of 2006 were released without being charged, Home Office figures show. Forty of the 221 charged with terrorist offenses were convicted, and all but six of the 186 charged with other offenses were found guilty. Muslims say they are targeted disproportionately for surveillance and arrest. "This is alienating a very large section of the community," said Massoud Shadjareh of the Islamic Human Rights Commission.

Coalition airstrike kills 9 in Afghanistan

A coalition airstrike hit a home in Afghanistan's Kapisa province, killing nine members of a family, Deputy Gov. Sayad Mohammad Dawood Hashimmi said.

The military said two bombs hit a compound that armed militants were seen moving into after a rocket attack on a U.S. base. "These men knowingly endangered civilians by retreating into a populated area," said Army Lt. Col. David Accetta, a military spokesman.

Quake felt from Indonesia to Singapore

A powerful earthquake rattled western Indonesia today, damaging buildings, cutting electricity and forcing patients to flee a hospital on Sumatra island, officials said. It was felt hundreds of miles away in Singapore and Malaysia. The U.S. Geological Survey said the quake had a preliminary magnitude of 6.3.

There were no initial reports of injuries, said Sgt. Gunawaman, a police spokesman who uses one name, and the extent of damage was not known.

U.N. Ambassadors Discuss Iran Sanctions (AP)

By Paul Burkhardt

AP, March 6, 2007

Ambassadors from the world's major powers met Monday to discuss possible new sanctions against Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment, but differences emerged and an agreement did not appear to be close, diplomats said.

The U.S., Britain and France would almost certainly favor tough new sanctions, but they know they will have to settle for less to ensure that Russia and China, which have close ties to Iran, will not use their veto power in the U.N. Security Council to block a new resolution.

Diplomats from the five permanent Security Council nations and Germany held three rounds of talks over the past week on strengthening sanctions against Iran following a report earlier this month by the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency that Iran was expanding enrichment instead of suspending it.

During a conference call on Saturday, the diplomats decided that Security Council ambassadors should take over the discussion of elements for a new resolution — and the ambassadors held their first meeting late Monday at Britain's U.N. Mission.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya, asked afterward by reporters how the meeting went, said there are "some different views here, so we will continue to work." He said the ambassadors would meet again on Tuesday afternoon and then consult with officials in their respective capitals.

Iran's refusal to freeze all its enrichment-related activities prompted the Security Council on Dec. 23 to impose sanctions targeting the country's nuclear and missile programs and the individuals, companies and organizations involved in them. The council gave Tehran 60 days to halt enrichment or face additional nonmilitary measures.

Iran insists its nuclear program is peaceful and aimed solely at producing nuclear energy, but the United States and its European allies believe Tehran's real goal is to produce nuclear weapons.

Tehran says it has the right to enrich uranium under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and has vowed not to stop — which has led the council to consider additional sanctions.

Some diplomats said the new measures may include travel bans, expanding the list of technology and materials countries are banned from making available to Iran, and creating stiffer economic sanctions including a ban on export guarantees to Iran.

The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because the negotiations are private.

Acting U.S. ambassador Alejandro Wolff, said that the elements of the new resolution being discussed build on the resolution passed in December and include "travel issues, financial issues, arms issues."

"I'm pleased that we're all committed to the timely pursuit of a resolution, so we hope it will be soon," he said.

Referring to Monday's meeting, Wolff said, "It was a good spirit. We'll see eventually when we get into more detail. But at this point in discussing the elements we've had a productive discussion."

Wang said there was no draft resolution yet, only "ideas and elements," but he thought it would involve another 60-day deadline.

Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said recently that the new resolution would be looking at an "incremental" strengthening of sanctions. The word "incremental" has also been used by other council diplomats.

After Monday's meeting, France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere said the six ambassadors focused on measures "that could be adopted to convince Iran to suspend its dangerous activities and to come back to negotiation."

"The meeting confirmed an agreement on an incremental approach," he said.

U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, who represented the United States in the earlier talks, told reporters after meeting Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon on Monday afternoon that all six countries want to see a new resolution adopted "in the shortest time possible."

"We just now need to agree with all the other members of the council on what those measures, what those sanctions should be," Burns said. "We hope those deliberations can be conducted in the shortest possible time so that the Iranian government will know that it is really quite isolated on this issue."

Momentum Builds For More Sanctions Against Iran (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

It once scoffed at the viability of international sanctions as a diplomatic tool. But the Bush administration, convinced that punitive financial measures played a role in moving North Korea to accept a deal designed to shut down its nuclear operations, is now spearheading a multilateral effort to use sanctions to turn the screws on Iran and its nuclear program.

Representatives of the five permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany are expected to begin work in New York this week on a second resolution of sanctions against Iran. The idea is to preserve Security Council unity – keeping Tehran's friends China and Russia on board – while ratcheting up the pressure on Iran.

"The administration is following a two-track approach on Iran – the threat of force [and] the pursuit of diplomacy – and the sanctions route does double duty within that approach," says Raymond Tanter, a former National Security Council official now at Georgetown University in Washington. "[The sanctions] are part of the coercive diplomacy side, but they are also part of the effort to maintain consensus among" the five permanent members of the UN Security Council and Germany.

The Bush administration says it's looking for a diplomatic solution but says it won't rule out any options to keep Iran from getting a nuclear weapon.

The new resolution, which officials say could reach a Security Council vote as early as the middle of the month, is expected to expand on and strengthen steps taken in a first resolution passed against Iran in late December. Senior officials from the six key countries discussed the contents of a second resolution in teleconference calls last Thursday and again Saturday, but they didn't come to agreement on all the points of a final text.

"This is going to be an incremental resolution," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday, referring to the ratcheting up of sanctions already in place.

Among the measures being considered, according to US and European officials, are expansion of the list of Iranian officials whose assets would be frozen, a travel ban on more Iranians who are involved in the country's nuclear research and development, and additions to the list of parts, material, and technology that would be banned from Iranian trade.

The United States also hopes to see further restrictions on export credits, or financial measures that encourage trade. European governments, among others, have provided these credits to companies trading with Iran. Moreover, the US wants to limit access that Iran's largest banks have to international markets.

But a proposal for an embargo on all arms trading with Tehran was dropped last week on Russian objections, officials said. Also scuttled was a ban on student visas for Iranians studying subjects such as nuclear physics.

Revived US interest in sanctions reflects two factors. First, the Bush administration, originally frustrated by the four months of wrangling it took to get the first resolution, which was regarded as relatively weak, took note of an almost immediate political impact in Tehran.

The resolution "has generally been a very effective mechanism by which to pressure the Iranian regime," added Mr. McCormack. The resolution has had an impact with financial and business institutions that don't like the uncertainty of dealing with a country under sanctions, he says.

Second, Washington has viewed sanctions against North Korea and UN condemnation of Pyongyang after it tested a nuclear weapon in October as having played a key role in bringing North Korea back to the negotiating table.

The Bush administration appears to have concluded that sanctions can play a part in modifying a country's actions, especially if they come in the context of a united international community that includes the country's key friends: China in the case of North Korea, China and Russia in the case of Iran.

Yet the case of Iran is complicated by the war in Iraq and the interests both the US and Iran have in Iraq. And analysts are divided on what international talks on Iraq, including both Iranian and American officials, might have on the nuclear issue. Some say the talks, which are set to commence this Saturday, are likely to deflate international pressure on Iran, while others believe progress on Iraq could move Iran toward a more accommodating position on its nuclear program.

The administration may have adopted a diplomacy-with-threats approach to Iran, but some analysts say the strategy confuses US partners and encourages the Iranians to focus on ways to exploit it.

"The Bush administration thinking seems to be that every successive resolution will be stronger and that combining that with the increased pressure of measures like a second aircraft carrier in the Gulf, you can pressure Iran into acquiescing," says Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert at the Council on Foreign Relations here.

"On the surface it's not an unintelligent blueprint," he adds, "but it doesn't seem to include an understanding of its impact on the Iranians. They can't comprehend the contradictions." To back up his point, Mr. Takeyh says Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been talking about conditions for opening up trade with Tehran, while Treasury officials have been pressing the international community to cut off trade with Iran.

"You have the State Department saying maybe bilateral talks with Iran will occur as part of the international talks just announced on Iraq," he says, "and you have [White House spokesman] Tony Snow saying, 'No way will there be bilateral talks' " on the margins of Saturday's conference.

The first resolution on Iran "had an impact in Tehran," Takeyh agrees, but it yielded "more of a change in tone than a change in substance. They haven't changed their core policy of pursuing uranium enrichment and expanding their influence in the region."

DOJ_NMG_0140743

Others agree that the US is demonstrating that it does not have a clear policy on Iran. Mr. Tanter, who is also founder of the Iran Policy Committee, a group in Washington that promotes regime change in Iran through action by Iranian dissidents, says the "two-pronged approach" should not be confused with a clear policy.

"The strategy is pretty clear, but the policy is vague," he says. "Is regime change on the table? The State Department says it's not, but the vice president [Dick Cheney] in so many words is saying it is."

The departure of hard-liner John Bolton as US ambassador to the United Nations, and the arrival in New York of President Bush's nominee, current US Ambassador in Baghdad Zalmay Khalilzad, will "move regime change further off the table," Tanter says.

Meanwhile, in Vienna Monday, where the International Atomic Energy Agency was meeting, a 35-nation board of governors was expected to approve cuts to 22 of 55 IAEA technical-aid projects in Iran. That would follow the agency's review of Iran's compliance with the first resolution.

Iranian Women Are Arrested After Protests Outside Court (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

TEHRAN, March 5 — Iranian authorities arrested 33 women on Sunday after protests outside a court where five of them were being tried for leading a campaign to gain more legal rights for women, newspapers reported Monday.

The five women were put on trial after they organized a demonstration for women's rights last June, the ILNA news agency reported. The agency said the women had been charged with endangering national security, agitating against the government and taking part in illegal gatherings.

The arrests on Sunday were part of a crackdown against political activity by women and protests in general since President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad' came to power in 2005.

Authorities broke up last June's demonstration and arrested 70 people. The five organizers now on trial are Noushin Ahmadi Khorassani, Parvin Aradalan, Shahla Entesari, Soosan Tahmassebi and Fariba Davoudi Mohajer.

The five, who have not been in custody, were arrested Sunday after they left the court. The daily newspaper Etemad Melli reported Monday that all 33 of the women were taken to the notorious Evin prison, which has the largest number of political prisoners in the country and where many prisoners say they have been tortured.

Women have been pursuing two major campaigns since last year. One calls for authorities to change a law that permits stoning women to death if they are convicted of adultery. The other is an ambitious project to collect a million signatures for a petition that calls on authorities to change laws that discriminate against women.

Iran's laws codify traditions that place little value on a woman's life and give only slight credence to women's opinions. For instance, a woman's testimony in court is worth half that of a man and, if a woman is killed, the compensation due her family is also half that required for a man's death. The laws also deny women equal rights in divorce, custody and inheritance.

Both campaigns have been publicized worldwide and have drawn support from some well-known Iranians. Shirin Ebadi, the Iranian Nobel Peace Prize winner, has supported the campaigns. Zahra Eshraghi, the granddaughter of the founder of Iran's revolution, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, has signed the petition on discriminatory laws, the daily newspaper Kayhan wrote Monday.

Human Rights Watch condemned the arrests and called for the women's immediate release.

"By targeting peaceful advocates, the government is demonstrating its intolerance for civil action," said Sarah Leah Whitson, the head of the group's Middle East and North Africa division. "The authorities should listen to women's rights advocates and work with them to reform discriminatory laws, instead of persecuting them and perpetuating a system of discrimination."

Interpol Recommends Arrest Warrants For Former Iranian Officials (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, March 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140744

WASHINGTON - Interpol's legal department has recommended issuing capture notices for five former Iranian officials in connection with the 1994 bombing of a Jewish community center in Argentina, which killed 85 people, a U.S. lawmaker said Monday.

Argentina's government requested the capture notices - similar to arrest warrants - triggering anger in the Iranian government, which has denied any involvement in the bombing.

In a 16-page decision, the legal department of the international law-enforcement group recommended issuing the notices for five suspects but not for former Iranian President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani.

"The decision by Interpol to issue capture notices for those implicated in the `94 bombing upholds the integrity of the Argentine judicial inquiry which found sufficient evidence to bring criminal charges against these Iranian officials and their Hezbollah proxies," Florida Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, the ranking Republican on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, said in a statement.

Iran can appeal the decision before Interpol's general secretariat.

Ros-Lehtinen urged Interpol to act expeditiously to implement its decision, so that "these fugitives will be compelled to answer for their alleged role in this terrorist attack."

The legal affairs department of Interpol recommended capture applications for these top former Iranian officials: Ali Fallahijan, the former minister of intelligence and security; Ahmad Vahidi, the former commander of the al-Quds Force, a special operations unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps; Mohsen Rezai, the former commander of the Revolutionary Guard; Mohsen Rabbani, the former cultural attache in the Iranian embassy in Buenos Aires; and Ahmad Reza Asghari, a former third secretary in the Buenos Aires embassy.

The bombing of the community center in Buenos Aires followed a bombing of the Israeli embassy in the Argentine capital, which left 29 dead, two years earlier.

AFP, March 6, 2007

Talks between US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Jordan's King Abdullah II on Monday focused on Iraqi refugees and an Arab peace plan for the Middle East, diplomats said.

The top US diplomat and the Jordanian monarch issued no statement after a meeting and a working lunch at the State Department in Washington.

Providing assistance to Iraqi refugees, an issue that will be addressed at a regional conference on Iraq this weekend in Baghdad, was an issue of serious concern for the Jordanian monarch, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"I know that there is a lot of concern about the pressures on the support network within Jordan and the ability of the NGOs working in Jordan to meet those humanitarian needs" of some 600,000 Iraqi refugees in the country, McCormack said.

The two also were expected to discuss the regional conference on Iraq scheduled for Saturday in Baghdad, which is due to be attended by the US ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, as well as Iranian and Syrian representatives.

"I am sure that she will talk about it, encourage a full Jordanian participation," McCormack said before Rice and the Jordanian monarch had their working lunch.

King Abdullah II has described the conference as an "important development" and that Arab states stood ready to contribute to peace and stability in Iraq, his delegation said in a statement released earlier.

The Jordanian king also "urged the US administration ... to help advance Middle East peace by lending its support to the Arab Peace Initiative," the statement said.

The initiative calls for a comprehensive Israeli-Arab peace, with full security guarantees for Israel from Arab states in exchange for a viable, independent Palestinian state, Israeli withdrawal from all Arab territory occupied since 1967 and an settlement of the refugee question, the statement said.

The Saudi-authored initiative, adopted by the Arab League during a summit in Beirut in 2002, "is drawing increasing interest from Muslim states from outside the region that want to make a constructive contribution to regional peace-making," the Jordanian statement said.

The Islamic countries outside the region expressing an interest were Pakistan, Indonesia and Malaysia, according to the Jordanian ambassador to the United States.

"The king told Rice that growing international interest in regional peace-making is an opportunity that the United States could capitalize on to bring Palestinians and Israelis back to the negotiating table with the aim of brokering a final settlement that would meet the needs of both sides," the statement said.

As part of a five-day working visit to the United States, King Abdullah II was due to meet President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Robert Gates before delivering an address to to a joint session of Congress -- an honor reserved for close US allies.

Agreement Seen In Schism Between Governing Factions (WT)

By Krystal Knapp

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

BEIRUT -- A deal to end the standoff between Lebanon's U.S.-backed government and Hezbollah, the nation's worst political crisis since its 1975-1990 civil war, is expected to be finalized within the next few days, key political figures say.

Optimism about an agreement follows a meeting between Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Saudi King Abdullah on Saturday, when Mr. Ahmadinejad made his first official visit to the Saudi capital.

"The chances of success this time are greater than at any previous time," opposition leader Nabih Berri told the pan-Arab daily Asharq Al-Awsat.

Mr. Berri, who is parliament speaker and head of the Shi'ite Muslim political party Amal, added that a settlement "might appear within 48 hours."

His optimism was echoed by Samir Geagea, a Maronite Christian and a strong critic of the opposition, who told the Lebanese Broadcasting Corp. Sunday that "indeed an effective solution" has been found to the crisis.

The opposition, which includes Hezbollah and Amal, has been locked in a power struggle for months with the anti-Syrian governing coalition.

So far Mr. Berri has not elaborated on the details of an agreement, which would end an impasse over plans for an international tribunal to try suspects in the February 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. The assassination created international pressure on Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon.

Leaders from both sides have provided conflicting information about the details of the agreement.

Mr. Geagea said the solution is based on the formation of a joint committee that would oversee changes to the international tribunal and the creation of a national unity government that would expand the Cabinet, giving the governing majority 19 seats.

The opposition, he said, would be allocated 10 seats and another seat would be allocated to a figure not affiliated with either side.

Hezbollah officials told the press that the deal being negotiated by Iran and Saudi Arabia would provide the opposition with 11 seats in the new Cabinet, giving it veto power.

Opposition leaders threatened as recently as yesterday to escalate their campaign to oust the government if the ruling majority does not respond positively to the proposed settlement.

Pro-Hezbollah demonstrators have held a sit-in in front of the government offices downtown for more than three months in an attempt to topple the pro-Western government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

They have been demanding a larger say in the government, including veto power in the Cabinet. They have also called for early parliamentary elections.

The ruling coalition has accused Hezbollah of trying to gain veto power to block the international tribunal in order to protect Syria, which denies any involvement in Mr. Hariri's killing.

Fatal street clashes between pro-government Sunnis and the mainly Shi'ite opposition have stoked fears that the country could see another sectarian civil war.

Christian political factions are divided between the two camps.

'Peacemaker' King (WT)

By S. Rob Sobhani

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

There is an Arab proverb that says: "The people of Mecca know their ravines better than anybody else." No one knows the "ravines" of Mecca better than its visionary custodian, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia. While the United States and Europe stood by powerless for months as Palestinian factions killed one another and jeopardized America's plans for peace between Israelis and Palestinians, King Abdullah brought together the leaders of Hamas and Fatah in Mecca and got them to agree to bury their differences. Hosting the Mecca conference showed courage, vision and a desire for peace.

From Washington's perspective, the Mecca summit should be viewed through the prism of history as a watershed moment. It averted a potentially disastrous situation for Palestinians: a civil war that threatened to push back their hopes for an independent homeland. The success of the Mecca summit solidified Abdullah's growing reputation as the wise elder statesman of the Arab world, who's always able to douse the flames of extremism and come up with practical compromises.

Unlike Iran's rulers, who continue to fund terrorism, call for the elimination of Israel, promote extremism and act as the regions leading peace-breakers, Abdullah is striving to bring peace to the region. As his longtime aide, Abdulrahman Al-Saeed, points out, "King Abdullah is a genuine peace-maker. He believes profoundly in the importance of Palestinian justice and Arab unity and he is always searching for practical and peaceful solutions toward that goal." There is another important aspect to Saudi Arabia's deft diplomacy that the United States should appreciate. When the king is involved in conflict resolution, he is not seen as meddling into the affairs of others. Rather, as custodian of the two holiest sites in Islam, his role as mediator is seen as an obligation. In short, his intervention will almost always be welcomed by a majority within the Arab-Muslim world.

Beyond his role as the "Arabian peacemaker," King Abdullah has shown a commitment to bringing about internal reforms evidenced by the fresh faces appointed to leadership positions. The recent selection of Adel al-Jubeir as Saudi Arabia's new ambassador to Washington signals King Abdullah's commitment to promoting the younger generation and infusing fresh blood into the political system. By choosing this young, able, Georgetown-educated diplomat to represent Saudi Arabia, Abdullah has also signaled a renewed dedication to strengthening U.S.-Saudi ties. Adel al-Jubeir is an astute observer of the U.S. political system and the first non-royal to serve as his country's ambassador to Washington.

In addition to his role as wise elder monarch and promoter of young visionaries, the king has exhibited all the hallmarks of a world statesman by being a silent force behind stability in global energy markets. As the world's largest producer of petroleum and home to more than 25 percent of the world's remaining oil reserves, King Abdullah is very much aware of the enormous responsibility Saudi Arabia bears in maintaining stability in the global economy. Accordingly, every time the virulent anti-American rhetoric of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad sends oil prices skyrocketing, Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Mr. Naimi, calms the oil markets by emphasizing the stable supply of oil from OPEC producers.

It is in America's interest for Washington to recognize the important role of Saudi Arabia's wise monarch and make him an equal partner in bringing about peace and stability in the combustible Middle East. King Abdullah has the moral authority, religious credentials, personal dignity, generous soul and vision to lead an effort at a lasting peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

Under the leadership of Saudi Arabia, King Abdullah can announce a Marshall Plan — or emaar-al-amal in Arabic, literally meaning the hope of rebuilding) for the West Bank and Gaza Strip that could become the prelude to the two-state solution envisioned by President Bush. By calling upon the Arab world to invest surplus petrodollars into the Gaza Strip (high-rise buildings overlooking the blue waters of the Mediterranean) and West Bank (a "chunnel" from the West Bank to Gaza employing tens of thousands of Palestinians), Saudi Arabia would have given Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas what he has been denied to-date — economic viability and a chance to negotiate a lasting peace with Israel with a mandate from all Palestinians.

If Washington does not empower King Abdullah, the negative force and path of extremism exemplified by Mr. Ahmadinejad, Lebanon's Hassan Nassrallah and Iran's Ali Khamenei will fill the current power vacuum in the Middle East with hate and destruction. By listening to this wise Meccan, the United States can chart history and help bring peace and stability to the Middle East.

Islam's Other Radicals (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. -- At this landmark Summit on Secular Islam, there are no "moderate" Muslims.

There are ex-Muslims: People like Ibn Warraq, author of "Why I Am Not a Muslim," who doesn't want an Islamic Reformation so much as he does a Muslim Enlightenment. There are ex-jihadists: people like Tawfik Hamid, who, as a young medical student in Cairo, briefly enlisted in the Gamaa Islamiya terrorist group and who remembers being preached to by a mesmerizing doctor named Ayman al-Zawahiri.

There are Muslim runaways: People like Afshin Ellian, who in 1983 fled Iran -- and the threat of execution -- on camelback and is now a professor of law at the University of Leiden in Holland. (Now threatened by European jihadists, he lives with round-the-clock police protection.) There are experts on Islamic law: People like Hasan Mahmoud, a native Bangladeshi who, as director of Shariah at the Muslim Canadian Congress, was instrumental in overturning Ontario's once-legal Shariah court last year.

There are even a few practicing Muslims here, such as Canadian author Irshad Manji. Ms. Manji, whose documentary "Faith Without Fear" airs on PBS next month, describes herself as a "radical traditionalist" and draws a sharp distinction between Muslim moderates and reformers: "Moderate Muslims denounce terror that's committed in the name of Islam but they deny that religion has anything to do with it," she says. "Reform-minded Muslims denounce terror that's committed in the name of Islam and acknowledge that our religion is used to inspire it."

The difference is not trivial. For more than five years, the Bush administration has been attempting to enlist the support of the so-called moderates in the war on terror -- its definition of "moderate" being remarkably elastic, to put it charitably. To take one example, administration emissary Karen Hughes has "reached out" to such figures as Sheikh Mohammed Sayed Tantawi, head of al-Azhar theological university in Cairo, with whom she had a "wonderful meeting" in September 2005.

Sheikh Tantawi, adept at talking out of both sides of his mouth, had earlier approved a fatwa calling on the Iraqi people to "defend itself, its land, and its homeland [against the U.S. invasion] with all means of defense at its disposal, because it is a jihad that is permitted by Islamic law. . . . The gates of jihad are open until the Day of Judgment, and he who denies this is an infidel or one who abandons his religion."

Undersecretary Hughes is not at this summit, of course, nor is anyone else from the State Department, nor is the U.S.-funded al-Hurra Arabic TV station -- facts archly noted by the conferees. In the quasi-official U.S. view, the speakers at this conference amount to an exotic, publicity-seeking fringe group, with whom close association is politically unwise.

Al-Jazeera, however, is here, suggesting that the real Arab mainstream better appreciates the broad interest the conference's speakers attract in the Muslim world, as well as their latent power. Perhaps this is the flip side of the appeal of extremist Islam, an indication that what Muslims are mainly looking for are radical alternatives to the unpalatable mush of unpopular autocratic governments, state-approved clerics like Sheikh Tantawi, and Saudi-funded "mainstream" organizations such as the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Radicalism, at least of a kind, is certainly what this summit provides via Wafa Sultan. Dr. Sultan, a Syrian-born psychiatrist now living in the U.S., came to widespread public attention last year after she debated a Sunni cleric on al-Jazeera. "Only Muslims defend their beliefs by burning down churches," she observed. The televised clip, translated by Memri, has been downloaded on YouTube more than a million times.

Dr. Sultan, whose outspokenness has forced her and her family into hiding, is here to receive an award from the Center for Inquiry, the summit's organizer and lead funder. She accepts it by saying: "I don't believe there is any difference between radical Islam and regular Islam."

The view is shared by some, though by no means all, of the conferees. "Salafists cannot imagine Islam without the killing of apostates," says Dr. Hamid, who also now lives in hiding. "To them, the religion is a house of cards: Remove one element, and the whole structure collapses." Another conferee subscribes to the Salafist logic, though he dissents from the religion as a whole. "Truth is," he admits, "to be a Muslim democrat you have to be a bad Muslim."

In this view, the baggage of Shariah and hadith -- the traditions in which some of the most violent Islamic injunctions are to be found -- are as central to Islam as the Quran itself. Hasan Mahmoud disagrees. "Most Muslims don't even know what the Shariah laws are," he says. "The moment you actually show them what the laws are, they can understand they're unjust." Mr. Mahmoud illustrates the point by observing that, under Shariah, a husband does not require a witness to divorce his wife. "But the Quran says that if you want to divorce your wife, you need two witnesses. With Muslims, this kind of thing works magic."

Mr. Mahmoud spreads his gospel partly by way of cheaply produced DVDs, which seems pretty crude until one recalls that Ayatollah Khomeini, during his exile in Paris, spread the gospel of Islamic revolution by way of audiocassettes. Other conferees also have their Web sites: Alamgir Hussain, from Singapore, has islam-watch.org; Banafsheh Zand-Bonazzi, the conference's moving spirit, puts out IranPressNews.com; other conferees write for MiddleEastTransparent.com and so on. These are the "frugal chariots," to borrow a phrase from Emily Dickinson, that bear the Muslim reformer's soul.

A fair bit of U.S. government money is being spent on conference security, including from the FBI. Still, it's remarkable that the government, given the huge resources available from places like the National Endowment for Democracy, provides no funding or support for this conference or its various participants.

Here are two questions for the government: If Mr. Warraq, Dr. Sultan et al. are really irrelevant to the larger Muslim debate, why are the jihadists so eager to kill them? And if the jihadists want to kill them, don't they deserve support as well as security?

Russia Revises Stance On US Missile Plans (FT)

By Neil Buckley, Daniel Dombey And Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Russia said it was revising its military doctrine to reflect other powers' growing use of military force, while a Russian general warned again that Moscow could knock out elements of the US missile defence system planned for eastern Europe.

The comments came as Angela Merkel, German chancellor, added her voice to the heated international debate over the missile defence system by calling for Nato to be given responsibility for defusing concerns over the plan.

"Nato is the best place for discussion of this issue," she told the Financial Times in an interview, arguing that Washington should step up consultation with its western allies and Russia.

Her statement reflects concerns over increasing east-west tensions since Vladimir Putin, Russian president, delivered a speech in Munich sharply criticising US unilateralism, and the US formally asked Poland and the Czech Republic to host parts of the anti-missile system.

Russia disputes Washington's claims that the system is not aimed at Russia but designed to intercept missiles from "rogue" states such as Iran or North Korea.

Russia has said that it might withdraw from the 1987 Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces treaty, which outlawed an entire class of medium-range weapons, unless the US drops plans to site the system in eastern Europe.

In the latest warning, Gen Igor Khvorov, head of Russia's strategic bomber force, said Russian bombers could easily knock out the installations. "Since missile defence elements are weakly protected, all types of our aircraft are capable of applying electronic counter measures against them or physically destroying them."

At the same time, Russia's presidential security council said it was developing a new military doctrine to take account of the growing role of force in the foreign policy of "leading states".

Without naming the US, it echoed the language of Mr Putin's complaints about Washington's unrestrained use of force.

"Leading states are paying increasing attention in military policy to modernising their military forces and improving their weaponry," the statement added. "Modern forms of armed conflict are being actively implemented, technologies for use of force are being reviewed, the configuration of military presence is being changed, and military alliances are being strengthened – particularly Nato."

But Mrs Merkel said that Nato should be the forum for greater consultation by Washington of both its western allies and Russia on the issue of missile defence. "It is better to have more discussion on this issue rather than less," she said.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, used a visit to Berlin last month to stress that Washington had held 10 rounds of talks with Russia on the defence system since spring 2006.

Mirek Topolanek, Czech prime minister, also brushed aside European objections to the missile defence plan. "As for the 18 EU member states who host US military bases, it is not up to them to comment on the existence of such a presence in the Czech Republic," he said after talks with Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato secretary general, in Brussels.

German officials said Berlin was concerned that while the defence system was not targeted at Russia, there was a danger its creation could mark a departure from the international trend since the early 1990s towards disarmament.

At an EU meeting yesterday, Jean Asselborn, Luxembourg's foreign minister, was more outspoken, calling the US plans "incomprehensible".

"We will have no stability in Europe if we push the Russians into a corner," he said.

U.S. Moves To Soothe Growing Russian Resentment (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — The Bush administration has decided to reach out more often and more intensively to Russia at a time when the leadership in Moscow is harshly criticizing American policy and some scholars say the United States has not sufficiently tended to an important relationship.

Plans by the United States to base elements of a missile defense system in Eastern Europe, as well as Washington's support for expanding NATO, have compounded a sense of resentment within a Russian leadership emboldened by a flood of petrodollars.

In the wake of criticism from President Vladimir V. Putin and his inner circle of political advisers and generals, there is a growing acknowledgment among officials in Washington that the United States has not responded as rapidly or eloquently as it might have to a widespread sense of grievance in Russia.

This frustration grows from a view, broadly held in the Kremlin and among the Russian people, that the Russian leadership has accommodated many of Washington's interests in the years since the Soviet Union fell but that Washington has not reciprocated.

Senior administration officials said their initiative called for engaging Russian leaders in private discussions to illustrate that the United States was putting extra effort into nurturing the relationship and that Russia deserved a more thorough dialogue on American foreign policy and national security plans.

A senior administration official involved in developing the strategy said that under the program, "we'll have more consultation and we'll do it more extensively and more intensively, so that there is a good understanding of each other's views."

"That is not to say that every objection and concern has to be accommodated or that they have some kind of veto over our program," the official said. "What it does say is that we should be willing to sit down, both Russia and the United States, in a real dialogue, and have a real dialogue where we try and address the interests and concerns of both sides."

Those mutual interests, administration officials said, include halting the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea, cooperating on counterterrorism and counternarcotics efforts and on building missile defense, which American officials argue should interest Russia, which is within striking distance of both Iran and North Korea.

Senior administration officials said the initiative would also involve a more intensive dialogue between the Russian and American militaries, a forum that might lend itself to fuller technical exchanges about Washington's plans for missile defense.

Administration officials have said they will stand their ground in defending the United States against the substance of the Russian critique. In particular, the officials say, Russian threats will not halt Washington's plans to place elements of a missile defense system in Poland and the Czech Republic, nor diminish Washington's support of NATO expansion.

The stunning directness of Moscow's recent public complaints is viewed as undermining United States-Russia relations. Equally worrisome to the administration is that the harsh tone of the Kremlin's comments has greatly troubled European allies caught in between, especially in former Soviet client states in Eastern Europe that later joined NATO.

The new round of verbal attacks from Russia began Feb. 10 in Munich, when Mr. Putin used a keynote address at a security conference to accuse the United States of overstepping its borders to impose its will on the world through the unilateral application of military power. He criticized the American policies on missile defense and NATO expansion.

Some analysts said initially that the speech had been intended for a Russian domestic audience. But there now is a growing sense among Russia experts that the tough language was specifically aimed at the United States and the NATO allies.

"We weren't paying attention. We were distracted, busy, with other problems in the world, in particular Iraq," said Michael A. McFaul, a professor at Stanford University who is a Russia scholar. "The administration is now put in a position of playing defense, as we are finally seeing the international consequences of the rather dramatic internal transformation inside Russia with the erosion of democracy, a new ruling class, a massive transfer of property rights from so-called oligarchs to, basically, friends of Putin, most of whom are from the old K.G.B."

Senior administration officials said the new effort to reach out to Russia already had been put into action, and included Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's consultation with her Russian counterpart, Foreign Minister Sergey V. Lavrov, during meetings in Berlin on Feb. 21 and 22 about whether Russia had the appetite to pursue a second Security Council resolution for sanctions against Iran.

The Berlin meetings were intended in large part to show Russia that the Bush administration was consulting with Moscow before its diplomatic initiatives.

Ms. Rice and Mr. Lavrov have a peppery relationship. While the two have met often to discuss Iran, most of the sessions have been in official formats including the five permanent members of the Security Council and Germany, in contrast to the more ad hoc Berlin session with Mr. Lavrov and counterparts from Germany and the European Union.

Ms. Rice's meetings with Mr. Lavrov were followed in the same week by a visit to Moscow by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser. Although Mr. Hadley's trip was organized before the remarks by Russian officials, he used his visit to offer great detail about the administration's agenda, including plans for missile defense.

Mr. Hadley also gave a full description of a pending decision by the United States to build a new generation of nuclear warheads, according to American and Russian officials. Mr. Hadley offered those comments even before the Russians asked about the warhead program in that meeting.

NATO diplomats have also expressed frustration at Russia's words of shock over proposals for basing missile interceptors in Poland and radar in the Czech Republic, and they produced lists of sessions in which officials from Moscow were briefed on the antimissile effort in NATO-Russia Council sessions and in bilateral talks.

Russian officials complain that those meetings were not two-way consultations about American plans but one-way notifications at which their concerns were not weighed.

The United States needs Russia if it is to succeed in its quest of ratcheting up the pressure at the Security Council to block Iran's nuclear ambitions.

The first Security Council resolution — passed Dec. 23 — took four months to complete, partly because Russia balked at the much tougher package of economic sanctions that the Bush administration sought.

Moscow also balked over sanctions against a nuclear power plant that Russia is building in Bushehr, in southern Iran.

Russia, U.S. To Discuss START (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

The Bush administration has rebuffed Russian overtures to negotiate a legally binding replacement of the 1991 START I treaty that reduced the two countries' strategic nuclear forces but is set to expire in 2009, U.S. and Russian officials said yesterday.

An expert-level meeting between the former enemies to discuss options after the treaty's expiration is expected to take place as soon as this month, but their differences are not likely to be resolved, the officials said.

While the Russians insist on a legally binding agreement, the Americans have focused on "transparency and confidence-building measures" that would still allow both sides to verify each others' arsenals and capabilities.

"We are not going to engage in Cold War-style arms control," said Robert Joseph, former undersecretary of state for arms control and international security. "We don't want to make nuclear warheads the currency of our relationship with Russia. Issues like cooperation on combating nuclear terrorism are much more important today."

Nuclear and arms control experts said the significance of the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START) goes beyond its disarmament goals. It provides the only mutual verification mechanism, which is also relied upon by the 2002 Strategic Offensive Reductions Treaty (SORT).

"Without a verification regime, we'd be dependent on satellites and human intelligence to assess the Russian arsenal," said Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association. "That would lead to further mistrust and mutual suspicion."

Mr. Joseph said the United States is not opposed to copying from START measures such as site visits in any new agreement, but the way they are implemented should be different from the treaty's verification regime, which reflects the realities of the 1980s.

Russian President Vladimir Putin complained last year about what he called a "stagnation in the area of disarmament," blaming the Bush administration, which has been accused of walking away from international treaties.

"We propose to our American partners that we launch negotiations to replace the START I," Mr. Putin said in June.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said last month that President Bush and Mr. Putin agreed during the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg in July to "start a specific discussion about the fate of our strategic stability treaties."

"We need a subject-specific discussion about how these lethal weapons can be contained on the basis of mutual trust and a balance of forces and interests," Mr. Lavrov told the newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta.

"We don't want a discussion reduced to the idea that, since we are no longer opponents, there is no need for us to restrain each other," he said. "That's not the right approach. Actually, it carries the risk of generating the same old arms race, since neither of us is likely to want to lag behind too much."

Russian officials said that Mr. Joseph resisted expert-level talks and preferred "strategic political discussions."

Mr. Joseph, who resigned last month, said he wanted to "get the policy framework right" so the experts know the objective of their negotiations. He noted that there was little contention as those decisions were being made within the Bush administration and expressed certainty that the U.S. position on the issue will not change.

U.S. and Russian officials said that Mr. Joseph and Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Sergey Kislyak decided to hold an expert-level session this month during their last meetings in late January and early February.

START I, signed by President George Bush in 1991, obliged Moscow and Washington to cut their deployed strategic nuclear forces of about 10,000 warheads apiece down to 6,000 each. The treaty can be extended, but either side must notify the other one year before it expires on Dec. 5, 2009.

START II, which was negotiated in 1993, never entered into force because the U.S. Senate and the Russian parliament ratified two different versions. Moscow repudiated the accord a day after the June 13, 2002, U.S. withdrawal from the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty (ABM) that banned strategic missile defense systems.

To replace the ABM, the current Bush administration negotiated SORT, which obligated the United States and Russia to reduce their deployed offensive nuclear forces to 1,700 to 2,200 strategic warheads each by Dec. 31, 2012, when the accord expires.

Mr. Kimball said 2,200 warheads are "well beyond our defense requirements."

Putin Critic Dies In Fall From 5th-floor Window (WT)

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

LONDON DAILY TELEGRAPH

A journalist who had criticized Russian President Vladimir Putin and frequently irritated Russia's powerful intelligence services has died after falling from a fifth-floor window of an apartment building.

Friends and colleagues demanded an investigation yesterday into the death of Ivan Safronov, the military-affairs columnist at the Kommersant newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0140752

Russian investigators said they believed that Mr. Safronov, 51, had committed suicide -- an interpretation that was challenged by colleagues.

Editors at Kommersant, widely regarded as the country's most authoritative newspaper, said the manner in which Mr. Safronov died pointed to foul play.

The reporter had been to a clinic, where he was being treated for an ulcer, on Friday afternoon and then stopped on the way back to buy a bag of oranges, according to witnesses.

Although he lived on the third floor, the former army colonel fell from the fifth and landed on the portico above the main entrance.

"I am sure it was murder," said Ilya Bulavinov, Kommersant's deputy chief editor. "People don't commit suicide in this manner."

Two female students heard Mr. Safronov's body land and reported that he was still alive. They rang emergency services and were told to call back in 30 minutes if the journalist were still moving. By that time, he was dead.

Russian security services have been implicated in the deaths of a number of Mr. Putin's critics, including journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who was fatally shot in Moscow in October, and the poisoning death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvenenko in London the following month.

China's Spies 'Very Aggressive' Threat To U.S. (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

China's intelligence services are among the most aggressive at spying on the United States, followed by Cuban, Russian and Iranian spy agencies, according to the U.S. government's top counterintelligence coordinator.

"These services are eating our lunch," Joel F. Brenner, the new head of the Office of the National Counterintelligence Executive, said in his first interview since being named to the counterspy post in August.

Mr. Brenner, a former inspector general at the National Security Agency, told The Washington Times that the U.S. remains the No. 1 target of "virtually every significant espionage service on the face of the Earth."

China's intelligence activities have been "very aggressive" at acquiring U.S. advanced technology, often before it is fully developed here. "The technology bleed to China, among others, is a very serious problem," he said, noting that the FBI is improving its efforts to identify and protect sensitive technology.

Beijing also succeeded in penetrating, and thus frustrating, U.S. intelligence against China through Katrina Leung, a Los Angeles businesswoman who was a long-time FBI informant secretly loyal to Beijing, Mr. Brenner said.

Mr. Brenner's office, known as NCIX, is working on a new presidential strategy for counterintelligence. The goal of the office is to provide strategic direction aimed at bolstering counterintelligence agencies, including the FBI, CIA and Pentagon counterspy units.

Another key priority is using counterintelligence techniques, such as turning foreign agents or recruiting supporters, against terrorist groups.

"Hezbollah or al Qaeda don't do a terrorist operation without doing an intelligence operation first," Mr. Brenner said. "They are very thorough and capable in the way they do their advance surveillance and reconnoitering. We've got to get better at that aspect of supporting counterterrorism, and that is one of our core missions here in this office."

Additionally, the NCIX is pressing counterspies to do more to stop computer-based intelligence-gathering, something he called a growing threat.

"You can now, from the comfort of your own home or office, exfiltrate information electronically from somebody else's computer around the world without the expense and risk of trying to grow a spy," Mr. Brenner said.

"We've got to start addressing that in a big way," he said. "Network vulnerability is a huge issue, and it's an issue in the private as well as a public sector."

Mr. Brenner also said he is trying to recruit more-capable people to join counterintelligence services.

DOJ_NMG_0140753

"You can't leave counterintelligence to the fanatics and paranoiacs," he said. "We really need our best people, and so training and education and supporting national security studies is something we're paying a lot of attention to."

He also plans to speed up damage assessments, or lessons learned, after spy cases and to conduct aggressive follow-up to make sure recommended changes are implemented.

Currently, the NCIX is conducting a damage assessment of the Leung spy case, examining how Leung secretly spied for China by sexually entrapping two of the FBI's most senior counterspies, FBI agents James J. Smith and Bill Cleveland.

The Leung case was a "very serious espionage case," Mr. Brenner said, a view that contrasts with that of FBI officials who have sought to play down the spy case, saying it was mainly about improper sexual relations between the FBI informant and her handlers. Leung, through her lawyers, has denied spying for China.

Mr. Brenner said China, however, was in fact running Leung as their agent. "That was an intelligence operation, and it was a very successful intelligence operation," he said. "It was a classic honey trap" -- spy jargon for sexual entrapment.

Leung was initially charged in 2003 with spying for China, but the charges were dropped and she eventually pleaded guilty in 2005 to minor charges: making false statements and filing a false tax return. Smith also pleaded guilty to lying to investigators.

In addition to China, Cuba's intelligence services continue to pose a major intelligence threat, as do spies from Russia and Iran, Mr. Brenner said, noting that Cuban intelligence remains a "a very professional service."

"They were trained by the KGB, and now they're training the Venezuelans," he said.

Russia's intelligence service remains "very aggressive" against the United States, and "the Iranians also have a mature and capable service," he said. All "are running significant operations against us."

Overall, the problem of stopping foreign spies is daunting, both due to the number of spies and as a result of problems among U.S. agencies charged with stopping them, namely the FBI, domestically, and the CIA, overseas. Mr. Brenner said he is trying to reform counterintelligence as the mission manager within the office of the director of national intelligence.

Various counterspy agencies, from the Defense Department to the FBI and CIA, have regarded counterintelligence "as an intramural sport."

"We're trying to turn the [counterintelligence] community into a community in reality as well as in name," he said.

"Americans are going to wake up one day and realize that the place in the world we have come to take for granted isn't ours by some God-given right. We have to defend it," he said.

US Warns China On Military Build-up (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, March 6, 2007

The United States warned China Monday that its announced military spending boost was "inconsistent" with peaceful growth and hinted that Beijing was understating its defense expenditures.

"This kind of spending not only concerns us but raises concerns among China's neighbors. This is inconsistent with China's policy of peaceful development," said White House national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

"We hope they will demonstrate more transparency in the future," Johndroe told AFP by telephone.

He declined to elaborate, but US officials in the past have used such language to mean that they do not believe that China's declared military budget accurately represents their actual defense spending.

Johndroe's comments came after Beijing announced a nearly 20 percent increase in defense expenditures in 2007.

And Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao said Monday that China would continue to strengthen its armed forces, remarks applauded by military leaders who want to counter new threats and take back Taiwan.

"Building a solid national defense system and a powerful people's army is a strategic task in socialist modernization," Wen told the opening of the annual session of the National People's Congress, or legislature.

Wen made the pledge while addressing nearly 3,000 lawmakers a day after the Chinese government announced the biggest increase in its military budget in recent years.

Spending in 2007 will rise 17.8 percent from last year to 350.9 billion yuan (about 45 billion dollars), it said.

DOJ_NMG_0140754

Reunification with Taiwan is one of China's long-term objectives, and analysts have said Beijing is beefing up its military partly to enable it to take the island back by force if necessary.

China and Taiwan have been separated since the end of a civil war in 1949, but Beijing considers the island a renegade province.

"Taiwan is our territory. Just look at history. Why can't we take Taiwan back?" said Tan Naida, a delegate from the National Defense University.

Since the beginning of the decade, Taiwan has been ruled by independence-leaning President Chen Shui-bian, exacerbating fears in Beijing that the island could break away for good.

At the US State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack coupled a warning against any steps that would "destabilize the status quo" with strong criticism of Chen's recent pledge to push for Taiwan independence as "unhelpful."

"We believe that any action that would destabilize the status quo or threaten that status quo are not helpful and we would like the parties to refrain from such activities," he said.

"As it is well-established, the US does not support independence for Taiwan," he said.

On Sunday Chen told a group of Taiwan independence advocates that "Taiwan wants independence, Taiwan wants to change its name, Taiwan wants a new constitution, Taiwan wants development."

Such rhetoric in the past has angered Beijing, and raised concerns in the United States, which has pledged to protect Taiwan from Chinese military aggression.

The comments from Washington came nearly two weeks after US Vice President Dick Cheney said that China's military build-up and recent test of a satellite-killing weapon were "not consistent with China's stated goal of a 'peaceful rise.'"

And US Defense Secretary Robert Gates has also recently expressed concern, saying late last month that he suspected that "the Chinese are spending more on their military than what will be reflected in the state budget."

Taking Stock In China (WSJ)

By Fang Xinghai

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Last week the Shanghai Stock Exchange's Composite Index unexpectedly dropped 8.84%, the largest one-day decline in 10 years. Surprisingly, to those of us inside China, leading stock markets around the world followed the drop. In same-day trading in New York, the Dow Jones Industrial Average tumbled 3.29% and the NASDAQ 3.86% -- their sharpest falls since 9/11. While China's trade and production have a big global impact, the sell-off in the SSECI is a watershed event that marks the beginning of the integration of China's financial markets into the wider world.

The sell-off itself was most likely just a natural burst of volatility in a richly valued market, not a sign of the Chinese economy's direction, and the global markets perhaps overreacted. Still, the event demonstrates how interconnected the world has become, and why every country should manage its affairs to avoid unnecessary disturbances to the rest of the world.

So how can China avoid excessive stock-market swings? In an earlier era, the government would cool an overheated stock market by issuing warnings and taking administrative measures such as forbidding certain funds from investing in stocks. But China now boasts a trillion-dollar-plus market with a market capitalization equal to 45% of Chinese GDP.

Were the government to intervene now as it did before, it would likely cause unnecessarily large volatilities, with serious results for the economy. And in an era of rapid change, it is far more difficult now to know whether the market is actually "overheating." Government intervention will most likely either stunt an otherwise healthy, growing market or come so late that the damage is already unavoidable.

A better alternative than government intervention to ensure the smooth functioning of China's stock market is to build in a self-adjusting mechanism. The first step is to continue to strengthen China's institutional investor base.

According to the latest figures from the Shanghai Stock Exchange, institutional investors already own close to 40% of its floating market capitalization. But that's not enough. Since most individual investors have little idea how to value stocks, they tend to bid up prices too high in a bull market and drive them down too low in a bear market. Institutions can value stocks far better and can, over the medium- to long-term, align prices much more closely with the fundamentals.

That's why China should approve more new mutual funds, increase quotas under the Qualified Foreign Institutional Investor scheme so more overseas institutions can enter the market, and allow more insurance and pension money to be invested in stocks. And yes, hedge funds should be legalized.

The second step is to introduce short-selling and stock-index futures. Without a short-selling mechanism investors can only make money when the market goes up. That puts a huge bias on bullish comments and trading behavior. It would help to create more balanced views and trading patterns if investors could make money even in a declining market.

The technical preparations for both steps are already done. But their implementation has been delayed repeatedly for the sake of waiting for the "proper time." When the market was rising last fall, it was feared that allowing stock shorting would kill a nascent bull market. So reforms were delayed until January 2007. After entering the new year, the market rose further and the SSECI quickly closed in on the 3000 level -- and it was feared this time that introducing short-selling would cause big drops in the market. This is another classical example of how opportunities are lost when government is put in charge of making this kind of market decision.

A third step is to loosen government control on initial public offerings. It has long been the practice in China to pace IPOs carefully in order to drive up the market. But this often leads to a supply shortage of new shares and elevates IPO prices, which tends to enhance the overall market price-to-earnings ratio. Already, many IPOs are priced at more than 30 times earnings. The natural stock price adjustment through supply and demand is thus hindered. It's time to introduce an IPO process where the pace is set by the market, not dictated by the government.

Lastly, China's Qualified Domestic Institutional Investor program -- the primary vehicle for Chinese investors to invest overseas via mutual funds -- should be expanded. So far a total of $14 billion in international investing quotas have been distributed among participating institutions, but less than half that amount has been taken up by investors. That's because under current regulations QDII funds largely can only invest in overseas fixed-income products. The lower returns on these investments, and the appreciating Chinese currency, encourage people to keep their money at home.

If the investment scope of the QDII program is expanded to include stocks, investors surely will be more enthusiastic, given the increasingly large price gap between domestic and overseas shares. For example, securities firms are trading at 40 times earnings in China, whereas in overseas markets the best international securities firms are trading at less than 15 times earnings. Given a free choice, many domestic investors would opt for international firms. Some argue that Chinese institutions don't yet know how to invest in overseas stocks. But this can be solved by linking up with international money managers.

Compared with the last bull market from 1999 to 2001, China's institutional investors are far stronger, and this gives us some hope that the current bull run can last longer. However, the majority of investors are still individuals -- and more and more first-time stock investors are getting into the market. Given the huge amount of savings and low interest rates (among other factors) in China, there is good reason to believe that the market can still go too high unless steps are taken to increase market flexibility.

The market is now too big and complex for any able government agency to fine-tune and engineer a soft landing. The government is better advised to improve the market and rely more on its inner mechanisms than on its own ability to intervene.

Mr. Fang is deputy director for financial services in the Shanghai Metropolitan Government, and was deputy chief executive of the Shanghai Stock Exchange from 2001 to 2005. The views expressed here are his own.

Mixed Ruling On Genocide Still Puts Pressure On Serbia (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

THE HAGUE, March 2 — The recent ruling by the United Nations' highest court that found fault with Serbia under the Genocide Convention complicates Serbia's diplomatic rehabilitation, several legal experts said.

They said the decision by the International Court of Justice would bind diplomats of the European Union and NATO, whose ties with Serbia have been growing. That is so, the experts said, even though the court did not find that Serbia was directly responsible for the genocide of close to 8,000 Bosnian Muslims in 1995, but found that it "could and should" have prevented the killings as the Genocide Convention requires.

"Holding Serbia in violation of the Genocide Convention creates new pressures," said Antonio Cassese, a former president of the war crimes tribunal in The Hague and now a law professor in Italy. "There is great moral weight attached to this. It can pose all sorts of obstacles for Belgrade, unless it acts quickly and makes arrests" of the key war crimes suspects who have long been at large, though they are charged with genocide.

The judges ordered Serbia to hand over not only "individuals accused of genocide," but also those accused of other crimes whose trials are pending at the United Nations tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, in The Hague.

The tribunal's chief prosecutor, Carla Del Ponte, immediately sent a letter to the 27-nation European Union about the decision.

In their ruling on Feb. 26, the 15 judges of what is often called the World Court said that by failing to hand over individuals accused of genocide, notably the Bosnian Serb leaders Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic, Serbia was violating the 1948 Genocide Convention, which requires the arrest and punishment of perpetrators.

Legal experts said the ruling had important effects reaching beyond Serbia, because any country sheltering Mr. Mladic or Mr. Karadzic would now be considered in violation of the convention.

"This is a huge issue with other international repercussions," said David Scheffer, a law professor at Northwestern University in Chicago. "It confirms that all states have an obligation" to take action against people accused of genocide, he said, "and part of that is apprehending them."

The decision will affect other fugitives, he said, such as those accused in the Rwanda genocide who are in hiding or on the run from the United Nations Rwanda tribunal. Other lawyers said it may have an application in the violence in Darfur, which the United States has called genocide.

The ruling came in response to a civil lawsuit that Bosnia had brought against Serbia, the first time one nation sued another over claims of genocide. It was the most complex case in the 60-year history of the court, which the United Nations set up to rule on disputes between nations. The tribunals for Yugoslavia and Rwanda, in contrast, are criminal courts trying individuals.

The judges ruled that Bosnian Serb troops committed genocide against Muslims in 1995 in Srebrenica. Serbia's links with the Bosnian Serb troops were close and firmly established, the court said, but it ruled 13 to 2 that it did not have proof to justify finding Serbia directly liable for genocide.

The majority nonetheless faulted Serbia for not using its considerable influence to prevent the genocide.

The findings, variously described by international law experts as timid, ambiguous or a tactful compromise, have caused anger in Bosnia and relief in Serbia, which was absolved of having to pay the war reparations that Bosnia had demanded. Bosnian Muslims, who were a majority of the victims of the 1992-1995 war driven by Serbia, called the ruling a disgrace. Serbs in Bosnia expressed anguish at seeing their forces explicitly accused of genocide.

At the same time, the court strengthened the hand of Ms. Del Ponte, the chief prosecutor of the Yugoslavia war crimes tribunal, who has unceasingly called for the arrest of Mr. Mladic, Mr. Karadzic and three other Bosnian Serb leaders.

On Thursday, the prosecutor sent a letter to Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, who currently holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, referring to the court decisions. She asked Germany to ensured that the union did not resume talks about closer ties with Belgrade.

"I have strong evidence that Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic remain in Serbia, under protection," the letter said. It was the task of the European Union "to keep up the pressure" on Serbia to deliver its five remaining fugitives, she wrote.

In the past, the European Union has been firm in saying it could not start membership talks with Serbia until it hands over the fugitives, but recently a number of countries, including Britain, Italy and Spain, have favored a more flexible attitude. They say membership talks would support the moderates in the Belgrade government and that Serbia's cooperation is needed to resolve the future status of its province, Kosovo. Last year, NATO invited Serbia to join its Partnership for Peace venture.

The prosecutor is known to fear that the tribunal, whose mandate ends in 2010, may close down before trying the fugitives.

Joël Hubrecht, a researcher at the Institute for Advanced Legal Studies in Paris, said Serbia, having ignored calls from the Security Council for the fugitives, may also ignore the World Court.

DOJ_NMG_0140757

Still, the ruling associates Serbia's present government with the scourge of genocide, even if it happened under the past government of Slobodan Milosevic.

"It is not just the Milosevic regime that was held in violation; the new Serbia is now held in violation as well," said Phon van den Biesen, a Dutch lawyer and a leader of the Bosnian legal team. "Until it corrects this by making arrests, this is bound to have an adverse effect on decisions around Europe, and in the European Parliament."

Mr. Scheffer of Northwestern agreed. "There is no question Serbia has been stigmatized," he said. "It's going to be a challenge for the government to deal with that."

What part of "Japanese Army sex slaves" does Japan's prime minister, Shinzo Abe, have so much trouble understanding and apologizing for?

The underlying facts have long been beyond serious dispute. During World War II, Japan's Army set up sites where women rounded up from Japanese colonies like Korea were expected to deliver sexual services to Japan's soldiers.

These were not commercial brothels. Force, explicit and implicit, was used in recruiting these women. What went on in them was serial rape, not prostitution. The Japanese Army's involvement is documented in the government's own defense files. A senior Tokyo official more or less apologized for this horrific crime in 1993. The unofficial fund set up to compensate victims is set to close down this month.

And Mr. Abe wants the issue to end there. Last week, he claimed that there was no evidence that the victims had been coerced. Yesterday, he grudgingly acknowledged the 1993 quasi apology, but only as part of a pre-emptive declaration that his government would reject the call, now pending in the United States Congress, for an official apology. America isn't the only country interested in seeing Japan belatedly accept full responsibility. Korea and China are also infuriated by years of Japanese equivocations over the issue.

Mr. Abe seems less concerned with repairing Japan's sullied international reputation than with appealing to a large right-wing faction within his Liberal Democratic Party that insists that the whole shameful episode was a case of healthy private enterprise. One ruling party lawmaker, in his misplaced zeal to exculpate the Army, even suggested the offensive analogy of a college that outsourced its cafeteria to a private firm.

Japan is only dishonored by such efforts to contort the truth.

The 1993 statement needs to be expanded upon, not whittled down. Parliament should issue a frank apology and provide generous official compensation to the surviving victims. It is time for Japan's politicians — starting with Mr. Abe — to recognize that the first step toward overcoming a shameful past is acknowledging it.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Privacy Board Clears U.S. Spy Programs (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0140761

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 6, 2007

A White House privacy board is giving its stamp of approval to two of the Bush administration's controversial surveillance programs — electronic eavesdropping and financial tracking — and says they do not violate citizens' civil liberties.

Democrats newly in charge of Congress quickly criticized the findings, which they said were questionable given some of the board members' close ties with the Bush administration.

"Their current findings and any additional conclusions they reach will be taken with a grain of salt until they become fully independent," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee.

After operating mostly in secret for a year, the five-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Board is preparing to release its first report to Congress next week.

The report finds that both the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program and the Treasury Department's monitoring of international banking transactions have sufficient privacy protections, three board members told The Associated Press in telephone interviews.

Both programs have multiple layers of review before sensitive information is accessed, they said.

"We looked at the program, we visited NSA and met with the top people all the way down to those doing the hands-on work," said Carol Dinkins, a Houston lawyer and former Reagan administration assistant attorney general who chairs the board.

"The program is structured and implemented in a way that is properly protective and attentive to civil liberties," she said.

Some board members were troubled by the Homeland Security Department's error-ridden no-fly lists, which critics say use subjective or inconclusive data to flag suspect travelers.

One area the board will focus on in its report is the computerized anti-terrorism screening system recently announced by DHS and used for years without travelers' knowledge to assign risk assessments to millions of Americans who fly abroad.

"That's a place where there's a lot of opportunity for improvement," Dinkins said.

Lanny Davis, a former Clinton White House counsel and the lone Democrat on the panel, described the board's first report to Congress as modest. He said most of the work in the past year was spent being briefed on the administration's surveillance programs.

"We felt reassured regarding the checks-and-balance concerns," Davis said. He said that after several classified briefings, members were impressed by the multiple layers of review, which included audit trails to track whoever has access to the data.

Still, Davis said he anticipated the board will continue to monitor the program as needed. "It would be a mistake if that was the end of the review," he said.

The board's initial findings come as Congress is moving forward on measures to give the board more authority and make it more independent of the president. Created in late 2004, the panel was established as a compromise between Congress and the White House after a recommendation by the Sept. 11 commission.

Both conservative and liberal civil liberties groups have urged the members to aggressively review the eavesdropping program and have questioned whether board members would stand up to the president if he were flouting the law.

In recent weeks, the administration has agreed to let a secret but independent panel of judges oversee the program. But many lawmakers and civil libertarians have remained skeptical about its legality, and the Justice Department's inspector general is investigating whether the agency used any of the information improperly.

The warrantless program monitors phone calls and e-mails between the United States and other countries that are suspected to be linked to agents of al-Qaida. A federal judge in Detroit last August declared the program unconstitutional. Government attorneys have since asked a Cincinnati-based appeals court to dismiss the lawsuit, arguing the case is moot because the surveillance is now monitored by a secret court.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, called it absurd that the White House board effectively gave the eavesdropping program its stamp of approval even before the administration was forced to backtrack and submit it to court oversight.

"I have no confidence in the current board in its ability to provide meaningful evaluation of important programs such as the no-fly lists, based on its work on the domestic surveillance program," he said. "It is critical that Congress make the civil liberties board independent of the executive branch."

The board does not have subpoena power, and the White House can change its annual reports before they go to Congress. The members serve at the pleasure of Bush, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has final say over whether officials must comply with the board's recommendations.

Separate House and Senate measures would require that the entire board — not just the chairman and vice chairman — be confirmed by the Senate.

The House version would also remove the board from the executive office of the president but keep it within the executive branch and give it subpoena power. The Senate version would keep the board within the executive office and allow it to ask the attorney general to issue subpoenas, with notice to Congress required if a subpoena request was refused or modified.

The privacy board members declined to comment on the proposed legislation. But they have made it clear they believe the board works effectively in its current structure and that it could alienate the president if members took on a more openly adversarial role.

Bush appointed Dinkins, a Republican, to chair the board. A longtime friend of the Bush family, she was treasurer of Bush's first campaign for governor of Texas, and she is a longtime partner in the law firm of Vinson & Elkins, where Gonzales was once a partner.

Experts Want New Definition Of Torture (AP)

By William J. Kole, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 6, 2007

Prisoners who endure poor or degrading treatment suffer much of the same long-term psychological distress as do captives who are tortured, suggests a study published Monday.

The study was based on interviews with victims of ill treatment and torture while imprisoned in the former Yugoslavia, and experts said the findings underscored the need for a broader definition of torture.

"What is the basis for the distinction between torture and other cruel and degrading treatment? Science should inform this debate," the study's lead author, Metin Basoglu of the Institute of Psychiatry at King's College in London, told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. The study was published in the Archives of General Psychiatry.

Steve H. Miles of the University of Minnesota's Center for Bioethics, who was not involved in the study, said the findings "show that the severity of long-lasting adverse mental effects is unrelated to whether the torture or degrading treatment is physical or psychological."

"The wrongness of these inflicted harms is compounded by the fact that most abused prisoners, including those in the present war on terror, are innocent or ignorant of terrorist activities," Miles said.

The Bush administration has said the U.S. uses legal interrogation techniques — not torture — to gain information that could head off terror attacks. It insists that the U.S. complies with the U.N. Convention Against Torture.

Yet Washington's definition of torture, as interpreted by the U.S. Justice Department after reports of American abuses at Guantanamo Bay and in Iraq and Afghanistan surfaced, is fairly narrow.

It excludes mental pain and suffering created by acts that do not cause severe physical pain, such as blindfolding, hooding, forced nudity, isolation and deprivation of sleep or light, the researchers said, citing a Dec. 30, 2004, Justice Department memo. The document also contends that for an act to be considered torture, there must be proof that it inflicts "prolonged mental harm."

"The implications of such a narrow definition of torture have raised serious concerns in the human rights community," said the study. "These findings suggest that physical pain per se is not the most important determinant of traumatic stress in survivors of torture."

The study involved interviews with 279 victims who suffered ill treatment and torture while imprisoned in the 1990s in the former Yugoslavia.

The researchers said they found that aggressive interrogation techniques, humiliating treatment, verbal abuse, threats against a captive's family and being forced to watch an acquaintance being tortured produced much of the same long-term mental trauma as physical torture.

"Sham executions, witnessing torture of close ones, threats of rape, fondling of genitals and isolation were associated with at least as much if not more distress than some of the physical torture stressors," they wrote.

Such experiences were just as likely as physical torture to lead to depression or post-traumatic stress disorder, the study said.

"Ill treatment during captivity ... does not seem to be substantially different from physical torture in terms of the severity of mental suffering they cause," it concluded. "These procedures do amount to torture, thereby lending support to their prohibition by international law."

Shukrije Gashi, a pro-independence activist in Kosovo, was jailed by Yugoslav authorities in 1983 and spent nearly two years as a political prisoner. Strictly speaking, she wasn't tortured, but 2 1/2 decades later it still feels that way, she says.

Gashi was confined to a cramped, unventilated cell and fed small rations of often-rotten food. Allowed to shower just once a month, she endured frequent beatings and verbal abuse.

Today, she still trembles whenever she sees the police. Her ordeal, she says, is "a spiritual burden that stays with you forever."

Gashi copes by writing poetry and running a center for conflict management.

But 24 years later, she still can't erase the indelible memories of what she endured.

"The treatment in prison was horrific," she said. "I remain psychologically burdened. Memories of the violence follow me like a shadow."

US Has No Case For Redefining Torture: Study (AFP)

By Louise Daly

AFP, March 6, 2007

US government attempts to redefine torture are flawed, a new study argued Monday, as psychological torture can inflict the same kind of long term damage on victims as physical torture.

The investigators said their findings undermine moves by the US government to narrow its definition of torture in order to free interrogators to use certain psychological methods aimed at breaking a prisoner's resistance.

"The distinction between torture and degrading treatment is not only useless, but also dangerous," said Steven Miles, professor of bioethics at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, in an accompanying editorial in the journal of the Archives of General Psychiatry.

Researchers who evaluated the mental health of soldiers and civilians tortured during the 1990s Balkan wars found that victims of psychological abuse were just as likely to suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and depression as victims of classic physical torture methods.

The researchers also reported that the torture victims rated some techniques such as stress positions, isolation, sleep deprivation and blindfolding as distressing as most physical torture methods.

"Ill treatment during captivity, such as psychological manipulations, humiliating treatment, and forced stress positions, does not seem to be substantially different from physical torture in terms of the severity of mental suffering they cause," the study's authors wrote.

"Thus, these procedures do amount to torture, thereby lending support to their prohibition by international law," they wrote in the journal.

In 2003, lawyers for the US Justice Department and a Pentagon working group report on detainee interrogations made the case for a narrow definition of torture that excludes procedures such as blindfolding and hooding, forced nudity, isolation and other psychological manipulations.

The Justice Department memorandum argued that the scope of the term torture should be limited to those acts which could be shown to result in "prolonged mental harm," according to the study.

The development followed allegations of human rights abuses at US detention facilities in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

However, the authors of this paper said that based on their analysis of the experiences of torture victims from the modern Balkans conflict, the US appears to be drawing a distinction without a difference.

They said their analysis of 279 Bosnian, Croatian and Serb torture survivors showed that the individuals who suffered psychological abuse had the same rates of depression, PTSD, and social and work-related problems as others who had endured beatings, burnings, sexual abuse and other forms of physical punishment at the hands of their captors.

They suggested that the trauma is the same, because regardless of the form of aggression, the effect is to create fear or anxiety in the detainee while at the same time removing any form of control from the person in order to create a state of total helplessness.

The study was written by Metin Basoglu, head of trauma studies at the Institute of Psychiatry, King's College, London, with help from colleagues at the department of psychiatry at the Clinical Hospital Zvezdara in Belgrade.

Guantanamo Detainees Ask Supreme Court To Guarantee Legal Rights (AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0140764

AP, March 6, 2007

Lawyers for Guantanamo detainees held more than five years without charges asked the Supreme Court Monday to step in a third time to guarantee that they can challenge their confinement in U.S. courts.

The detainees want the justices to hear their case and issue a decision before the Court ends its term in early summer.

"Not only are these questions of paramount legal importance, but the extreme and worsening plight of the Guantanamo detainees make them questions of great humanitarian urgency as well," lawyers for the detainees wrote in court papers urging the justices to decide the case.

The Court has twice ruled that foreigners imprisoned at the U.S. naval base in Cuba can pursue their cases in American courts, rejecting Bush administration arguments.

The latest Supreme Court appeal follows a federal appeals court ruling last month that limited detainees' legal rights. The 2-1 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld a key provision of the Military Commissions Act, which President George W. Bush pushed through Congress last year to set up a Defense Department system to prosecute terrorism suspects. Now, detainees must prove to three-officer military panels that they don't pose a terror threat.

Separately, the justices said they would not grant quick review in the cases of two other Guantanamo detainees who have been designated by the Pentagon to face criminal charges in front of a military tribunal.

Salim Ahmed Hamdan of Yemen and Omar Khadr, a Canadian, wanted a high court ruling before their military trials take place, possibly as early as this summer.

If the Court agrees to hear the other detainee cases on a fast track, arguments could be held May 7, the detainees lawyers said. The justices could render a decision by the customary end of their term in late June.

The administration does not oppose expedited consideration of the appeals, the lawyers said.

The island prison at the U.S. Navy base on land leased from Cuba has become a rallying cry for international and domestic criticism of administration policy.

Some of the nearly 400 prisoners have been at Guantanamo since the detention facility opened more than five years ago -- after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. A number of detainees have committed suicide.

The administration has argued that legal protections do not apply to foreigners outside American territory and that the Guantanamo prison is beyond the reach of U.S. civilian courts.

Hundreds of people suspected of ties to al-Qaida and the Taliban -- including some teenagers -- had been swept up by the U.S. military and secretly shipped there beginning in 2002.

Many of the detainees were the innocent victims of Afghan and Pakistani bounty hunters who sold them to U.S. forces, lawyers for the detainees have said.

Democrats who took over the House of Representatives and Senate in the elections in November have vowed to rewrite the 2006 law that swept away the detainees' access to U.S. courts. It was enacted by the then-Republican-controlled Congress at the request of the White House.

The Supreme Court has twice thwarted the administration's efforts to keep the detainees out of the courts.

The Bush administration has reacted to each of the two previous rebuffs by undertaking remedial measures.

In 2004, the justices ruled that the courts can hear the detainees' cases, saying that prisoners under U.S. control have access to civilian courts, no matter where they are being held.

In 2006, the justices ruled that Bush's plan for military war crimes trials, planned for a small number of Guantanamo Bay detainees, is illegal under U.S. and international law. The justices also said a law that Congress passed in 2005 to limit federal court lawsuits by Guantanamo detainees did not apply to pending cases.

After the Supreme Court ruling in 2004, the Pentagon set up panels that reviewed whether each of the detainees had been correctly categorized as an enemy combatant and, therefore, not entitled to any legal rights.

After the justices' ruling in 2006, Congress at the urging of the White House enacted the law that blocked detainees from coming into U.S. courts.

Guantanamo Intimidation (WP)

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

CULLY STIMSON may be gone from the Pentagon, but his spirit unfortunately lives on. Mr. Stimson, you may recall, was the Pentagon official in charge of Guantanamo Bay prisoners who had to leave his post after suggesting that private law firms shouldn't be representing detainees. Now the Pentagon's chief Guantanamo prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, has gotten into the attack-the-defense-lawyers act, this time complaining about the conduct of a military lawyer assigned to defend Australian David Hicks, who has been accused of terrorism. Mr. Hicks, who has spent five years at Guantanamo after allegedly being caught fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan, was charged last week with providing material support for terrorism and is to face trial before a military commission.

Mr. Hicks's outspoken military lawyer, Marine Maj. Michael Mori, has spent a good deal of time in Australia helping stir up public support for his client, and he has been unsparing in his criticism of the military tribunals, going so far as to call them kangaroo courts. His needling clearly is getting under the prosecution's skin. "Certainly in the U.S. it would not be tolerated having a U.S. Marine in uniform actively inserting himself into the political process. It is very disappointing to see that happening in Australia, and if that was any of my prosecutors, they would be held accountable," Col. Davis was quoted as telling The Australian newspaper. Col. Davis, though he later said he wasn't suggesting a court-martial, noted that it is a crime under military law for an officer to use "contemptuous words" about high public officials.

Col. Davis's unsubtle effort to quiet Maj. Mori may be even more disturbing than Mr. Stimson's remarks: It's not likely that private law firms are going to be intimidated out of representing their clients, but military lawyers who have to fear for their careers might think twice before zealously representing their clients. "Recent statements attributed to both the defense and prosecution in the David Hicks case do not reflect the views of the Department of Defense," Pentagon press officer Cynthia O. Smith told us when we called for comment. Okay, but it's the prosecution that really needs reining in.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York Officials Urge Renewal Of Federal Terrorism Insurance (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

New York officials urged Congress yesterday to renew a terrorism insurance program set to expire at the end of this year that they said allowed the city's economy to recover and grow in the years after the Sept. 11 terror attack.

The program, created by the Terrorism Risk Insurance Act in 2002 and extended in 2005, was devised when insurers began excluding terrorism from their property policies after Sept. 11, 2001. Under its terms, the federal government would pay most of the cost of losses from a foreign terror attack, up to a total of $100 billion a year. In seeking its renewal, the officials told the House Subcommittee on Capital Markets, Insurance and Government Sponsored Enterprises at a hearing in Manhattan that without it, the city's robust development engine could sputter to a halt.

Senator Charles E. Schumer told the panel gathered at City Hall that the cycle of pending expiration and renewal had created a damaging "fear pattern" among insurers, and he argued that the program should be made permanent or at least cover the next 15 years.

"The closer we get to the expiration, the fewer projects are planned," said Mr. Schumer, Democrat of New York.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg also spoke in support of continuing the program, saying it was crucial to the city's overall economic health.

"Without a doubt, the federal government's terrorism insurance program has been a critical part of New York City's revival and is giving businesses the confidence to move forward with exciting new projects," he said. "But without terrorism risk insurance, none of them would ever get off the ground."

The officials also urged lawmakers to extend the program to cover domestic terrorism and to take into account the possibility of nuclear, biological, chemical and radiological attacks.

Critics have argued that the act was an unneeded gift to the insurance industry and has weakened the marketplace by encouraging insurers to depend on it.

But Eric R. Dinallo, acting superintendent of the State Insurance Department, said that the program helped correct a market dynamic in which insurers would avoid offering coverage, or offer it only at astronomical prices to cover all possible outcomes of unpredictable acts.

Referring to the federal program, Mr. Dinallo said it "doesn't replace the private sector" but "makes private-sector involvement possible."

United States Representative Carolyn B. Maloney, a Democrat who represents parts of Manhattan and Queens and who had requested the hearing in New York, echoed that sentiment. She called the act "an essential tool for providing economic security following a terrorist attack, not a bailout of the insurance industry."

FEDERAL DIARY: Union Proposal For Airport Screeners Stalls At The Gate (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, March 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140766

It's almost a replay from five years ago.

The Senate plans to vote today on whether to extend union rights to federal airport screeners, a fundamental question that confronted Congress when it created the Transportation Security Administration after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Following a contentious debate at the time, Congress left union rights to the discretion of the Bush administration, which decided collective bargaining was inappropriate for TSA workers because of national security considerations. Last month, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), brought the issue back, a sign of how the 2006 election has changed congressional priorities.

But the administration is holding firm. Yesterday, at a Senate subcommittee hearing, Kip Hawley, head of the TSA, rejected proposals by Lieberman and Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) that would provide bargaining rights for transportation security officers, popularly called security screeners.

The proposals, Hawley said, pose "a serious negative security impact."

Although unions represent law enforcement officers at the Border Patrol and the U.S. Capitol Police, Hawley said the demands placed on screeners, who work in more than 400 airports, are different than those at other agencies.

"TSA's mission requires that its officers be proactive, that TSOs constantly change what they do and where they do it," he said. "They are required to flex to different places in the airport and to meet suddenly changing security and operating needs."

Providing bargaining rights would allow unions to take grievances to outside arbitrators to review management decisions "after the fact" and "sets up a morass of wasted time that detracts from the focus on security," Hawley said.

The TSA has provided senators with a private briefing on TSA security requirements, using information that cannot be publicly disclosed, Hawley said.

After Hawley's testimony, the Senate panel heard from John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, who said Hawley's concerns were misplaced. Since 2002, AFGE has pushed for the right to bargain on behalf of the TSA employees.

Gage pointed to the union contract with the Capitol Police, which he said permits the police chief to suspend contract provisions on shift assignments, vacations and other workplace matters to meet staffing shortages or emergencies. Gage, who noted that AFGE bargains on behalf of employees at the Defense Department and other agencies with security-related work, suggested the Capitol Police contract could be a model for the TSA.

Union contracts are "bargained in the context of an agency's mission," cannot stop an agency from deploying employees and provide employees with a forum to address unfair treatment, Gage said.

"These are rights," he said. "They should not be taken away lightly."

The hearing was held by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs subcommittee on the federal workforce, chaired by Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii). He was joined at the hearing by Sens. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), John W. Warner (R-Va.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.).

Coburn suggested the hearing would not make a difference in the Senate's deliberations because the union-rights provision is on the chamber's floor in legislation dealing with unfinished recommendations from the 9/11 commission. "Doing this [hearing] after the fact says a whole lot on how the Senate operates," he said.

Last week, Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) proposed striking the Lieberman provision from the bill. McCaskill, in turn, offered a substitute that would give TSA screeners the right to collective bargaining but make it clear that they cannot strike or negotiate for higher pay.

Her amendment stipulates that screeners must follow agency orders during emergencies and "newly imminent threats." She also would prevent the use of classified or sensitive information in grievance proceedings.

Collins said yesterday that she hopes to win support for a compromise that would guarantee screeners coverage by government-wide whistle-blower protections and that would assure them the right to appeal major disciplinary actions to the Merit Systems Protection Board, an independent agency.

She hinted that her proposal would let senators put off a decision on screener union rights for a year by requiring a review of the TSA personnel system, probably by the Government Accountability Office.

Aides to President Bush have said they will recommend a veto of the bill implementing the 9/11 panel's recommendations if it includes union rights for screeners. Senate Republicans hope to sustain the veto, noting that 36 GOP senators, including Coburn and Warner, have signed a letter to Bush objecting to the union provision.

Unions Vs. Security (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

It's getting to be a full-time job keeping track of the favors that Democrats in Congress are doing for Big Labor. The latest two episodes are especially notable because they'd benefit unions at the expense of national security.

DOJ_NMG_0140767

First up is Senator Jim DeMint's (R., S.C.) proposal to bar certain convicted felons from working in ports. Members of Congress professed to be outraged last year when a few U.S. ports would have been managed by Dubai Ports World. But a far larger concern is that 750,000 workers currently have unescorted access to secure port areas, and felons are obvious recruitment targets for any number of bad actors, including terrorists.

Mr. DeMint offered this amendment last year as part of the port security legislation. Democrats unanimously consented to it on the Senate floor, only to gut it later under the cover of a House-Senate conference. This was done at the request of the International Longshore and Warehouse Union, which later bragged about its political clout.

Mr. DeMint was back trying again last week, and every Senate Democrat once again voted for his amendment. However, they also voted for a separate amendment from Hawaii's Daniel Inouye that would allow future Administrations to delete the DeMint requirements. Both amendments now go to House-Senate conference, and with Democrats in the majority it's not hard to guess which one will emerge in the final bill.

Meanwhile, Democrats also keep trying to impose collective bargaining rights for all 43,000 screeners at the Transportation Security Administration. Congress expressly denied such organizing ability when it created TSA in 2001, on the sensible grounds that union work rules would compromise security.

Screeners need to adapt to changing threats, often with random and unpredictable methods. Union rules would require negotiating over these methods with labor chiefs at each work site, meaning at every airport. By TSA's estimate, union rules would also require pulling some 8% of the work force offline to meet new management demands. This would require either closing screening lanes or adding thousands of new screeners at more cost to taxpayers.

Democrats in both the House and Senate have nonetheless tucked TSA unionization provisions into their "9/11 Commission recommendation" bills. The White House has objected, however, and 36 Republican Senators have already promised to sustain a veto. So Democrats are now falling back to Plan B, which is a "compromise" offered last week by new Missouri Senator Claire McCaskill. Under her approach, airport screeners would still be forced into collective bargaining, though the TSA head would have the right to put union rules aside in case of "emergency" or "imminent threat."

Those concepts could certainly use some fleshing out, since we thought terrorism after 9/11 was threat enough. Mr. DeMint asked on the Senate floor last week if Ms. McCaskill considered the global war on terror to be such an "emergency," and she said no -- but that a hurricane might qualify. We didn't know TSA screened for bad weather.

Mr. DeMint also asked if al Qaeda constituted an imminent threat. Ms. McCaskill largely dodged the question, noting instead that denying union rights because of "world-wide terror" was "specious reasoning." We realize that rookie Senators feel obliged to repay their supporters, but someone more senior should protect Ms. McCaskill from embarrassing herself so publicly. A vote on her amendment is expected as early as today.

All of this follows last week's largely party-line vote in the House to deny workers their long-held right to a secret ballot in organizing elections. The Democratic Presidential candidates are also falling in union line, with Senator Barack Obama recently vowing that he'll sign the secret-ballot ban if he makes it to the White House. John Sweeney and the AFL-CIO sure are getting their money's worth; voters are another story.

Repeal Real ID (USAT)

By Anthony D. Romero

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Real ID should be repealed, especially after the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) released its vague and evasive regulations last week. Rather than answer the hard questions and provide solid guidance, DHS told the states to find solutions by 2010, effectively passing the hot potato to the next administration.

Real ID's passage wasn't a true democratic process. A backroom deal attached it to a must-pass Iraq war/tsunami relief bill. No hearings. No debate. It lacks legitimacy from not having been studied, debated, considered and directly voted upon.

That democratic scrutiny would have shown that Real ID is an unfunded mandate that violates the Constitution's 10th Amendment on state powers, destroys states' dual sovereignty and consolidates every American's private information, leaving all of us far more vulnerable to identity thieves.

On privacy, DHS punted again by saying it "believes that it would be outside its authority to address this issue within this rulemaking" and encouraging the states to come up with a solution.

Real ID is not a solution that can stop terrorism. Clever and resourceful "terrorists" will always find ways to get IDs.

Twenty-three state governments so far have recognized how bad the law is and have repudiated Real ID in various legislative actions using strong terms such as repeal, prohibit, oppose, protest and delay. The federal government can't simply drop "terrorism" into dubious legislation and make us all stop thinking rationally.

Last week, DHS admitted Real ID will cost much more to implement than state legislators estimated in a comprehensive study. Instead of $11 billion, the cost to the states will range from $10.7 billion to $14.6 billion, plus individuals will have to cover an additional $7.8 billion, raising the price tag to as much as $22.4 billion.

Congress is taking credit for "solving" national security problems by forcing unachievable solutions onto states and giving them very little to do it. DHS made matters worse last week by releasing regulations that fail to address concerns about Real ID's impact on the states and constitutional rights.

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Khalid Al-Midhar and Hani Hanjour, the al-Qaeda hijackers who crashed American Airlines Flight 77 into the Pentagon, obtained the paperwork needed for their Virginia driver's licenses by paying $100 to an illegal immigrant in a convenience store parking lot. Five other 9/11 terrorists also had licenses from Virginia, although none lived there. With the fraudulently obtained IDs, the hijackers were able to rent cars and board planes to carry out their murderous plot.

As any underage drinker knows, getting a phony driver's license isn't difficult. But the stakes of tolerating fake IDs extend far beyond teenagers trying to buy beer. "For terrorists, travel documents are as important as weapons," the 9/11 Commission noted in calling for national standards to make driver's licenses more uniform and tamper-proof.

In response, Congress passed the Real ID Act in 2005, setting minimum standards for licenses and state-issued ID cards. Last week, after much delay and debate, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) issued proposed rules for implementing the law. If your state doesn't follow the rules, you won't be able to use your license as ID to get on a plane or into a federal building.

Real ID has produced much howling about the costs, the likely hassles at state motor vehicle departments and the potential threat to privacy. All are valid concerns. But the fact is that driver's licenses are the nation's principal form of ID. As long as that's the case, they need to be credible.

·It won't make the nation safer. True, there's no guarantee that the law would have stopped the 9/11 hijackers and that determined terrorists won't find a way around the new requirements. Averting terror attacks, however, requires layers of security. Credible IDs are an important layer.

·It costs too much. Motorists will have to spend an estimated $20 more, a relatively small sum for a standardized, tamper-proof license. For states, the costs are estimated at up to $14.6 billion over five years, offset by as much as $100 million in federal grants this year alone , on top of $40 million in federal aid already provided. Governors can make a case for more help, but cost-sharing arguments shouldn't stop the program from going forward.

·It violates privacy. The creation of large databases always is reason to be wary. But the new regulations don't create a national ID card or giant Big Brother-like federal database. States will still issue the licenses and retain information used to verify identity. Making an existing database more credible threatens privacy far less than many private sector data collections do.

·It forces illegal immigrants to drive without licenses or insurance. Illegal immigrants won't be able to get Real ID licenses, but states will be allowed to issue permits allowing them to drive and obtain insurance. In any event, the nation's immigration problems require a comprehensive solution in Washington; they can't be solved at state motor vehicle departments.

·It's too hasty. This is just absurd. DHS gave states until the end of 2009 to have programs in place to replace all licenses by 2013 — a sluggish 12 years after the 9/11 attacks.

Each day that driver's licenses lack credibility is a day of needless vulnerability. As DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff told Congress last month, "If we don't get it done now, someone's going to be sitting around in three or four years explaining to the next9/11 Commission why we didn't do it."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats Alter Plan To Restrict Iraq War (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Senior House Democrats, seeking to placate members of their party from Republican-leaning districts, are pushing a plan that would place restrictions on President Bush's ability to wage the war in Iraq but would allow him to waive them if he publicly justifies his position.

Under the proposal, Bush would also have to set a date to begin troop withdrawals if the Iraqi government fails to meet benchmarks aimed at stabilizing the country that the president laid out in January.

The plan is an attempt to bridge the differences between anti-war Democrats, led by Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), who have wanted to devise standards of troop readiness strict enough to force Bush to delay some deployments and bring some troops home, and Democrats wary of seeming to place restrictions on the president's role as commander in chief.

The legislative jujitsu in the backrooms of Capitol Hill underscores the difficulties the Democrats face in confronting the issue that helped them regain control of Congress -- Iraq. Democrats passed a resolution in February opposing Bush's deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, but Murtha's proposal to go a step further by restricting deployment to troops deemed to be adequately trained and equipped elicited a fierce response from Republicans, while also dividing the Democratic caucus.

The new plan would demand that Bush certify that combat troops meet the military's own standards of readiness, which are routinely ignored. The president could then waive such certifications if doing so is in "the national interest."

Democrats hope the waiver and benchmark proposals, whose details were confirmed by aides and senior Democrats close to the House Appropriations Committee and leadership, will keep the policymaking responsibilities on Bush. That should allow the committee to move forward next week with a $100 billion war spending bill.

"They're going to end up where they should have started a long time ago: You set readiness requirements, time-in-country requirements, time-in-rotation requirements as policy, then grant the president waivers and demand why it's so important for him to violate these principles," said a senior Democrat close to the Appropriations Committee. "It's all part of military regulations now. You have to elevate that to the policy of the country."

But any dilution of Murtha's original proposal is likely to infuriate the antiwar wing of the party, which wants dramatic action now. After a conference call yesterday, antiwar and labor groups all but gave up on Murtha's approach, concluding they could only support a war-funding "supplemental" bill if it contains a deadline for withdrawing troops.

Participants -- including the Service Employees International Union, MoveOn.org, Win Without War and the Iraq veterans group VoteVets -- insisted there would be more support for a straightforward approach to ending the war than the roundabout efforts Murtha champions.

"A timeline will make a vote for the supplemental a vote to end the war and a vote against it a vote for war without end," said Tom Matzzie, Washington director of MoveOn.org Political Action.

That conclusion mirrors the judgment of even some of the Democrats the proposal was meant to attract. One conservative lawmaker, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of angering Democratic leaders, dismissed Murtha's approach as "too cute by half."

Democratic leaders are not likely to embrace a straightforward legislative timetable. But they hope the adoption of the benchmarks will win over antiwar groups.

Under those benchmarks, which Bush laid out in a speech to the nation Jan. 10, the Iraqi government would have to take responsibility for security in all of Iraq's provinces by November, and adopt and implement oil-revenue-sharing legislation. The government would also have to spend $10 billion of Iraq's money on job-creating reconstruction and infrastructure projects; hold new provincial elections this year; liberalize laws that purged Baath Party members from the government; and establish a fairer process for amending the Iraqi constitution.

If those benchmarks are not met, Democrats would demand Bush submit to Congress a timetable for withdrawing troops, leadership aides said. The idea is to force Bush to abide by his own promises but to make sure he remains responsible for conducting and ending the war.

In the Senate, Democratic leaders are drafting a resolution that would drastically narrow the scope of the military mission in Iraq to that of a support role, with the emphasis on counterterrorism activities. The effort is expected to last most of the week, with debate starting on the Senate floor as early as next week.

But unlike last month, when nonbinding language expressing opposition to Bush's troop increase plan was blocked by GOP procedural objections, Democrats this time intend to give Republicans broad latitude to offer their own Iraq-related measures. If Republicans go along, the result could be a remarkably robust and wide-open debate -- but nothing of consequence is likely to pass.

The Politico, March 6, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is facing a full-blown revolt from liberal House Democrats over the $98 billion Iraq supplemental bill, according to Democratic insiders. Anywhere between 50 to 75 Democrats are now threatening to vote against the bill because it doesn't go far enough toward ending the war, including setting a date certain for withdrawal of U.S. combat forces from Iraq, said the sources. Pelosi and Democratic leaders are expected to postpone markup of the Iraq bill in the House Appropriations Committee by at least a week in order to buy time to resolve the matter.

Liberals are unhappy with the current proposal being discussed by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) and the Democratic leadership, which would prevent President Bush from sending more troops to Iraq unless they are certified as being properly equipped, trained and rested to take on combat missions. After weeks of political attacks from Republicans, Murtha softened his original proposal so that Bush can waive the requirements, although the White House would have to report to Congress why they are issuing such waivers. The Blue Dog Coalition, a group of moderate and conservative Democrats from swing districts, also wanted Murtha to soften his proposal.

But as happens so often in politics, if you move too far in appeasing one group, you then alienate another, which is what's happening here. Liberals Dems now don't want to vote for the Iraq supplemental, with many pointing out to Pelosi and party leaders that they never have voted for one before and aren't about to start doing so now just because Democrats are in the majority. These Democrats also want to offer their own alternative proposal to cut off Iraq funding immediately as an amendment to the supplemental on the House floor, said Democratic leadership aides.

Liberals Democrats like Rep. Maxine Waters (Calif.), co-chairwoman of the Out of Iraq Caucus, want to end the war now, so they want a date certain for a withdrawal or pullout or "strategic redeployment," and they want it in the Iraq supplemental or they won't vote for it. "They figure that we won the election on a promise to end the war, and they want to live up to that promise," said a senior House Democratic lawmaker who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "It's a tough place the speaker is in right now, but we'll work all this out."

Pelosi has a bit of a problem here. If the Democratic leadership puts a date certain for withdrawal in the bill, there's a chance that enough Blue Dogs Democrats would defect and vote with Republicans, meaning the bill could down for defeat outright. While that might suit anti-war lawmakers and groups. the political consequences could be disastrous for the party. It would end the Iraq war by default since there would be no more money for combat operations, and Republicans would punish the Democrats for years over it.

But if she leaves out a date-certain withdrawal, Pelosi may lose her left, and that's her power base, both within the Democratic Caucus and the party at large. She faces a very ticklish task sorting the whole thing out, although the senior Democrat lawmaker isn't worried. Pelosi "will get everyone on board at the end of the day," the lawmaker insisted.

The House Democratic Caucus will met at 12 p.m. on Tuesday, and Iraq will be at the top of the agenda, according to Democratic sources.

Consensus Slow To Build On Iraq Supplemental (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, March 6, 2007

As House Democratic leaders continue their attempts to craft a supplemental spending bill that limits the Iraq War while continuing to fund it, both liberal and conservative Democrats signaled that they might be willing to be team players if leaders accommodate them in small ways.

As of Monday evening, the chances of committee action on a bill this week were slipping away and it was unclear whether House Democratic leaders would include language, first proposed by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), to restrict in some way the president's ability to deploy troops to Iraq unless he publicly acknowledges that he is sending troops into combat without meeting certain readiness requirements.

However, one House Democratic leadership aide indicated that the bill most likely would include a provision requiring the president to report to Congress on whether the benchmarks he set out for the Iraqi government are being met. And there were other indications Monday that House Democratic leaders were considering language requiring the president to seek Congressional approval for any military action against Iran.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) huddled with her leadership team Monday afternoon in an attempt to manage the competing forces within the party and devise a $100 billion-plus war spending bill that could be ready for floor action as early as next week.

On his way into the strategy session, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said the decision on how or whether to try to rein in the Iraq War was "a moving target, but we may come to a consensus. That's why we keep talking."

Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said he believes "that on the core pieces, we have a Caucus consensus."

He said Democrats broadly agree that any "conditionality" on the president's use of funds should be focused on getting the Iraqi government to take over many of the operations currently being performed by U.S. soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0140771

Emanuel said a majority of Democrats believe that more money should go to the war in Afghanistan because "that's where al Qaida is." In fact, several Democratic sources indicated that appropriators had decided to shift some funds from the Iraq conflict to the re-emergent terrorist elements in Afghanistan.

Emanuel also said Democrats are committed to making sure the troops "have all the funding and equipment they need."

Even if a consensus is forming, it appears less likely that the overall bill will be ready for committee action this week. Because the limitations on war funding are not the only unresolved issues in the bill, House Democratic sources said it appeared increasingly unlikely that a draft would be ready by the end of today. That means that a possible Friday markup would be out of the question, considering House rules that require three days between a bill introduction and committee consideration.

Having the committee markup next week would put a significant time crunch on House leaders, but they could always waive the three-day waiting period for bills that come out of committee and are headed for the floor, sources indicated.

Additionally, the White House threw a wrench into the works Monday by indicating that it would send up a modified request for war funds as early as today, according to The Associated Press. The AP noted that the new request likely would be about $2 billion more than the nearly $94 billion for the Iraq War requested earlier this year and would specifically fund the president's controversial plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

Still, Democratic leaders appeared to be getting a little breathing room within the Caucus on Monday, as liberal Members began indicating that the House leadership could mitigate defections from the left by allowing a vote on an amendment to require the Pentagon to use the $100 billion to withdraw troops from Iraq and not for further combat missions.

One knowledgeable House Democratic aide said members of the Progressive Caucus might be more inclined to vote for the war-funding bill if they first were allowed to vote against such funding, considering that the amendment to fund a withdrawal is almost certain to fail.

"I think you'd see more sort of accommodation," said the aide, who noted that some liberals would still end up voting against the bill. "There are a certain number of Members who've never supported a supplemental for Iraq."

The Progressive Caucus has set up its own whip operation to find out where its 71 members stand on Iraq War funding and the proposals being floated by members of the Democratic leadership, the aide said.

"We feel this is an opportunity to flex our muscles," the aide said.

Meanwhile, conservative Democrats, particularly those in the Blue Dog Coalition, may be willing to swallow some limits on the president — with a waiver — if the leadership also adopted the language of their manifesto for providing accountability for the ballooning costs of the war.

Blue Dogs have introduced a resolution that would demand periodic reports from the Defense Department inspector general and the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction on how the nearly $400 billion already appropriated for the war has been spent.

The resolution also calls for the creation of a commission to conduct ongoing studies of government contractors in Iraq, insists that war funding should be conducted through the regular appropriations process, and asks the Bush administration to condition any further U.S. "financial, military and political resources" on the Iraqi government taking over police duties in country.

While noting that the Blue Dog Coalition as a whole has not taken a position on whether to set conditions on war funds, one aide to a coalition Member said including the resolution in the supplemental would "go a long way to making [the bill] a lot more palatable."

With Republican leaders threatening to whip against the supplemental if it includes any sort of funding restrictions — even those with a presidential waiver — Democrats can afford to lose only 15 of their own on the vote or risk seeing the bill fail in a highly public House floor vote.

In the meantime, Democratic leaders cautioned that language limiting the president on Iraq was not the only issue unresolved on the bill, given that Democratic leaders decided to include additional funding for hurricane relief in the Gulf Coast, for agriculture disasters and for a shortfall in poor children's health care programs.

"It's a major piece of legislation, and there's a lot of t's to cross and i's to dot," said one senior House Democratic aide.

And details of the bill remained under wraps Monday.

"We won't be releasing any details until we have a final package, and we don't have a final package," said Kirsten Brost, spokeswoman for House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.).

Testing Time For Democrats (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

The story of the new Congress is actually two stories. Democratic leaders and their grass-roots supporters will decide in the coming days which narrative will prevail.

DOJ_NMG_0140772

In January, Democrats dominated the news, the public agenda and the Republicans. In the last weeks of February, the Republicans came back -- not by offering grand proposals but by using the limited tools they have to prove that Democrats don't have enough power, yet, to end the war in Iraq.

When they took control, Democrats looked crisp and disciplined, attributes not normally associated with their party. Speaker Nancy Pelosi's House quickly passed the Democrats' popular campaign promises, including measures on the minimum wage, stem cell research, renewable energy and reforms of the student loan and Medicare prescription drug programs.

This agenda had its skeptics, but it provided focus for a party long out of power and drew significant Republican defections, feeding a raft of "Republicans in Disarray" stories. Pelosi noted at a January news conference that so many Republicans voted for the Democratic proposals that one of her colleagues joked: "Maybe you made these bills too easy."

The Senate Democrats quickly pushed through a different version of the minimum-wage increase, and the party's leading foreign policy voices framed a critique of President Bush's Iraq policy that squared with the public's increasingly skeptical view of the war.

But recent weeks have held nothing but trouble for Democrats -- and it is odd, as one Democrat noted, that they should be on the defensive when the scandal over the treatment of wounded veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center has focused attention on yet another failed aspect of the administration's execution of the war and its aftermath.

Instead, one news story after another has highlighted differences among congressional Democrats over how to end the war. There is also the divide between the Washington party and activists at the grass roots and in the blogosphere. All of these problems are rooted in two unalterable facts: Democrats, on the basis of their thin majorities in Congress, lack the numbers to force an unwilling president to alter his course. And they are short of votes to cut off funds for the war altogether.

This week could well determine whether Democrats splinter or find a new strategy on Iraq based on the unhappy but realistic assumption that -- unless Bush suddenly opens himself to new approaches -- the fight to change course in Iraq is likely to go on all this year, and perhaps into the next.

The premise of any strategy, said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic caucus, must be that "a lot of people were overshooting the runway on what one piece of legislation could accomplish." Emanuel was referring to the effort of war critics to achieve too many of their goals all at once through the supplemental appropriations bill for Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Illinois Democrat (whose commitment to gradualism has won him some enemies in antiwar ranks) said House Democrats will attempt this week to narrow their focus to three problems they can address through the supplemental bill. They will add funds for the war in Afghanistan, to make the point that the president's proposal "misses the mark" when it comes to defeating al-Qaeda. They will place clear demands on the Iraqi government to prove its effectiveness. And they will "give the troops what they're supposed to have, whether it's training or equipment."

Among some of the staunchest congressional foes of the war, there is a growing awareness of the obstacles they face. Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), an antiwar hero, sent an important message to his allies when he said Sunday on " Meet the Press" that "we don't have the votes" to cut off funding for the war.

Murtha is expected to offer a long-promised proposal this week that would impose readiness requirements on all troops sent to Iraq. But in an attempt to pick up moderate and perhaps even Republican votes, Murtha will add a provision allowing Bush to waive the requirement -- putting the burden on the president to explain why he is sending troops into harm's way with inadequate rest and training.

Democrats and the left face a testing time. For some in the antiwar movement, failing to end the war right now is immoral. But as Murtha suggested, a short-term strategy to end the war can't work. This is a long struggle, and those engaged in it need to battle for the long term.

White House Likely To Update War Request (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, March 6, 2007

The White House is ready to ask Congress for more money for President Bush's plan — already hotly debated — to send 21,500 new combat troops into Iraq.

The move would pay for support personnel and otherwise update last month's request for the Iraq war. It probably will draw criticism from Democrats who say the Pentagon had low-balled estimates of the costs of Bush's plan for improving security in Baghdad and Anbar province.

The latest request could come as early as Tuesday, modifying last month's $93.4 billion request for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan through Sept. 30.

Though the changes may be relatively modest, they nonetheless are embarrassing to the White House and the Pentagon, which earlier dismissed criticism from lawmakers that the original $5.6 billion estimate for the troop buildup was too low.

DOJ_NMG_0140773

Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England told the Senate Budget Committee last week that about 6,000 additional support personnel — such as headquarters staff, military police, and medical personnel — would be needed to complement the 21,500 additional combat troops.

Hours after England testified, White House Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten paid a rare visit to the Capitol to press Senate GOP leaders for the additional money.

The modified request was being finalized Monday, said administration and congressional aides. In addition to the money for increased troop strength, the White House will press for more dollars to battle the Taliban's resurgence in Afghanistan and get mine-resistant vehicles.

The request probably will come to about $2 billion. It will be accompanied by equal-sized reductions to elsewhere in the larger request, which contained money for two next-generation Joint Strike Fighters and a V-22 tilt rotor aircraft.

At the same time, lawmakers have signaled they will provide an additional $3 billion to put in place the latest round of military base closings. The military base money — cut from the president's budget when Democrats pushed through a huge spending bill last month — has the strong support of the administration.

In addition to concerns about Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, Democrats say the Pentagon has underestimated the cost of the new mission. The $5.6 billion price covers deployment of combat troops through Sept. 30.

Typically, it takes 5,500 support troops for a 4,000 combat brigade, according to the Congressional Budget Office. But the Defense Department says the most recent addition of troops will require far fewer support troops because a sizable support infrastructure is in place in Baghdad and Anbar province.

Democrats are looking at the must-pass supplemental spending bill as a way of attaching their domestic initiatives. They include farm disaster aid, money for a children's health insurance program and improvements to levees around New Orleans.

Only 28% Think U.S. Will Win In Iraq (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — A new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows deepening pessimism on Iraq, even as many Americans are reluctant to limit money or troops for the war effort.

Only 28% say the United States will probably or definitely win the war, down from 35% in December and the lowest since the question was first asked in September 2005. The share of people who now call the war a mistake is 59% — the same as September 2005 and the highest level in the 58 times the question has been asked since the war began.

RESULTSComplete poll results

The poll asked about proposals circulating on Capitol Hill as Congress weighs how to exert influence on President Bush's Iraq policy. House Democrats could unveil their plans this week.

Six in 10 people said they want Congress to set a timetable to withdraw all U.S. troops by the end of 2008. Three-quarters said Congress should require that U.S. troops come home if Iraqi leaders don't keep pledges to reduce violence, and that U.S. troops have at least a year's stay in the USA between deployments to Iraq. The mandatory break is part of a plan by Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa.

At the same time, six in 10 people said they don't want Congress to deny funding for additional troops to be sent to Iraq. A slim majority, 52%, said they don't want lawmakers to revoke the authority they gave Bush in 2002 to use military force in Iraq.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., a presidential candidate and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is pushing to revoke that authority. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., another White House candidate, wants to cap troop levels in Iraq. That idea won support from 54% in the poll.

Linda Fowler, a government professor at Dartmouth College, said there's some recent evidence of a decline in violence in Baghdad, "but that doesn't seem to have penetrated the public consciousness."

Fowler said that is because of other developments such as "wrenching stories" about National Guard and Reserve troops going off on their second and third tours of duty, and the turmoil at Walter Reed Army Medical Center "reminding people that we are asking a great deal of our soldiers and not properly taking care of them."

Bush's approval rating in the new poll was 33%, while 63% disapproved of his performance. That was a slight dip from last month, when 37% approved and 59% disapproved.

The latest poll showed a partisan divide. Majorities of Democrats supported every step to limit or wind down the war. Majorities of Republicans supported only the year-long break for Guard and Reserve troops and withdrawing troops if Iraqi officials don't reduce violence.

Reviving The Vietnam War (USAT)

By Jonah Goldberg
USA Today, March 6, 2007

There's a deep irony to the Democratic Party's dilemma over Iraq. For 30 years, the party's left-wing base has reflexively proclaimed every foreign policy challenge "another Vietnam." These voices rise and fall with America's fortunes. In 1991, again in 2003 and ever since, they've insisted Iraq is Arabic for Vietnam. They also claimed that Afghanistan was Pashtun for Vietnam. There were even some who insisted Kosovo was Serbo-Croatian for Vietnam and, of course, Nicaragua, El Salvador and Grenada were each feared to be Spanish for Vietnam. Like the old saw about Eskimos having a hundred words for snow, it seemed that anyplace the United States sends troops creates a new word for Vietnam.

Indeed, two years ago — when the air was already thick with Vietnam clichés — I wrote in this space, "You get the sense that Earth could be invaded by Klingons and some editorialist would hear 'echoes of Vietnam' amidst their disruptor blasts."

So it shouldn't be as surprising as it seems to be that, lo and behold, the Democrats are behaving as if Iraq is Vietnam all over again. But it is only now dawning on the Democrats that the Vietnam War wasn't exactly their finest hour.

The Democratic pickle is exquisitely simple: In the past election, they ran as the anti-war party and promised to bring the war to a close, but, like the dog who finally catches the car fender, they're at a loss about what to do now. As Virginia's Rep. Jim Moran says of his fellow Democrats, they "want to make sure this is still President Bush's war," but the only way they can end the war is to take possession of it. The Democratic base thinks that'd be fine. But, one gets the sense, someone in the party's leadership understands that might be a problem.

The Democrats are incapable of escaping the gravitational pull of the Vietnam myths they've nurtured for decades. At the same time, the liberal memory of the Vietnam War has become so gauzy and saccharine with nostalgia that they're unprepared to grapple with the downsides of their own all-purpose analogy. All that seems to matter is proving that the Iraq war not only has been lost but must be lost, lest the Vietnam worldview be invalidated. As my colleague Rich Lowry said in regard to Pennsylvania Democrat John Murtha's effort to sneakily thwart the Bush surge: "It used to be that the war had to end because it was a failure; now it must fail so that it can end." For example, Massachusetts' Sen. Edward Kennedy ridicules the notion that a withdrawal from Iraq would have grave humanitarian costs.

"I heard the same kinds of suggestions at the time of the end of the Vietnam War," Kennedy told NBC's Tim Russert, mocking the notion that we'd have a "great bloodbath" with more than 100,000 dead. "And for those of us that were strongly opposed to the war, (we) heard those same kinds of arguments."

Yes, but those arguments were right. Our withdrawal from Vietnam did contribute to a great bloodbath. More than a half-million Vietnamese died at sea fleeing the grand peace Kennedy and his colleagues orchestrated. And more than 1.2 million Cambodians died at the hands of the Khmer Rouge, thanks to the power vacuum created by our "humanitarian" withdrawal. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., a presidential candidate, insists that a U.S. withdrawal from Iraq can't make things any worse. In 1975 he took a similar line: "The greatest gift our country can give to the Cambodian people is peace, not guns. And the best way to accomplish that goal is by ending military aid now." Someone rent Dodd a DVD of The Killing Fields.

Of course, the costs of defeat in Vietnam were hardly just humanitarian. America's loss at the hands of a small, comparatively weaker nation arguably prolonged the Cold War and has long served as an emboldening example to enemies eager to believe Uncle Sam has a glass jaw — from Saddam Hussein to Osama bin Laden.

In the wake of 9/11, Ayman al-Zawahri, bin Laden's lieutenant, warned: "O, American people, your government is leading you to a new losing war. O, U.S. people, your government was defeated in Vietnam and fled scared from Lebanon. It fled from Somalia."

The Democratic Party itself — once the leader in vigorous internationalism — has since Vietnam been perceived as fundamentally unreliable on foreign policy by many American voters. Indeed, someone in the party recognizes this, which is why Democrats are working so hard to avoid being seen as the primary authors of U.S. defeat in Iraq, the way they were perceived after the Vietnam War.

The New Yorker's George Packer wrote in 2004 that since its experience with Vietnam, "the Democratic Party has had no foreign policy." Though Democrats were eager to spout the language of liberal internationalism in the 1990s, Packer noted, the Clinton administration nonetheless "allowed a genocidal war to bleed away in the Balkans for two-and-a-half years before acting to end it."

I don't think it's fair to say the Democrats have had no foreign policy — it's more that they've had lots of them. But Packer's invocation of Clinton's intervention in the Balkans illuminates an important point. Today, liberals proudly tout the Yugoslavian campaign as nigh upon the sole proof that Democrats believe America can use its military power as a force for good. Forgotten are the anti-war left's opposition to an American empire, Clinton's circumvention of the United Nations (at least Bush had U.N. resolutions to back him up), or the ups-and-downs of public opinion. All people remember is victory.

If President Bush's surge is successful, odds are Americans will think it was all worth it. If, on the other hand, the Democrats are successful at ending the war in defeat, it's not at all clear Americans will see our loss as the unambiguous triumph Kennedy remembers in Vietnam. Nor is it clear they'll congratulate Democrats for securing a sure defeat rather than chancing a possible victory.

Bomb Hits Baghdad Book Mart (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen,

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

A suicide attacker kills 30 at the longtime haunt of the Iraqi cultured set.

BAGHDAD — For decades, the Mutanabi Street book mart was a feeding ground for Iraq's intellectuals, serving up a rich menu of history and philosophy texts, novels and biographies, and atlases and manuscripts to the Middle East's most voracious readers.

On Monday, it proved yet another rich target for a suicide bomber, who left 30 dead and 60 wounded in one more grisly attack that evaded Baghdad's security crackdown.

The bomber detonated a sedan packed with explosives while sitting in a traffic jam in the area, shattering what had been a crystalline spring day.

The explosion left shoppers and sellers screaming and crying amid burning cars, pools of blood and bodies of the dead and injured. Notebooks and stationery fluttered in the air before scattering to the ground.

The incident was the latest to underscore the difficulty faced by U.S. and Iraqi forces as they try to stem sectarian violence here, and it raised questions about how long certain factions, such as Shiite Muslim militias, would continue to comply with the new security plan before taking revenge.

Nine American soldiers were killed Monday, the military announced today.

In Salahuddin province, north of Baghdad, six American soldiers were killed by an explosion near their vehicle, the military said. It said three other soldiers were wounded in the attack on a Task Force Lightning patrol conducting combat operations.

In Diyala province, northeast of the capital, three more soldiers from the same task force were killed in a similar attack, a separate announcement said.

The nine deaths would bring the number of American military personnel killed in the Iraq theater since the conflict began in 2003 to 3,184, according to a count by icasualties.org.

Around the capital Monday, police found the bodies of 25 men who had been shot to death, a number higher than in recent days and approaching the pre-crackdown average.

Since the operation was launched Feb. 13, it has seen some success in reducing such death squad killings, which are believed to be the work of Shiite militias.

Bombings at sites where people congregate, seen by the U.S. as largely the work of Sunni Arab insurgents, continue to occur virtually every day, and so far the bolstered forces in Baghdad have been largely powerless to stop them.

"The notion of deterring attacks depends on a rational adversary who does not want to die," said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va. "If you are facing a spiritually motivated zealot who associates martyrdom with success, deterrence will not work."

Iraqi security officials and policymakers acknowledge that they face a difficult task trying to head off attacks on civilians in crowded areas, but they say the job can be done with aggressive intelligence work targeting insurgents and through technology that detects car and belt bombs, as well as through political negotiations.

"Of course, stopping the car bombs is more difficult than stopping the assassinations," said Ammar Tuma, a lawmaker with the largely Shiite Al Fadila al Islamiya party who sits on the Iraqi parliament's security committee. Still, he said, "I'm optimistic of the capability of the plan to reduce these terrorist attacks."

In recent days, U.S.-led military forces have launched long-delayed efforts to establish regular security patrols in Sadr City, a Shiite slum of Baghdad that is home to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr and the Al Mahdi militia that is loyal to him. The operation has been one of the most delicate undertakings of the new security plan because of the volatility of Sadr's followers, who have been relatively safe under the watchful eyes of the Al Mahdi. U.S. and Iraqi forces conducted operations in the district again Monday without incident.

Downtown Baghdad was another story.

DOJ_NMG_0140776

Iraqis have long held a reputation as the Middle East's bibliophiles; as an Arabic saying goes, "Egypt writes, Beirut prints and Baghdad reads." Occupying several streets of a cultural district around what had been an Ottoman Empire garrison, the Mutanabi book mart once offered virtually everything a reader could want.

But since the fall of Saddam Hussein four years ago, visitors to the mart have found it dominated by religious texts, particularly those of the majority Shiites.

"Destruction was everywhere," said Haydar Jassim, a 22-year-old who works at a nearby shoe store.

"It was rush hour at that time, and many people were preparing themselves to do their noon prayers."

Namir Abdul-Kadhum, 42, who sells stationery from a roadside kiosk, was hit in the head and eye by shrapnel and suffered a burned hand when the bomb exploded about 20 yards away. He lost consciousness and awoke at Kindi Hospital.

"As I was at my stand, I felt and heard a powerful blast," he said. "I was pushed and thrown away."

The book mart bombing was not the only audacious attack Monday.

At least six Shiite pilgrims marking the anniversary of a 7th century imam's death were killed in separate attacks, including a drive-by shooting, a suicide bombing and a roadside explosion.

"I saw the flags that the pilgrims were carrying thrown on the ground, and blood was everywhere," said Wissam Khadhum, a technician at a nearby oil refinery who saw one of the attacks, an ambush on pilgrims as they crossed Baghdad's Dora Bridge.

"I saw two men lying dead on the ground by the fire of the gunmen from the orchard areas, others injured, and some were safe," he said, adding that it appeared to be a well-coordinated attack timed for when the pilgrims had reached the center of the bridge.

Baghdad Car Bomb Kills 20 On Booksellers' Row (NYT)

By Edward Wong And Wissam A. Habeeb

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 5 — The book market along Mutanabi Street was a throwback to the Baghdad of old, the days of students browsing for texts, turbaned clerics hunting down religious tomes and cafe intellectuals debating politics over backgammon.

Somehow it survived the war, until Monday, when a powerful suicide car bomb hit the market, slicing through the heart of the capital's intellectual scene. It killed at least 20 people and wounded more than 65.

In the hours after the noontime explosion, books and stationery, some tied in charred bundles, littered the block. Plumes of black smoke billowed above ornate buildings dating to the Ottoman Empire. The storied Shahbandar cafe, where elderly writers puffed away the afternoon on water pipes, lay in ruins.

Firefighters unleashed powerful sprays of water, only to have flames reignite because the paper had been transformed into kindling.

This part of Baghdad dates back centuries, to the era when the Abbasid caliphate ruled over the Islamic world. On Monday, victims lacerated by shrapnel were carried over shards of glass to waiting ambulances.

"There are no Americans or Iraqi politicians here — there are only Iraqi intellectuals who represent themselves and their homeland, plus stationery and book dealers," said Abdul Baqi Faidhullah, 61, a poet who frequently visits the street. "Those who did this are like savage machines intent on harvesting souls and killing all bright minds."

The bombing was the latest of a half-dozen major blasts aimed at civilians in the capital in the three weeks since the Iraqi government and American military announced the start of a new Baghdad security drive. The number of gunshot killings attributed to sectarian death squads appears to have dropped as militia leaders have ordered their followers to lie low. But deadly bombings have continued with ferocity.

American officials have said they are still struggling to tamp down the bombings and intend to bring thousands of additional troops into Baghdad in the next two months.

Many of the major bombings have taken place in central Baghdad, where Iraqi Army and police checkpoints have proliferated since Feb. 14, the start of the security drive, or in neighborhoods patrolled by Americans.

A bombing on Feb. 25 at a campus of Mustansiriya University, near Mutanabi Street in central Baghdad, killed at least 40 people, many of them students of business or economics. On Feb. 18, just two days after Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki called the opening stage of the security drive a "dazzling success," two bombs ripped through a market in the New Baghdad neighborhood, where American soldiers had been on patrol just minutes earlier, killing at least 60 people.

None of those bombings have had the symbolic resonance of the one on Mutanabi Street, the embodiment of Baghdad's venerable intellectual history. Avid readers could find novels by the Egyptian writer Naguib Mahfouz and Newsweek magazines from the 1960s. Merchants often spread their wares out on the sidewalk, down the block from a building used for administration by Ottoman-era officials and, after World War I, British colonial officers.

Religious texts, particularly on Shiite ideology, began to appear after the toppling of Saddam Hussein, who had banned them from markets across Baghdad. The conversations at the Shahbandar cafe blossomed into free expressions of political opinion. The cafe became popular with foreign reporters seeking comments from Iraqi intellectuals on the changes roiling Iraqi society.

But commerce along Mutanabi Street began to decline last summer after the Iraqi government imposed a citywide curfew every Friday for security reasons, making it tough to get to Mutanabi on its traditional market day.

An Iraqi colonel on the scene on Monday said the suicide car bomb, which was loaded with gas cylinders, had left a crater more than nine feet deep in the middle of the street. At least 20 cars were set ablaze.

"Those terrorists do not represent Islam," said Wissam Arif, 45, an engineer and eager browser of the book market. "They are fighting science. They hate the light of science and scientists. Haven't they killed hundreds of prophets and intellectuals?

"Yesterday they killed the prophets and today they are killing the books. But hopefully the just, the science and the light will win. We'll be patient until we achieve victory."

There are fewer and fewer public spaces where one can retreat from the violence of Baghdad. An animal market nearby has been bombed three times. Parks where couples once embraced are now empty of life because people are afraid to leave their homes. Some renowned restaurants have shut down and reopened in Amman, Jordan, a city brimming with Iraqi refugees.

At least six people were killed and dozens wounded Monday in other bombings and shootings in Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. The police found 16 bodies in various parts of the city. Six policemen were killed in two attacks in Diyala Province, and a headless body was found in Baquba, the province's capital, police officials said. Two Iraqi Army soldiers and two gunmen were killed in a firefight east of Baquba.

In the area of Kirkuk, the contested oil city, a policeman was killed and four bodies were found at two other locations, police officials said. An Arab Shiite sheik opposed to the resettlement of Kurds into the region was kidnapped, said Ahmad Hameed al-Ubaidi, a member of an Arab political group.

An American soldier was killed and one was wounded by a roadside bomb south of Tikrit on Sunday night, the American military said.

Aides to Mr. Maliki said Monday that the government had begun an investigation of a raid by British and Iraqi troops on an Iraqi intelligence agency building in Basra.

The British military said in a statement that the raid took place on Saturday night after Iraqi special forces captured a "known terrorist" who gave information that led the troops to look for a "known death squad leader" in the building. While there, the soldiers found 30 prisoners, including one woman and two children, "many of whom showed signs of torture and abuse."

The prisoners then escaped, the British military said. "It is unclear how this occurred, though we can confirm that the Iraqi forces did not release the prisoners," the military said.

Late Sunday, Mr. Maliki's office released a statement denouncing the raid but did not address the accusations of what appeared to have been government-sanctioned torture.

In eastern Baghdad, American and Iraqi troops continued to search houses in Sadr City but met no resistance, said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, an Army spokesman. The American military has begun a push into Sadr City, home of a formidable Shiite militia, as part of the Baghdad security plan.

Bomb Shatters Baghdad's Storied Literary Street (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

BAGHDAD, Mar. 5 -- Two firemen emerged from the thick curtain of black smoke that covered the pavement on Monday, carrying a soft, shapeless corpse wrapped in a green tarpaulin.

In their path was what was left of Mutanabi Street, Baghdad's literary heart. Bookstores in ruins. Balconies torn from oatmeal-colored buildings, some still on fire. Mangled cars with cracked windshields. The sounds of weeping mingled with the smell of burned flesh, as shards of paper seemed to flutter endlessly down from the sky.

At 11:40 a.m., a car bomb exploded on this storied street, killing as many as 26 people and injuring dozens, according to police officers at the scene. It shattered an area once known for liberal ideas, an intellectual haven that in the heady days after the U.S.-led invasion pulsed with the promise of freedom.

Solemn as pallbearers, the firemen walked through the landscape of twisted metal and debris, their feet crunching shattered glass. Behind them, the tower of smoke and ash billowed above the capital. One placed the charred body on a pushcart. The other covered it with a long sheet of white paper, as if he were tucking a child into bed. As they rolled the cart up the street, a young man in a black checkered sweater and light-blue jeans ran past. Tears streamed down his face.

"Where is my family? What happened to my family?" he screamed.

For many victims, the attack brought questions about the effectiveness of a new security crackdown that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has already declared a success. Nearly three weeks after its launch, the number of violent attacks has dipped, but bombings continue to plague Baghdad.

On Monday, U.S. and Iraqi troops continued their carefully orchestrated security sweeps into the Shiite militia stronghold of Sadr City, with Iraqi forces taking a more visible role than the Americans. Meanwhile, gunmen opened fire on Shiite pilgrims, killing seven in several areas of Baghdad, police said.

"What security plan? There is no security plan," said Abu Firas al-Tai, 47, as he stared at his blue car just off Mutanabi Street. Its windows were blown out. Shrapnel had pierced the trunk.

Tai, short with round glasses, was leaving a bank after collecting his pension when the car bomb detonated. "It was a huge explosion," he said, as ambulances carrying the injured sped past. "My head and face were full of dust and ash from the burning books."

Imad Abbas, 39, a burly man with thinning hair, was in his stationery shop when he heard the explosion. Shelves and boxes fell on his head, he recalled. The electricity went off. Outside, a car burned. Then his store caught fire.

He ran upstairs to the balcony and began shouting for help. Fifteen minutes later, he was rescued by firemen. One of them placed Abbas on his back and carried him down, depositing him near a corpse covered with a blanket.

"I just returned from the dead," Abbas said.

When Saddam Hussein was in power, Mutanabi Street exuded a defiant spirit that reverberated through its bookstores and the famed Shabandar Cafe. Here, intellectuals, over cups of sweet tea, engaged in lively debates.

But in recent months, the street had become a casualty of Iraq's incessant violence. As thousands of educated Iraqis left, many of the original booksellers closed shop. Others were kidnapped or killed. Many fled the country. Checkpoints, street closings and a Friday curfew kept customers away.

Still, the street was a hive of activity in the mornings, mostly because of a brisk trade in stationery products. Abbas said he believes that's why the street was attacked.

"They want to drive down the trade of Iraq," he said of the perpetrators. "They are trying to humiliate our history and humiliate our people."

The car bomb exploded near the cafe, igniting bookstores and stationery shops. The vast amounts of paper made it difficult for firefighters to control the flames.

As the young man in bluejeans cried, a friend clutched his shoulder and took him into his home for comfort. Others watched as firefighters tried to rescue two people trapped inside a burning building.

"The roof is going to collapse," one onlooker predicted.

Ten minutes later, the young man emerged onto the street, his face a mask of anguish.

"Where is my family?" he asked no one in particular. As he watched, another fireman rolled a pushcart bearing a body, this one covered in a blue tarpaulin.

"All we do is sell books," said Amer Kasim, 38, struggling for an explanation.

Suicide Car Bomb Kills 38 In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A suicide car bomber shattered a relative lull in Baghdad's violence yesterday, killing at least 38 persons, of which seven were pilgrims, in a blast that touched off raging fires and a blizzard of bloodstained paper from a popular book market.

It was the largest bombing in the capital in three days, and came on the heels of a major push by nearly 1,200 U.S. and Iraqi troops into Sadr City, a Shi'ite militia stronghold and base for fighters loyal to radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Iraqi troops in Sadr City set up checkpoints and took a far more visible presence than Americans, who led the push into the area Sunday. The move was an apparent attempt to avoid Shi'ite anger in a place of past street battles with U.S. forces.

But pressure on Sheik al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia continued on other fronts.

In the southern city of Karbala, the home of a Mahdi Army leader was raided in a joint U.S.-Iraq operation, the U.S. military said.

DOJ_NMG_0140779

Sheik al-Sadr's followers also warned the Iraqi government that they would not relinquish Cabinet posts unless other members of the ruling coalition do the same -- setting the stage for a major political battle as Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki prepares to reshuffle his administration.

Meanwhile, a raid by British and Iraqi troops on a police intelligence headquarters in southern Iraq on Sunday found 30 prisoners with signs of torture. A purported death-squad leader was captured.

The raid took place at the National Iraqi Intelligence Agency building in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city 340 miles southeast of Baghdad. Inside, troops discovered the prisoners, including one woman and two children, with signs of torture and abuse, the British military said in a statement. It did not elaborate.

The Iraqi government criticized the raid and yesterday began an investigation.

"We have a committee that ... has started work to uncover the circumstances of the incident," said Ali al-Dabbagh, a government spokesman.

Mr. al-Maliki had ordered the inquiry a day earlier and vowed to punish "those who carried out this illegal and irresponsible act," his office said in condemning the raid. Mr. al-Maliki's statement did not mention the prisoners.

Yesterday, black smoke drifted over central Baghdad from burning shops, cars and book stalls in the mixed Sunni-Shi'ite area around Mutanabi Street along the Tigris River. At least 66 persons were wounded in the suicide blast and the death toll could rise, police said.

"Papers from the book market were floating through the air like leaflets dropped from a plane," said Naeem al-Daraji, a Health Ministry worker who was driving about 200 yards from the blast and was slightly injured by broken glass from his car window.

"Pieces of flesh and the remains of books were scattered everywhere," he said.

People began driving the injured to hospitals in private cars without waiting for ambulances to arrive. A worker at a nearby shoe store, Youssef Haider, 24, said the blast flipped burning cars with charred bodies trapped inside. He and co-workers used two-wheel pushcarts to carry away the wounded.

Sporadic car bombs and attacks have hit the capital in recent days, but none with mass casualties since a blast Friday killed at least 10 persons.

In other violence, gunmen opened fire on Shi'ite pilgrims in several places around Baghdad, killing at least seven persons, police said. The Shi'ites were apparently heading to shrines and holy sites in southern Iraq for the annual commemoration of a 40-day mourning period for the death of a revered 7th century warrior, Hussein.

The U.S. military said one American soldier was killed and another was wounded when a roadside bomb hit their convoy south of Tikrit.

38 Die, 105 Hurt In Baghdad Market Blast (AP)

By Brian Murphy,

AP, March 6, 2007

A suicide car bomber turned a venerable book market into a deadly inferno and gunmen targeted Shiite pilgrims Monday as suspected Sunni insurgents brought major bloodshed back into the lap of their main Shiite rivals. At least 38 people died in the blast and seven pilgrims were killed.

The violence — after a relative three-day lull in Baghdad — was seen as another salvo in the Sunni extremist campaign to provoke a sectarian civil war that could tear apart the Shiite-led government and erase Washington's plans for Iraq.

The Shiite Mahdi Army militia has so far resisted full-scale retaliation through a combination of self-interest and intense government pressure. But the militia's leader, the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, is now being cornered in new ways that have put him on the defensive.

An expected Cabinet reshuffle could take a serious bite out of al-Sadr's voice in government — a move strongly encouraged by Washington.

Al-Sadr also opened the door for U.S. and Iraqi troops to enter the Mahdi stronghold of Sadr City in Baghdad — under a painstaking deal with authorities — but his loyalists are still being hunted outside the capital.

"Al-Sadr and his forces could be feeling under siege," said Alireza Nourizadeh, chief researcher at the London-based Center for Arab-Iranian Studies. "That makes them less predictable. That means they are more dangerous."

One possible sign of brewing troubles was 30 bullet-ridden bodies found across Baghdad. Many of those killings are blamed on Shiite death squads, and Monday's figure was the highest in weeks.

And the Sunni extremists keep pressing.

The suicide mission tore through booksellers and other stores on narrow Mutanabi Street, a mostly Shiite-run commercial area in Baghdad's historical heart along the Tigris River.

DOJ_NMG_0140780

Within seconds, flames engulfed open-air stalls and shops brimming with books and magazines. Gas-powered generators — needed because of frequent power cuts — exploded one by one.

Bloodstained pages that escaped the fire were carried away in a wind-whipped pillar of black smoke.

Firefighters had to spray huge arches of water from blocks away because their trucks were took large for the warren of lanes in old Baghdad. At least 38 people died and 105 were injured, said Raad Jabar, a Health Ministry official.

But the final casualty count may not be clear until Tuesday. Fire crews still battled the blazes more than 12 hours after the attack, said civil defense Maj. Gen. Abdul Rasoul al-Zaidi.

"Papers from the book market were floating through the air like leaflets dropped from a plane," said Naeem al-Daraji, a Health Ministry worker who was driving about 200 yards from the blast and was slightly injured by broken glass from his car window.

"Pieces of flesh and the remains of books were scattered everywhere," he said.

A worker at a nearby shoe store, Youssef Haider, 24, said the blast flipped burning cars with charred bodies trapped inside. He and co-workers used two-wheel pushcarts for shoe boxes to carry away the wounded.

In other violence, gunmen opened fire on Shiite pilgrims in several places around Baghdad, killing at least seven people, police said.

The Shiites were apparently heading to shrines and holy sites in southern Iraq for the annual commemoration to end a 40-day mourning period for the death of a revered 7th century Shiite martyr, Imam Hussein.

It was the bloodiest day in the capital in more than a week, and came on the heels of a major push by nearly 1,200 U.S. and Iraqi troops into teeming Sadr City as part of a nearly 3-week-old security offensive across Baghdad.

The sweeps seek to drive out militants and establish permanent stations in troubled areas. Search teams also uncovered a nearly tenfold increase in hidden weapons stashes in the past week, the military said.

More than 21,000 small arms rounds were confiscated last week, up from 2,160 the previous week; 937 mortar rounds were discovered, up from 89 the week before, it said. Attacks on soldiers in some Shiite districts are also down sharply.

That's mostly because al-Sadr ordered his fighters to pull back after coming under strong government arm-twisting to allow the security plan to proceed.

In Sadr City, Iraqi troops set up checkpoints and took a far more visible role than Americans, who led the push into the area Sunday. The move was an apparent attempt to avoid Shiite anger in a place of past street battles with U.S. forces.

The troops plan to establish outposts in Sadr City that will bring together Iraqi police, military and U.S.-led forces, said U.S. Brig. Gen. Terry Wolff, who oversees training of Iraqi soldiers.

"It's about presence," he said.

But pressure on al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army continued on other fronts.

In the southern city of Karbala, the home of a Mahdi Army leader was raided in a joint U.S.-Iraqi operation, the U.S. military said.

Al-Sadr's followers also warned they would fight any Cabinet changes that would single them out.

"We will not give up our share and any of our ministerial posts under any circumstances unless all other blocs are subjected to the same procedure," said Saleh al-Ukaili, head of Sadrist faction in parliament, where the bloc controls 30 of the 275 seats.

An adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said 10 of the 39 ministry posts soon would be replaced — including five of the six ministers loyal to al-Sadr. The adviser spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not supposed to release the information.

Relations between al-Sadr and the government are already tense. Late last year, the prime minister withdrew his official protection for al-Sadr and the Mahdi Army and allowed U.S.-led forces to close in.

U.S. Narrows Financial Focus To Aid Iraqi Small Businesses (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, March 6, 2007

BAGHDAD — Mohamed Raheem saw fliers posted all over his neighborhood offering money to Iraqis who wanted to expand their small businesses.

He called a phone number listed on the flier and set up an appointment with the Iraqi-American Chamber of Commerce and Industry. "I explained to them that I have a shop and I want to expand my work," said Raheem, 44, who owns a small grocery store in the Kadhamiya district of Baghdad. He applied for a $10,000 grant.

DOJ_NMG_0140781

As U.S. military and civilian officials try to help Iraq's economy rebuild, they are placing a new emphasis on small businesses like Raheem's. Through grants and loans — often for a few hundred dollars each — they're trying to stimulate job growth and eventually improve Iraq's security.

So-called microfinance projects have proved more efficient at creating jobs than large-scale, multibillion-dollar reconstruction efforts, says Eric Nigh, executive director of the Iraqi-American Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

Large infrastructure projects, such as power plants, required enormous spending on workers' security, says Ra'ad Omar, chief executive of the chamber. He said Iraqi contractors tended to invest their profits in real estate abroad rather than reinvest them at home. Many owners of larger Iraqi companies eventually left the country because of security issues.

"The American government has learned from their mistakes in Iraq," Nigh says. "Now, instead of the big contracts with big companies, we are working on giving small grants for ordinary people."

The chamber's program, called "Najah," Arabic for "success," is funded through the U.S. Agency for International Development.

Small-business owners must match at least 25% of the grant's value with their own money and commit to hiring new employees. The grants are distributed in the form of equipment and services, such as construction, instead of cash. USAID has also offered small loans through other programs in Iraq.

Raheem says that if he receives his grant, he will hire two workers and get new refrigerators, a generator, shelves and carts. "I could bring (customers) everything they need so they do their shopping from me only," he says.

The chamber follows businesses for a year to ensure they continue to operate. Recipients have included barbers, grocers, mobile phone sellers, mechanics and cooks.

In a year, the program is projected to distribute $6 million and create about 2,000 jobs, according to the chamber.

Iraq's unemployment rate was 17.6% last year, according to a draft report released by the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. U.S. military officials hope that if more young Iraqi men have jobs, they will be less tempted to join sectarian militias.

"Security improves the economy. And improvement in economic conditions reduces dissatisfaction," says Brig. Gen. Vincent Brooks, a deputy commander of coalition forces in Baghdad. "Reducing dissatisfaction makes it more difficult for the insurgents to influence the actions of the people."

Other U.S.-sponsored economic projects include:

·Renovation of a building near Sadr City, a major stronghold of Shiite militia, that will become a trade school for young men. Armed with skills, a new army of electricians, plumbers and mechanics will go to work for themselves and "not be tempted to place IEDs (improvised explosive devices)," says Lt. Col. Bob Ruch, deputy team leader of the Baghdad Provincial Reconstruction Team.

·Changes in traffic patterns in commercial districts to make them safer from car bombing attacks.

Iraq's economy grew about 3% in 2006, according to the World Bank. Growth was flat in the oil sector, which has been damaged by insurgent attacks on pipelines and low foreign investment. The non-oil economy, composed largely of small businesses, grew 10%, the Bank said.

The biggest obstacle to economic growth continues to be security, says Frank Lavin, U.S. undersecretary of Commerce, who traveled to Iraq last month. Security expenses account for about one-third of most companies' operating budgets, he says.

For some, even the unrest in Iraq could bring business opportunities. "Because of the difficulties that people are facing, they prefer to do their shopping from just one place," said Raheem, who hopes his expanded store will offer more products. "That is what I am trying to achieve."

Fighting For Iraq's Culture (NYT)

By Matthew Bogdanos

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WITH the situation in Iraq growing seemingly graver by the day, Americans are increasingly reluctant to risk American blood to save Iraqi lives. So it's a pretty tough sell to ask people to care about a bunch of old rocks with funny writing.

But what if they understood that the plunder of Iraq's 10,000 poorly guarded archaeological sites not only deprives future generations of incomparable works of art, but also finances the insurgents? Having led the United States investigation into the looting of the Iraq National Museum in 2003, I know that millions of dollars' worth of antiquities flow out of the country each year. And it would be naïve to think the insurgents aren't getting a major share of the loot.

And what if Americans understood that our failure to appreciate the importance Iraqis place on their history has added to the chaos faced by our troops? Four years after the initial looting — and despite having recovered almost 6,000 antiquities — we cannot keep pace with the artifacts being stolen every day. This continued failure to protect an artistic heritage going back to the dawn of civilization has convinced many in Iraq and the Middle East that we do not care about any culture other than our own.

It's worth pointing out that the failure to safeguard Iraqi antiquities does not rest solely with the United States. While the United Nations and NATO took the lead in providing security for cultural artifacts in postwar situations in Bosnia, Cyprus and elsewhere, neither seems much interested in rectifying the situation in Iraq. NATO opened a training center for security officers outside Baghdad in 2005, but none of the Iraqis trained have been assigned to archaeological sites. The United Nations says that it has no mandate to train guards and that the level of violence does not permit its involvement.

So who might act? In the past, most archaeological digs in Iraq have had foreign sponsorship — the Germans at Babylon and Uruk, the British at Ur and Nimrud, the French at Kish and Lagash, the Italians at Hatra, and the Americans at Nippur. Given that background, it would make sense for each of these countries to "adopt" the sites its scholars have been studying.

Each of the foreign nations would provide guards around the perimeter and around the clock. (Obviously, this would entail getting permission from the Iraqi government and help from the American military.) Ideally, these foreign forces would also be assigned a group of Iraqi recruits to train. Once the Iraqis were mission-capable — it should take only six months or so if the Baghdad government supplied the manpower — the donor nation would recall its forces.

In this way, Mesopotamia's cultural patrimony would be safe, Al Jazeera would have to find other ways to show TV clips of Western indifference to Arab culture, and the terrorists would have to find another income source.

One challenge has been convincing European governments that providing coordinated site security would not be a statement in support of the war. But surely they could be persuaded that it would be a humanitarian effort to protect a cultural heritage rich with common ancestry that predates the splits among Kurd, Sunni Arab and Shiite.

The lesson for the United States is that we must never again cede the moral high ground on cultural issues like this one. In advance of any future military action, we should assign units the task of protecting cultural property. And all troops scheduled to deploy overseas should receive cultural awareness training; the Archaeological Institute of America has already conducted some seminars at Camp Lejeune in North Carolina.

Yes, diverting resources to save cultural artifacts during a time of war may seem like cutting funds for the police and firefighters in order to expand the public library. And my decision to expand my team's counterterrorist mission to investigate the looting of the museum was characterized by many as a distraction. But some soldiers before us have seen the wisdom of this approach. "Inevitably, in the path of our advance will be found historical monuments and cultural centers which symbolize to the world all that we are fighting to preserve," said Dwight Eisenhower just before D-Day. "It is the responsibility of every commander to protect and respect these symbols whenever possible."

9 From One Family Die In U.S. Strike Near Kabul (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall And Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 5 — Nine members of a family, including five women and three children, were killed in an American airstrike in central Afghanistan late Sunday during a battle with militants, Afghan officials said Monday.

The American military acknowledged that it dropped two 2,000-pound bombs on a compound on Sunday night, but said that it could not confirm the casualties.

The strike occurred 12 hours after American forces in eastern Afghanistan fired on civilians following a suicide car bombing next to an American convoy. The American fire killed at least 10 people and wounded 25, Afghan officials said. In response, protests on Sunday blocked the main highway in the area.

On Sunday night, American forces at a small base in Tape Ahmed Beg, in Kapisa Province, northeast of the capital, Kabul, came under rocket fire at 9 p.m., the United States military said in a statement. When two men with Kalashnikov rifles were spotted entering a compound, the Americans called an airstrike, which ended the engagement, it said.

"Coalition forces observed two men with AK-47s leaving the scene of the rocket attack and entering the compound," Lt. Col. David Accetta, a military spokesman, said in the statement. "These men knowingly endangered civilians by retreating into a populated area while conducting attacks against coalition forces."

"We did this in self-defense," said Gen. Muhammad Eiwaz Masloom, the police chief of Kapisa Province, whose men work beside Americans at the base. "The enemy of Afghanistan is trying to use different tactics to destroy the peace and stability in our area, especially in the districts of Tagab and Nejarab, and they have repeatedly attacked our bases."

He said that members of the Islamic Party, which is led by the renegade mujahedeen commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, and Taliban supporters were active in the area.

But a local representative of the provincial council, Suraya Bahadur, who comes from Nejarab district, where the bombing happened, condemned it. “I condemn both the suicide attacks and the rocket attacks by the enemy of Afghanistan, and also I condemn these type of mistakes,” by American and NATO forces, she said. “We never want our civilian people to be killed.”

John Sifton, a senior researcher at Human Rights Watch, which is based in New York, also expressed concern about the level of force. “That is heavy firepower to respond to two men, even if they have Kalashnikovs,” he said in a telephone interview. “If that version of events bears up, it would strongly suggest that the attack was disproportionate.” Mr. Sifton said insurgents also regularly violated the rules of war by using force near civilian areas.

On Monday, President Hamid Karzai condemned the killing of the civilians in eastern Afghanistan on Sunday morning. He blamed the “enemies of Afghanistan” for the suicide bombing, which “caused the American forces to fire on civilian people and demonstrators that killed 10 people.” He ordered a government delegation to the scene to investigate with the American military.

The American military, in a statement, revised its account to 8 civilians killed and 35 wounded, from 16 dead and 24 wounded, saying that the latest figures were its most accurate. A spokesman at Bagram Air Base, Sgt. Dean Welch, said that as the day progressed and after coordination with Afghan officials, the initial reports were corrected.

The statement said the military deeply regretted the loss of civilian life. “This attack put every innocent man, woman and child buying food or clothing in the bazaar at risk,” Col. John Nicholson of the United States Army said. The statement said American forces would work with the Afghan authorities to “investigate and identify those responsible.”

Nine witnesses, including five Afghans recuperating from bullet wounds in a hospital, told The Associated Press that the American forces had fired indiscriminately along at least six miles of one of eastern Afghanistan’s busiest highways — a route often filled with cars, trucks and Afghans on foot and bicycles.

The NATO secretary general, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, said in Brussels that he understood that both episodes involved American-led coalition forces rather than NATO’s forces in Afghanistan, but he said, “Every civilian casualty is one too many,” [a news agency] reported.

Mr. Sifton urged Afghanistan, NATO and coalition forces to develop protocols for troops in such cases.

9 Afghan Civilians Reported Killed In U.S. Airstrike (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 5 -- U.S. forces killed nine Afghan civilians Sunday night while bombing a house where two Taliban insurgents had taken refuge, Afghan authorities said Monday.

Sayed Mohammed Daoud Hashimi, deputy governor of Kapisa province in northeastern Afghanistan, said the insurgents fled to the house after firing rockets at a base used by the U.S.-led coalition. The house belonged to relatives of one of the fighters, and nine of them -- three children, five women and an elderly man -- were killed when U.S. forces dropped bombs on it, Hashimi said. The two Taliban members were injured in the blast but managed to escape.

U.S. military officials later acknowledged having dropped the bombs but said they could not confirm reports of civilian casualties.

The deaths followed by hours the killing of at least eight Afghan civilians outside the eastern city of Jalalabad on Sunday morning. In that incident, U.S. Marines engaged in a firefight with insurgents after their convoy was hit by a van packed with explosives, according to U.S. officials. Afghan witnesses later said the Marines fired indiscriminately at bystanders as they sped away. The deaths remain under investigation.

The incidents, while separate, underscore the challenge facing coalition forces as they confront insurgents who, according to military officials, are trying to provoke battles that lead to civilian deaths. Both the coalition and the Taliban, the Islamic militia that ruled most of the country until the U.S.-led invasion in 2001, have indicated that they are preparing for a violent spring as conditions for fighting improve.

The deaths of the civilians near Jalalabad sparked angry protests Sunday, with hundreds of people taking to the streets, throwing rocks and chanting anti-American slogans. Authorities in Jalalabad said there were no additional protests Monday and described the situation as calm.

Hashimi said that in contrast to the Jalalabad incident, the reaction to the airstrike in Kapisa was muted because local residents knew that the bombed house was being used by the Taliban.

"The people knew these men were constantly attacking security and coalition forces. The people asked them to stop, because we don't want any problems for our village," he said. "But they didn't listen to the people. They kept attacking."

The provincial police chief, Gen. Raz Mohammed, said his forces had also come under attack from the Taliban on Sunday. He called the U.S. response justified.

In a statement, the U.S. military acknowledged dropping two 2,000-pound bombs on the building where the insurgents were believed to be hiding.

"Coalition forces observed two men with AK-47s leaving the scene of the rocket attack and entering the compound," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a coalition forces spokesman. "These men knowingly endangered civilians by retreating into a populated area while conducting attacks against coalition forces."

The U.S. military said its forces suffered no injuries in the initial rocket attack. The incident was under investigation Monday night.

John Sifton, a senior researcher with Human Rights Watch, said the advocacy group was calling for independent investigations into whether U.S. forces reacted disproportionately in either incident. "The insurgents are regularly carrying out illegal attacks, but these responses are also extremely destructive," he said. "Whenever a mistake or, worse, recklessness, occurs, it sets back the effort."

Bombing Kills Nine Relatives In Afghanistan (WT/AP)

By Amir Shah

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

JABAR, Afghanistan -- A coalition air strike destroyed a mud-brick home after a rocket attack on a U.S. base, killing nine persons from four generations of an Afghan family including a 6-month-old, officials and relatives said yesterday.

It was the third report in two days of U.S. forces killing civilians. The air strike occurred late Sunday in Kapisa province north of the capital, some 12 hours after U.S. Marines reportedly opened fire on civilian cars and pedestrians after a suicide bombing in eastern Nangahar province.

In the other incident, an American convoy in the southern city of Kandahar -- where suicide attacks have become commonplace over the past year -- opened fire yesterday on a vehicle that drove too close, killing the driver, said Noor Ahmad, a Kandahar police officer who said he witnessed the shooting. A NATO spokesman said he did not have any information.

Up to 10 Afghans died in the aftermath of the Nangahar suicide attack, which wounded a U.S. Marine. President Hamid Karzai condemned the bombing, "which caused the American forces to fire on civilians," and a statement said relatives of the dead wanted the "perpetrators" brought to justice.

In both the Nangahar and Kapisa incidents, the U.S. military blamed militants for putting innocent lives in danger. A villager in Kapisa, about 50 miles northeast of the capital, confirmed the U.S. account that a rocket was first fired at the American base.

Mr. Karzai has repeatedly pleaded for Western troops to show more restraint amid concern that civilian deaths shake domestic support for the foreign military involvement that the president needs to prop up his government, which is increasingly under threat from a resurgent Taliban.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said coalition forces will always respond in self-defense when fired upon: "It is often the enemy that is putting innocent peoples' lives in danger by where they're conducting these attacks on our forces."

In the Kapisa province violence, the U.S. military said a rocket was fired at a hilltop U.S. base, prompting return fire by the coalition forces and the air strike.

Two men with automatic rifles were seen leaving the site of the rocket attack and heading into a compound that was then hit by two 2,000-pound bombs, a military statement said. Rural homes in Afghanistan are built in a compound style with one large outer wall often encasing several small rooms; many families tend to share the same compound.

"These men knowingly endangered civilians by retreating into a populated area while conducting attacks against coalition forces," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. military spokesman. "We observed the men entering a compound and that compound was targeted and hit by an air strike."

The bombs left a large crater of twisted lumber and chunks of mud and killed four women, four children between 6 months and 5 years old, and an 80-year-old man, said Gulam Nabi, a relative of the victims.

Sayad Mohammad Dawood Hashimmi, Kapisa deputy governor, confirmed the nine deaths.

Among those killed were Gulam Nabi's parents, his sister, two female relatives by marriage and four of the extended family's youngest children.

Record Opium Crop Possible In Afghanistan, U.N. Study Predicts (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 5 — Afghanistan's opium harvest could be bigger than last year's record crop, with nearly half of the provinces showing an increase in planting this year, the director of the United Nations Office for Drugs and Crime said here Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0140785

His office released an assessment of winter planting trends, which shows an increase in 15 provinces, no change in 6 provinces, and a decrease in 7 provinces. Six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces have no poppies, the study said.

Similar assessments of the size of the crop and harvest have proved accurate in the past. Afghanistan had a substantial increase of poppy cultivation last year, resulting in the highest recorded harvest, more than 6,000 tons, the drugs and crime office said.

Although some of the country is showing a decrease in poppy cultivation this year, the south, which has been plagued by the insurgency and traditionally has been the biggest source of poppies, is showing a continued increase, "which may result in an overall increase in opium poppy cultivation in 2007," the report said.

The ample rainfall and snowfall this winter would also contribute to a good harvest in 2007, it said.

"The real increase is taking place in the provinces characterized by insurgency, and the problem there is not only a narcotic problem but an insurgency problem," Antonio Maria Costa, the director of the drugs and crime office, based in Vienna, said in an interview. "The southern provinces are a textbook case of lawlessness prevailing, and therefore everybody from farmers and labs, traffickers and warlords are trying to profit from the bonanza of the product."

Lack of security has also prevented aid from reaching farmers who want to change crops, he said, which has been a major factor in other areas in persuading farmers to abandon poppy growing.

Mr. Costa said a decrease in poppy growing across a band of provinces that have been the target of such an effort was an important development. Money was provided in those areas to help farmers change crops.

"We may be able to create a corridor, or an area ranging from Pakistan in the southeast to Turkmenistan in the northwest" that is free of opium, Mr. Costa said. The strategy was, he said, "Establish a stronghold of opium-free, or provinces with a negligible amount, and then slowly regain control of the other provinces."

The intent of the big traffickers is uncertain because the huge crops last year produced a glut of opium on the world market, he said. The excess, which was worth about $1 billion, has not reached the market and depressed the price of opium, so someone is holding it for future sales, he said.

"Is it in the insurgents' hands?" he asked. "It is not under the bed of the farmers," he said, adding, "It could become a serious problem down the road."

CIA Rushing Resources To Bin Laden Hunt (ABC News)

ABC News, March 6, 2007

Armed with fresh intelligence, the CIA is moving additional man power and equipment into Pakistan in the effort to find Osama bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al Zawahri, U.S. officials tell ABC News.

"Reports that the trail has gone stone cold are not correct," said one U.S. official. "We are very much increasing our efforts there," the official said.

People familiar with the CIA operation say undercover officers with paramilitary training have been ordered into Pakistan and the area across the border with Afghanistan as part of the ramp-up.

Although never publicly acknowledged, Pakistan has permitted CIA teams to secretly operate inside Pakistan.

Pakistan officials say they are aware that CIA teams have increased their presence in northern Waziristan since last September when Pakistan withdrew its troops from the area under a much-criticized "peace deal" with tribal leaders.

Director of National Intelligence Mike McConnell testified last week that current intelligence "to the best of our knowledge" puts both bin Laden and al Zawahri in Pakistan. It was the first time a high-ranking U.S. official publicly identified Pakistan as bin Laden's hiding place.

Past intelligence has indicated that bin Laden often changed locations in March, traveling to hiding places in the mountains once the snow cover begins to melt.

DOJ:

Probe Of Prosecutor Firings Intensifies (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The probe into the Bush administration's firings of U.S. attorneys intensified Monday as lawmakers ordered two more ousted officials to tell their stories and the Justice Department said Republican Sen. Pete Domenici had complained repeatedly to the attorney general about one prosecutor.

A second lawmaker from New Mexico, GOP Rep. Heather Wilson, acknowledged that she, too, had complained to the same prosecutor about the slow pace of an investigation. Like Domenici, she denied pressuring the U.S. attorney in her state.

The administration has said eight prosecutors were told to leave, all but one for performance-related reasons. However, Democrats have suggested ever more pointedly that politics was behind many of the dismissals, and the Domenici revelation fueled that idea.

Six of those fired, meanwhile, issued a stiff defense of their conduct and implied that they had had differences with Justice Department officials in Washington.

"We leave with no regrets, because we served well and upheld the best traditions of the Department of Justice," the group said in a joint statement released in advance of a Tuesday hearing by a House subcommittee.

The Justice Department, besieged by charges of cronyism, acknowledged that lawmakers — both Republican and Democratic — had complained about several of the eight.

One, David Iglesias of New Mexico, was the subject of four phone calls from Domenici to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his deputy questioning whether the prosecutor was "up to the job," department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

It's unclear whether Iglesias was aware of the senator's calls to the Justice Department, but he knew of Domenici's interest in his work. Domenici said over the weekend that he had called the prosecutor in October 2006 to ask about the progress of a probe into an alleged Democratic kickback scheme.

Iglesias has said he received calls from two lawmakers — he has not named them publicly — who inquired about the case. He said that he felt pressured by them to rush indictments before the November elections.

Domenici has apologized for the call while denying he put any pressure on Iglesias. The Senate ethics manual advises lawmakers to refrain from speaking to court officers about specific proceedings until after they are resolved.

Wilson said Monday she contacted Iglesias but did not put pressure on him to speed up the investigation.

In a statement released to The Washington Post, Wilson said: "I did not ask about the timing of any indictments and I did not tell Mr. Iglesias what course of action I thought he should take or pressure him in any way. The conversation was brief and professional."

She said the department dismissed Iglesias "without input from me."

During a briefing that Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty gave senators last month about the firings, McNulty singled out two U.S. attorneys, Iglesias and Carol Lam of California, who had generated "extensive congressional concern," according to a senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the official was not authorized to speak on the record about that briefing.

The Justice Department released letters from Sen. Dianne Feinstein and Rep. Darrell Issa of California to Gonzales and Lam complaining about Lam's prosecution record with illegal immigrants, and other matters.

Lam's and Iglesias' accounts are just two of the stories expected to receive public airings on Capitol Hill Tuesday. The Justice Department has said Iglesias was among those dismissed for performance-related issues.

U.S. attorneys are political appointees and can be fired for any reason, or none at all. But these firings have become a stress point of a power struggle between the Republican Bush administration and newly ascendant Democrats in Congress.

Separately on Monday, the Justice Department said that Michael Battle — a senior official who directed the department's Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys and had personally informed the ousted prosecutors of their removal — would leave his post March 16.

Battle was not involved in the decision-making that led to the prosecutors' ouster, the department said. "His departure is not connected to the U.S. attorney controversy whatsoever," Roehrkasse said.

Democrats scoffed.

"The wheels seem to be coming off the Bush administration's increasingly hollow defense of its decision to fire eight U.S. attorneys," said Rep. Linda Sanchez, D-Calif., who planned to lead the House hearing.

Her panel subpoenaed two more fired prosecutors, Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona.

They are the fifth and sixth ordered to testify. The others — Iglesias, Lam, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Washington — were expected to testify before both the House panel and the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The six attorneys said in a statement released ahead of the proceedings that they were given "little or no information about the reason" for their firings.

"When we had new ideas or differing opinions, we assumed that such thoughts would always be welcomed by the department and could be freely and openly debated within the halls of that great institution," they said.

Domenici said Sunday he had had a brief conversation with Iglesias last year and asked "if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at."

"In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologize," Domenici said, adding, "I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

House Widens Prosecutor Firings Probe (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, USA TODAY

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congressional inquiries into the Bush administration's dismissal of eight federal prosecutors deepened Monday, as the House Judiciary Committee announced it would seek subpoenas for two more of the prosecutors.

The panel now plans to hear from as many as six of the ousted prosecutors today, and several of them are likely to also appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Both panels are investigating whether the administration unfairly dismissed the eight prosecutors — who serve at the pleasure of the president — as political retaliation for their investigative activities.

The House panel's announcement said it would seek testimony from former U.S. attorneys Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona. Previously scheduled to testify today were former U.S. attorneys H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Carol Lam of Southern California and John McKay of Washington state.

Meanwhile, the senior Justice Department official who carried out the controversial firings announced his resignation Monday. Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, said in a statement that his resignation was unrelated to the dismissals and that he was leaving to enter private practice.

Battle said he first notified the department of his decision to leave last June. However, Democrats called the timing of his departure suspicious.

"This raises another question about a subject where there are already too many unanswered questions," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who has led the Senate investigation.

Rep. Linda Sánchez, D-Calif., a member of the House panel, said the explanation for Battle's departure "is as murky as everything else (the administration) has told us about this case."

Administration officials, including Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, have said that all but one of the firings were related to the prosecutors' performance. Last month, McNulty told the Senate panel that Cummins was removed so he could be replaced by an ex-aide to White House political director Karl Rove.

Since then, the Senate panel has disclosed that Justice had issued generally favorable evaluations of all of the fired prosecutors. And Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, has said that before he was dismissed in December he was contacted by two unidentified members of Congress who asked about the status of corruption probe looking at Democrats.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., has since acknowledged that he contacted Iglesias. Domenici said in a statement that he asked Iglesias whether "he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at.

"I regret making that call, and I apologize," Domenici said. "However, at no time … did I ever tell (Iglesias) what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter."

Senate Ethics Committee Chairwoman Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., and Vice Chairman John Cornyn, R-Texas, declined to comment on whether Domenici's action would trigger an ethics inquiry.

Democrats To Probe Sackings Of US Attorneys (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Congressional Democrats concerned about what they say is a political purge of US attorneys plan to use hearings on Tuesday to probe allegations that New Mexico's top prosecutor was fired after Pete Domenici, a Republican senator, involved himself in a political corruption investigation there.

A subcommittee of the House judiciary committee has subpoenaed six of the eight US attorneys ousted by the Department of Justice in December. The prosecutors, who run the 93 local offices that bring most cases, are chosen by the president and confirmed by the Senate, but the mass mid-term firings are highly unusual, legal experts said.

"More than any other justice department officials, US attorneys must be above reproach. Today's revelations call into serious question whether they were allowed such independence in this administration," said Chuck Schumer, New York senator. He added that the Senate judiciary committee, which will also hold hearings, planned to explore the recent resignation of Mike Battles, the DoJ official who informed the US attorneys of their dismissals

Several of the ousted attorneys have said they were told they were being pushed out to make way for people with political connections.

The firing of Carol Lam, former US attorney for San Diego, has also prompted questions because that office is presiding over a political corruption probe that ensnared Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican congressman, and other Republicans.

David Iglesias, the former top prosecutor in New Mexico, added fuel to the fire last week when he said that he was put under pressure last autumn by two -congressional Republicans to speed up a political corruption probe involving -Democrats.

Mr Domenici acknowledged at the weekend that he contacted Mr Iglesias about the corruption investigation late last year, saying: "In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologise. However . . . I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

He also said he had begun seeking Mr Iglesias's removal well before that call because he was dissatisfied with the progress on illegal drug and immigration cases.

Heather Wilson, a Republican congresswoman accused of being one of the two who allegedly put pressure on Mr Iglesias, has declined to comment on the claims and other members of New Mexico's delegation have said they did not contact the US attorney.

Brian Roehrkasse, DoJ spokesman, said Mr Domenici had complained four times to top officials there about Mr Iglesias but never mentioned the corruption investigation.

"Any suggestion that any US attorney was removed to inappropriately interfere with any investigation is plainly wrong and ill-conceived," he said. "These decisions were based on the individual concerns of each US attorney about their overall performance . . . [including] ineffectively prosecuting departmental priorities areas, failure to follow departmental guidelines or just an inability to lead."

Senate Democrats are also seeking to roll back a 2005 law change that allows the justice department to name interim US attorneys who can serve indefinitely without Senate confirmation. Previously, interim replacements could serve only 120 days and then had to seek approval from federal judges. The DoJ says the law change is irrelevant to the controversy because it plans to name permanent replacements and seek Senate confirmation for the open-positions.

Linda Sanchez, chairwoman of the House subcommittee, said the hearings would "shed additional light on the Bush administration's apparent decision to pursue a political agenda through the selection of federal -prosecutors".

Political Retribution? Poor Performance? Congress Will Hear From Fired U.S. Attorneys (ABC)

By Z. BYRON WOLF

ABC News, March 6, 2007

Probe Studies Sen. Pete Domenici's Phone Call to Dismissed Prosecutor

March 5, 2007 — - Honest inquiry or political pressure? Differing perceptions of a quick phone call in New Mexico before the midterm elections last November could put one senator in ethical hot water.

Former U.S. attorneys are set to testify before both the House and the Senate Tuesday about why they were fired in recent months to determine whether they are the victims of political retribution. Six attorney were fired with little explanation. They claim they were performing well in their jobs. The Justice Department claims some were dismissed because of poor performance.

Among the six former prosecutors who will testify is David Iglesias, who was until last week the U.S. attorney in New Mexico. He is expected to allege that Republican lawmakers, including New Mexico Sen. Pete Domenici, pressured him to speed up a corruption investigation involving New Mexico Democrats ahead of last November's midterm election .

An outside group has already filed an ethics complaint against Domenici, accusing him of breaking Senate rules by interfering with an ongoing criminal investigation.

Everyone agrees that Domenici picked up the phone last October and called Iglesias, though Iglesias did not name Domenici or another yet-to-be unidentified lawmaker who Iglesias said also tried to pressure him. Rep. Heather Wilson, who has not commented on the Iglesias matter, is the only other New Mexico Republican in Congress.

The topic of conversation between Iglesias and Domenici was a corruption investigation Iglesias was conducting into an alleged kickback scheme involving New Mexico Democrats.

But the substance of that call is up for debate. Domenici, who admits to placing the call, said he was just interested in the timeframe for any potential indictments stemming from the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0140789

"I asked Mr. Iglesias if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what timeframe we were looking at," Domenici said in a written statement released Sunday.

Iglesias, however, has said he felt violated by the call and sensed pressure to bring indictments sooner than he wanted to -- before the November election. The indictments never came. And last week Iglesias was fired by the Department of Justice.

Iglesias was not the only person Domenici was calling. A Justice Department spokesman confirmed to The Associated Press that Domenici complained about Iglesias in three separate calls to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales between September 2005 and March 2006. Also, in October 2006, Domenici complained about Iglesias to Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. It is unclear if this call was made before or after Domenici's conversation with Iglesias.

Justice Department spokesmen have said Iglesias was among the attorneys let go because of poor performance.

Monday the liberal-leaning public interest group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington asked for an ethics investigation of Domenici.

"If, as it appears, Sen. Domenici pressured a sitting U.S. attorney to push a criminal case to benefit a political party, the Ethics Committee should take swift and harsh action," said Melanie Sloan, director of CREW. "No member of Congress can be permitted to manipulate our system of justice for political gain."

Senators will surely question Iglesias about the ethics allegations and his contact with Domenici in the run-up to the November election, but Democrats in the Senate are not expected to take a public stance on whether Domenici violated Senate ethics or whether there should be a full-scale ethics committee investigation until after tomorrow's hearing. Iglesias is expected to dispute Domenici's version of their conversation in which Domenici said, "I have never pressured or threatened him in any way."

The Senate Ethics Committee is unable to comment on any ethics allegations or inquiries, but the Senate ethics manual spells out that the committee will engage in a "preliminary inquiry" whenever it receives a sworn complaint against a senator or senate staffer. Ethics Committee Chairwoman Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., and Vice Chairman Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, confirmed Tuesday that a preliminary inquiry into Domenici's actions would, as rules require, be launched.

You can read the relevant passage in the ethics manual here: http://ethics.senate.gov/downloads/pdffiles/manual.pdf

The preliminary inquiry is not a full-scale investigation but establishes whether the committee should proceed with any sort of action against a senator. This would be the equivalent of a grand jury inquiry.

It is Domenici's admitted call to Iglesias last year that could put him in jeopardy with the committee. According to the ethics rules, it is "against the general advice" of the committee for a senator to meddle in ongoing litigation.

Domenici said he was seeking a status report and a timeframe. A status report inquiry is not against Senate rules as long as the agency being contacted is not "engaged in an ongoing enforcement, investigative or other quasi-judicial proceeding with respect to the matter. …"

While something that is done against the "general advice" of the committee may not violate a specific rule, it could be deemed to constitute an ethics violation, because the committee members could determine the action reflects poorly on the body. But these guidelines are specifically geared to senators intervening in cases on behalf of constituents; so, it is unclear if that will apply to Domenici's interaction with Iglesias.

Gonzales Defends Move To Fire Attorneys, Denies Political Role (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, facing criticism for the firing of eight U.S. attorneys, defended the action as appropriate but said the Justice Department handled the situation poorly.

"We could have rolled out the decisions more smoothly," he said in an interview. But he also rejected accusations from Democrats and other critics that the prosecutors were fired for failing to follow the Bush administration's political agenda.

"To think we made these changes to retaliate or because they didn't carry out certain prosecutions?" he said. "That did not occur here. I stand by the decision to make the changes."

The tempest has been the latest imbroglio for the Justice Department and Mr. Gonzales, a longtime Bush friend and former White House counsel who has defended the administration's often-controversial law-enforcement programs, from domestic surveillance to the treatment of enemy combatants.

Part of the problem is the Justice Department's contention that the Dec. 7 dismissals were performance related, which came after initial suggestions that the moves were normal turnover. That switch has prompted protests from some of those let go. Some have taken to referring to the firings as the "Pearl Harbor Day Massacre." And some of have said they wouldn't have protested the moves otherwise.

Internal Justice Department documents, reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, show evaluations offering positive reviews for all the prosecutors' work as recently as last March. Mr. Gonzales said the written reviews were among several factors the department used to evaluate prosecutors, which include numbers and types of prosecutions and management issues.

"It should never have come to this," said John McKay, former U.S. attorney for the Seattle-based western district of Washington, who was among those fired and is now an adjunct law professor at the Seattle University law school. "I resigned quietly and left. But when they started saying it was for 'performance reasons,' I couldn't keep quiet any more."

The situation has put Democrats in the unusual role of championing the cause of Republican appointees to batter the administration. Indeed, many of the ousted prosecutors remain loyal to President Bush and Mr. Gonzales, and blame Republican party operatives for giving the two men bad advice.

Today, committees in the House and Senate are holding hearings in which four of the fired prosecutors are scheduled to testify.

In prepared testimony, Carol Lam, the former U.S. attorney for the Southern District of California, planned to read a statement on behalf of the group, saying, "Each of us was fully aware that we served at the pleasure of the President, and that we could be removed for any or no reason. In most of our cases, we were given little or no information about the reason for the request for our resignations."

The Justice Department said lawmakers had complained about some of the prosecutors. New Mexico Republican Sen. Pete Domenici said this weekend that he had sought the removal of David Iglesias, the U.S. attorney in his state, and had called him to inquire about the status of a corruption probe involving local Democrats.

Yesterday, Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, who requested the resignations, announced his own resignation. He said he plans to enter the private sector and that his departure had nothing to do with the firings.

Democrats initially claimed the administration was using a little-noticed clause in the Patriot Act to circumvent Senate confirmation for some of the interim replacements who otherwise might not be able to pass muster with the new Democratic majority. There is no fixed term for U.S. attorneys. They typically are appointed at the beginning of a new president's term and serve throughout.

Mr. Gonzales denied any political motivation for the moves. "I made recommendations to the president" that the changes be made, he said. "Ultimately, these are presidential appointees."

Second Lawmaker Contacted Prosecutor (WP)

By Paul Kane And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) acknowledged yesterday that she contacted a federal prosecutor to complain about the pace of his public corruption investigations, as the Senate ethics committee signaled that it had opened a preliminary inquiry into a similar communication by her state's senior senator, Pete V. Domenici (R).

Wilson denied allegations from former New Mexico U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias that she pressured him to speed up a political corruption investigation involving Democrats in the waning days of her tight election campaign last fall.

"I did not ask about the timing of any indictments and I did not tell Mr. Iglesias what course of action I thought he should take or pressure him in any way," Wilson said in a statement to The Washington Post. "The conversation was brief and professional."

Iglesias, one of seven U.S. attorneys fired by the Justice Department on Dec. 7, is expected to tell Congress today that Wilson and Domenici were trying to sway the course of his investigation. Domenici acknowledged Sunday that he called Iglesias about the corruption case but said he did not pressure him. The telephone calls to Iglesias by Domenici and Wilson appear to put them in conflict with congressional ethics rules that bar contacts with federal agency officials during most active investigations.

The furor over Domenici and Wilson has rapidly become the focus of the dispute over the firings of eight U.S. attorneys and a change in law that allows Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors for an indefinite period of time. The Justice Department has said that seven of the prosecutors were dismissed for failing to follow Bush administration policy on multiple issues, and acknowledged that one was sacked to make way for an ally of White House political adviser Karl Rove.

But most of the prosecutors have cited positive job reviews, and Democrats have alleged that there were political motivations behind the firings.

"Each of us was fully aware that we served at the pleasure of the president, and that we could be removed for any or no reason," six of the prosecutors said in a statement released yesterday. "In most of our cases, we were given little or no information about the reason for the request for our resignations."

Iglesias and three other ousted prosecutors are scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee this morning. The same group and two others are slated to testify in the afternoon before a House Judiciary subcommittee.

The Senate Ethics Committee released a statement yesterday evening declining to address the allegations against Domenici, but it said that anytime a legitimate complaint is filed against a senator, a preliminary inquiry is begun. The statement, from the chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), and Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.), the committee's ranking Republican, noted that preliminary inquiries can lead to wider investigations.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a liberal-leaning advocacy group, filed a complaint against Domenici with the committee yesterday.

Wilson said in her statement that many of her constituents had complained about "the slow pace of federal prosecutions" in corruption cases and that one unidentified constituent told her that "Iglesias was intentionally delaying corruption investigations."

Wilson also said she was trying to help Iglesias. "If the purpose of my call has somehow been misperceived, I am sorry for any confusion. I thought it was important for Mr. Iglesias to receive this information and, if necessary, have the opportunity to clear his name."

Wilson said Iglesias's dismissal occurred "without input from me." Justice officials said they are not aware of any contacts by Wilson about Iglesias. But they said Sunday that Domenici complained about him to Gonzales three times in 2005 and 2006 and spoke to Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty in the first week of October 2006.

Also yesterday, the senior Justice Department official who carried out the attorney firings announced his resignation but said his departure was not related to the dismissals.

Michael A. Battle, who has headed the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys since 2005, said in a statement that he began considering outside employment last June. His last day will be in mid-March, officials said.

Battle called seven U.S. attorneys on Dec. 7 and notified them that they were being asked to leave. He notified then-Arkansas U.S. Attorney Bud Cummins of his dismissal in June.

The ethical quandary facing Domenici and Wilson heightens the political pressures that both are facing at home, where Democrats are touting the Iglesias allegations with one eye on attacking the Bush White House and the other on two seats they consider vulnerable in 2008.

There has been speculation in both parties that Domenici, a 34-year veteran of the Senate, may not run for a seventh term next year, when he will turn 76. He held a large fundraiser in Albuquerque two weeks ago that was meant to give notice of his intention to run again, and aides and outside advisers maintained yesterday that the latest flap will not change his plans.

But the potential for an ethics review of his actions has independent analysts discussing the possible political fallout for the otherwise popular Domenici. Wilson, the heir apparent to his seat, won reelection in November by fewer than 1,000 votes.

"You're having an impact on the Senate race either way -- whether he stays or not," said Amy Walter, a handicapper with the Cook Political Report.

An inquiry into Wilson's actions could impair what Walter called Wilson's "outsider" reputation. "It calls into question those skills," she said.

Before the scandal erupted, the Rothenberg Political Report, another independent handicapper, listed Wilson as one of the dozen most-endangered House Republicans.

Justice Stymieing Probe Of 6 Firings, Democrats Say (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

Congressional Democrats say half a dozen former federal prosecutors were fired by the Bush administration for political reasons, and they're accusing the Justice Department of withholding information related to the dismissals.

"Eleven months after the firings, we still haven't gotten straight answers from the Department of Justice, which changed its own story this weekend and admitted the firings weren't based on job performance," said Rep. Linda T. Sanchez, California Democrat and chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee on commercial and administrative law.

Both the House and Senate Judiciary committees will hold hearings today with the six former prosecutors.

Supporters of the administration's policy say the firings were not done improperly. U.S. attorneys have four-year terms, but can be removed or replaced at any time, and for nearly any reason, according to federal law.

"We ought to not lose sight of the fact that president has the power to replace them," said Sen. Arlen Specter, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee. "He doesn't have to have a reason. If it is a bad reason, that is different."

The Pennsylvania Republican added he would listen to the Democrats' accusations of improper firings.

Democrats have specifically cited the case of former prosecutor Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, California Republican. Cunningham resigned from office last year after pleading guilty to bribery charges in connection to a case involving military contractors. Cunningham received an eight-year sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0140792

Mrs. Lam, who was appointed by Mr. Bush in 2002, was fired after the Justice Department issued a request for her dismissal in January. According to the Justice Department, Mrs. Lam was fired for not aggressively pursuing the prosecution of border crimes.

The other five former U.S. attorneys scheduled to testify today include Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas, Paul K. Charlton of Phoenix, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., David C. Iglesias of Albuquerque, N.M., and John McKay of Seattle.

Meanwhile, Sen. Pete V. Domenici, New Mexico Republican, yesterday said he made a mistake by contacting Mr. Iglesias during an ongoing probe of state Democrats on charges of corruption last year. While apologizing for making the call, Mr. Domenici told reporters he "never pressured him nor threatened him in any way."

The Justice Department replaced Mr. Iglesias last December and said Mr. Domenici had put in four calls making such a request. Both say the calls happened between September of 2005 and October 2006, while the call to Mr. Iglesias took place in October.

Mr. Iglesias said he thinks the October calls to him from Mr. Domenici and Republican Rep. Heather A. Wilson were made to pressure him on the pace of his corruption probe and are the real cause of his dismissal.

Last night, Fox News reported that Michael A. Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, had resigned his post. Mr. Battle was behind eight of the recent top-level firings. The Justice Department said the resignation was not connected to the firings and that Mr. Battle had announced his departure in an internal e-mail last month.

Prosecutor Worried 'Gloves Would Come Off' Over Criticism Of Ouster (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - A high-ranking Justice Department official told one of the U.S. attorneys fired by the Bush administration that if any of them continued to criticize the administration for their ousters, previously undisclosed details about the reasons they were fired might be released, two of the ousted prosecutors told McClatchy Newspapers.

While the U.S. attorney who got the call regarded the tone of the conversation as congenial, not intimidating, the prosecutor nonetheless passed the message on to five other fired U.S. attorneys. One of them interpreted the reported comments by Michael Elston, the chief of staff to Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, as a threat.

Justice Department officials denied that the conversation with the U.S. attorney ever took place, and Elston said he called several of the fired U.S. attorneys but never made any such comments.

"I had no conversation in which I discussed with any U.S. attorney what they should or should not say to the media regarding their removal," Elston said.

The two prosecutors who described the call demanded anonymity because, they said, they didn't want to antagonize the Justice Department further.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse criticized McClatchy for running the story. "It is unfortunate that the press would choose to run an allegation from an anonymous source from a conversation that never took place," he said.

Six of the eight ousted U.S. attorneys have been subpoenaed to testify Tuesday before the House of Representatives. Four will appear voluntarily before the Senate after a liberal public-interest group Monday asked for the Senate ethics committee to investigate Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., for calling the U.S. attorney in New Mexico, who was later fired, during a corruption investigation of at least one Democrat.

According to one of the fired U.S. attorneys, Elston made the comments during a telephone conversation after Democrats began questioning whether the administration was attempting to purge more independent-minded Republican appointees in order to replace them with more partisan candidates.

According to the former U.S. attorney, Elston made a "pointed comment that indicated that somehow anyone who talked might become more embarrassed if the story continued on."

"The inference was that they were holding themselves back from saying more about why people were fired - that it was likely the department was going to step up the defense of their actions," the fired prosecutor said. "It could have been construed as friendly advice or a casual prediction. But I think it was expected that everyone would be told about the call."

When conveying the message to the others, the prosecutor tried to make it clear that the meaning of the conversation shouldn't be overdramatized.

But another former U.S. attorney, who wasn't a party to the Justice Department conversation, interpreted the comments as a threat, especially since it came when congressional Democrats were contacting the attorneys about possibly testifying before Congress.

"I took it to mean that negative, personal information would be released," the prosecutor said. "That if we made public comments or if we were to testify in Congress, that the gloves would come off and the Department of Justice would make us regret that we were talking."

The controversy over the firings of the eight U.S. attorneys has continued for weeks, but it was reignited last week when U.S. Attorney David Iglesias told McClatchy Newspapers that he believed that two members of Congress called him in mid-October to pressure him to complete the investigation before the November elections. Iglesias, who stepped down last week, added that he believed he was fired because he didn't speed up the case.

Domenici, who originally had recommended Iglesias for the post, apologized for making the call in a statement Sunday, but he said that he never pressured or threatened Iglesias about the case.

McClatchy Newspapers reported previously that Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., also called Iglesias about the investigation. The Washington Post reported in its online edition Monday that Wilson acknowledged contacting Iglesias, but denied pressuring him.

Domenici also acknowledged in his statement that he asked the Justice Department to replace Iglesias, but he said that he made the request before he called about the corruption probe.

Justice Department officials confirmed that Domenici called Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in September 2005 and January and April of 2006.

During those calls, Domenici expressed general concerns about Iglesias' performance and questioned whether he was "up to the job," Roehrkasse said. During the first week of October 2006, Domenici made a similar and "very brief call" about Iglesias to McNulty, the deputy attorney general. At no time in these calls did the senator mention the public corruption case, Roehrkasse said.

The left-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) asked the Senate Select Committee on Ethics to investigate whether Domenici violated ethics law. Lawmakers are prohibited from attempting to influence Justice Department investigations. Members of the ethics committee released a statement saying they couldn't comment on an ongoing matter.

Also on Monday, Michael Battle, the Justice Department official who oversees the U.S. attorney's offices, resigned. In January, Battle sent an e-mail to all U.S. attorneys announcing that he'd be leaving and sent a more detailed e-mail to his immediate staff in February with his departure date, a Justice Department official said.

On Dec. 7, Battle told most of the U.S. attorneys that they were to be fired. Former prosecutors said that Battle told many of them he didn't know why they were fired, but the orders came from "on high."

Messenger In Prosecutors' Firings Quits (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — The Justice Department official who told seven United States attorneys in December that they were being dismissed said Monday that he was resigning.

Michael A. Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, said in a statement that his departure was unrelated to the dismissals, but Democrats said he appeared to be a casualty of the uproar over the firings.

Mr. Battle, formerly a United States attorney in Buffalo, is not believed to have played a significant role in the decision to remove the United States attorneys, although Justice Department officials said he had accepted it.

Mr. Battle said in his statement that he had been planning to leave the agency since last June.

But Democrats in Congress said the timing of his departure, on March 16, appeared unusual.

With hearings planned on Tuesday in the Senate and the House, a House Judiciary panel said on Monday that it would issue subpoenas to two more of the ousted prosecutors, Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona. The panel had previously subpoenaed four prosecutors.

The week is shaping up as pivotal for the new Democratic majority, a chance to exercise its subpoena and oversight powers over the Bush administration on two politically charged fronts: the circumstances of the removal of the United States attorneys and the treatment of veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Democratic leaders say it is the beginning of a fundamentally different power relationship between Congress and the Bush administration. Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who is chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said of the administration: "In the past, they would stonewall this through a news cycle and know they could ride it out. Now they know there's a Congress of another party, with the power of subpoenas, the power to hold hearings, the power to ask questions."

One of the dismissed United States attorneys who are expected to testify is David C. Iglesias, who was removed as the top federal prosecutor in New Mexico. Mr. Iglesias is expected to describe in detail the phone calls he received last year from Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico, and an unidentified Republican lawmaker, Congressional aides said.

Mr. Iglesias has said the calls were intended to press him into bringing indictments that would embarrass Democrats before the November 2006 elections. The case centered on an investigation of a kickback scheme related to a construction project involving a former Democratic official. Mr. Domenici has acknowledged making a call to the prosecutor but has said he did not press Mr. Iglesias.

Mr. Domenici is one of the three Republican members of the state's Congressional delegation. One of the other lawmakers, Representative Steve Pearce, has said he did not contact Mr. Iglesias. The remaining Republican, Representative Heather A. Wilson, told The Washington Post on Monday that she had spoken with Mr. Iglesias but said she had not pressured him.

Also on Monday, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington asked the Senate Committee on Ethics whether Mr. Domenici violated Senate rules when he contacted Mr. Iglesias. The group noted that Mr. Domenici made the call shortly before the November elections, in which control of the House came down to a handful of competitive races.

Carol C. Lam, who was removed as United States attorney in San Diego, said in testimony prepared for her appearance in the House that "in most of our cases, we were given little or no information about the reason for the request for our resignations." Ms. Lam said in her written testimony that she would not speculate on the reasons.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who has led the Senate investigation into the removals, said the ousted prosecutors wanted to talk about their experiences. "We have spent decades trying to insulate U.S. attorneys from the political process," Mr. Schumer said, "and it looks more and more like all that has been undone in the last few years."

Both the issue of the ousted United States attorneys and the disclosure of dilapidated facilities and poor care at Walter Reed fit neatly with core Democratic charges: that the Bush administration is more interested in politics than in government and that despite its rhetorical flourishes, it is not doing enough for the troops.

Dems Question DoJ Resignation In Wake Of Attorney Dismissals (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Susan Crabtree

The Hill, March 6, 2007

Democrats are questioning the timing of the resignation of a Department of Justice official who called to fire several U.S. attorneys late last year.

Michael Battle, a former U.S. attorney who serves as the director of the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, will leave his post voluntarily March 16.

The circumstances surrounding Battle's departure add to questions Democrats plan to ask about whether politics played any role in the firings of seven U.S. attorneys, some of whom were pursuing public-corruption cases against GOP lawmakers. The House and Senate Judiciary committees will hold hearings featuring the testimony of several of the fired U.S. attorneys today to investigate the matter.

A Department of Justice staffer said only that the public-affairs office planned to send out a statement about Battle's resignation; it did not do so by press time yesterday.

Battle called six federal prosecutors in early December to fire them, and reportedly was unhappy about doing so.

A Justice Department spokesman told the Associated Press that Battle "was not involved in the actual decision-making."

"This raises another question about a subject where there are already too many unanswered questions," Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who will chair today's Senate Judiciary Committee hearing with U.S. attorneys, said in a statement. "While Mike Battle, a man of integrity, must issue the customary denial, the timing of this resignation asks whether he's another casualty of the U.S. attorney imbroglio."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and Judiciary Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative Law Chairwoman Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.) vowed to "do everything in their power to unearth the facts surrounding Battle's resignation."

"The wheels seem to be coming off the Bush administration's increasingly hollow defense of its decision to fire eight U.S. attorneys," Sánchez said. "The administration's explanation of Mr. Battle's apparent resignation is as murky as everything else they have told us about this case."

Six ousted U.S. attorneys are slated to tell their stories to a House subcommittee today and four will appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee, as the flap surrounding their dismissal threatens to engulf two Republican lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0140795

Democrats have seized on the U.S. attorney departures to bolster their charges of cronyism in the administration. Although replacing U.S. attorneys is a common move by a president at the beginning of a term — Clinton famously reshuffled their ranks when he entered office — it's unusual for an administration to make such changes midterm.

The Democrats' net unexpectedly may have snared their GOP colleagues, after New Mexico prosecutor David Iglesias alleged that two lawmakers had called him before his resignation to push for expediting a state corruption probe.

Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) acknowledged over the weekend that he called Iglesias to ask for an update on the progress of a contentious investigation of alleged kickbacks to a local Democratic politician related to a lavish courthouse construction contract. Domenici denied pressuring Iglesias on the case and said he had recommended the prosecutor's removal before making the call.

The identity of the other congressional caller remains unconfirmed. Iglesias has said both lawmakers were New Mexico Republicans, and Rep. Heather Wilson — often mentioned as a possible replacement for the 74-year-old Domenici, her political mentor — is the only member of the delegation who declines to comment on the allegations.

Iglesias's testimony today may pose a new dilemma for Democrats, who must decide whether to pursue any potential ethics violations that may arise from the prosecutor's sworn testimony. The U.S. attorney scandal so far has proven an effective Democratic cudgel against the Bush administration, but formal complaints against sitting Republicans, particularly the well-liked Domenici, could create unanticipated partisanship.

Schumer demurred late last week when asked whether he had discussed Iglesias's charges with Domenici.

"I don't think that's appropriate," the Democratic Caucus vice chairman said.

Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) spoke of the U.S. attorneys late last week as part of a pattern of unilateral decision-making by the White House, which used a little-known provision in last year's Patriot Act reauthorization to install replacement prosecutors without promptly seeking Senate confirmation.

"It's entirely consistent with the unitary executive … diminishing the power of Congress," Durbin said. When asked whether he had discussed Domenici's alleged call to Iglesias with the senior Republican, Durbin added, "I think that's what you do for a living."

In the House, however, Republicans already may have started an ethics war of words by pledging last week to block the assignment of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is under FBI investigation for bribery charges, to the Homeland Security Committee.

"Any time they're calling attention to Jefferson, they have a problem because they have many members with problems," a Democratic aide said. "Whether it's Wilson or other Republican members, they will no doubt get bitten in the behind."

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) was one of the first lawmakers to shine a spotlight on the resigned prosecutors' predicament, after his state's U.S. attorney, H.E. "Bud" Cummins, was asked to depart to make room for a former aide to senior Bush adviser Karl Rove. That replacement since has agreed to forgo formal Senate confirmation, and Pryor said he has met with Rep. John Boozman (Ark.), the state delegation's sole Republican, to discuss new recommendations to send to the White House.

Of the New Mexico case, Pryor said, "It would seem inappropriate for a member of Congress to try to intervene in a political investigation, whether to speed it up or slow it down."

William Canfield, a former Senate Ethics Committee counsel who now practices at Williams & Jensen, said any charges Iglesias may make would be difficult to prove without substantive evidence of the nature of the lawmakers' calls. Members of Congress are forbidden from making "ex parte" communications with executive-branch employees aimed at influencing investigations.

"I don't think [rules about] ex parte communications would stop a member of the Senate or House from getting on the phone with a local U.S. attorney and asking, 'What are you doing?'" Canfield said. "None of that is a request for information, just advice that the U.S. attorney take this case seriously."

The case on which Iglesias was working at the time of his dismissal centered on Manny Aragon, a former state Senate president pro tem and influential figure in Albuquerque's Democratic establishment. Aragon was accused of taking payments from a construction company that worked on several city courthouses, and local media reports hinted at imminent indictments several times late last year with none materializing from Iglesias.

Wilson's reelection challenger last year was state Attorney General Patricia Madrid, whom she ultimately beat by 861 votes. Wilson accused Madrid during the campaign of being soft on crime, a contention state Republicans believed to be bolstered by Madrid's decision to seek indictments of cooperating witnesses in yet another corruption probe that Iglesias was pursuing.

Illustrating the cosseted circles of New Mexico politics, Iglesias and Madrid first encountered each other in 1998, when the future U.S. attorney lost the attorney general's race to the future Democratic House candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0140796

Watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) sent a letter to the Senate Ethics Committee on Monday calling for an investigation into Domenici's phone call to Iglesias. Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, said they would file an ethics complaint against Wilson if Iglesias names her tomorrow as the other caller during his testimony.

Even so, Sloan doubts either ethics panel would address the matter.

"They're not going to do anything," she said. "They, like the House committee, are just a fig leaf. I'd be shocked [if they] actually took this up because they never take anything up."

Gerald Hebert, of the Campaign Legal Center, also said Domenici's admission raises serious ethical questions.

"Domenici can claim all he wants that he didn't put any pressure on that prosecutor," Hebert said. "But there is inherent, implicit pressure whenever a senator calls someone like that."

Hebert said Domenici's action warrants an ethics investigation, but he also said he doubts the Senate Ethics Committee will act on it.

"They have a very shaky record of being able to police themselves," he said. "That's why we've called upon the Senate to establish an [outside] office of public integrity — their track record is not a good one."

Former Prosecutor Says Departure Was Pressured (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — The former federal prosecutor in Maryland said Monday that he was forced out in early 2005 because of political pressure stemming from public corruption investigations involving associates of the state's governor, a Republican.

"There was direct pressure not to pursue these investigations," said the former prosecutor, Thomas M. DiBiagio. "The practical impact was to intimidate my office and shut down the investigations."

Mr. DiBiagio, a controversial figure who clashed with a number of Maryland politicians, had never publicly discussed the reasons behind his departure. But he agreed to an interview with The New York Times because he said he was concerned about what he saw as similarities with the recent firings of eight United States attorneys.

As in those cases, there are conflicting accounts of the circumstances that led to Mr. DiBiagio's ouster. The Justice Department disputes his version.

His office had been looking into whether associates of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. had improperly funneled money from gambling interests to promote legalized slot machines in Maryland. Mr. DiBiagio said that several prominent Maryland Republicans had pressed him to back away from the inquiries and that one conversation had so troubled him that he reported it to an F.B.I. official as a threat.

But he said that the Justice Department had offered little support and that that made it "impossible for me to stay."

Several current and former officials in the Baltimore office said Mr. DiBiagio voiced concerns in 2004 that the corruption inquiries were jeopardizing his career, a view that they shared.

The Justice Department rejected Mr. DiBiagio's explanation. An official in the department, David Margolis, said he told Mr. DiBiagio in 2004 that he had to leave because "we had lost confidence in him."

Mr. Margolis said the prosecutor's harsh management style had caused resentments in the office that ran "wide and deep" and called "an absolute fairy tale" the idea that Mr. DiBiagio's departure was tied to the gambling case or any other investigation.

Mr. Ehrlich, who was defeated for re-election in November, denied any involvement in Mr. DiBiagio's departure and said there was nothing to the gambling investigations.

Like Mr. DiBiagio, several of the newly departing prosecutors were overseeing sensitive political corruption investigations when they left office.

The controversy over the dismissals continued to grow on Monday, as the head of the Justice Department office that oversees prosecutors stepped down, a watchdog group filed an ethics complaint, and House and Senate committees prepared for testimony on Tuesday from some of the ousted prosecutors.

Because Mr. Ehrlich was the sole statewide Republican in Maryland at the time of Mr. DiBiagio's appointment in 2001, he had a critical role in recommending him to the White House for the position.

Mr. DiBiagio, a former assistant prosecutor, was a political unknown, but he and the governor had become friends as young lawyers in Maryland. The bond disintegrated soon after the prosecutor took office.

Mr. Ehrlich and his advisers acknowledged on Monday that they were unhappy with Mr. DiBiagio's handling of an earlier corruption investigation that led to the indictment in 2003 of Mr. Ehrlich's state police superintendent, Edward R. Norris, over his misuse of police money.

DOJ_NMG_0140797

The gambling investigation caused less concern in the governor's office because officials there considered it without merit, Mr. Ehrlich said. But because of lingering suspicions in Maryland political circles that Mr. Ehrlich's people had a hand in Mr. DiBiagio's departure in early 2005, a longtime aide to the governor, Jervis Finney, called Mr. DiBiagio a few months ago to deny any involvement, Mr. Finney said.

Mr. Finney said in an interview Monday that he wanted to "clean things up" and to let Mr. DiBiagio know that "neither Gov. Bob Ehrlich or his representatives had asked the Department of Justice to push him out."

Mr. DiBiagio said he did not accept the explanation.

"I believe it was that investigation that played an integral role in what was done to me," Mr. DiBiagio, now at a law firm here, said about the gambling inquiries. "I clearly got the message that I had alienated my political sponsor and I would not have any political support to stay another term. Clearly, they wanted me to leave."

Mr. DiBiagio pointed to tense conversations in 2003 and 2004 with advisers to the governor who, he said, intimated that the corruption investigations could derail his career. He would not name them publicly.

The former prosecutor said he was particularly troubled by one visit in June 2004 in which, he said, a lawyer allied with the governor said the gambling inquiries were disrupting legislative consideration of the slots question and should be shut down.

Mr. DiBiagio said the lawyer inquired about his political future, asked whether he was interested in being a judge and suggested that his life could be closely scrutinized.

Mr. DiBiagio said he described the conversation in a memorandum for his records and reported it to an official of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Baltimore as a possible threat.

Soon after the meeting, Mr. DiBiagio told a Justice Department official in Washington about his office's gambling investigation and said, "Powerful politicians and businessmen are very upset that we are looking into this matter," according to an e-mail message that The Times reviewed.

In the gambling investigation, prosecutors secured a grand jury subpoena for the records of Mr. Ehrlich's communications director, Paul E. Schurick.

Investigators were said to be interested in tracing substantial payments made by a gambling company to a political marketing business in Maryland with ties to Maryland Republicans, people involved in the issue said.

Mr. Ehrlich said Monday that he had no knowledge of any improper transactions to support the slots initiative, and he said the investigation was unfounded.

"I've been for slots for 20 years," he said. "It wasn't any shock that I was for slots. There wasn't anything to this."

The investigation appears to have ended after Mr. DiBiagio left office in January 2005.

In Maryland law enforcement circles, Mr. DiBiagio had as many detractors as supporters. The Justice Department publicly rebuked him in mid-2004 over a leaked memorandum that spoke of his desire to bring three "front page" corruption cases before November, a memorandum widely interpreted in Baltimore as an effort to pursue Democrats.

In response, the department said all public corruption cases in Maryland would have to obtain approval by superiors in Washington. Soon, the department initiated an unscheduled performance review of Mr. DiBiagio. Mr. Margolis said the review had shown deep resentment over the prosecutor's aggressive management.

Several officials in the Baltimore prosecutor's office said that although Mr. DiBiagio had been an unpopular manager, the timing of the events leading to his departure appeared to be linked, at least partly, to the corruption investigations.

"We had several investigations that were very sensitive publicly, and what did him in was the probes into prominent Republicans," said a former official involved in the inquiries who insisted on anonymity.

The state's attorney in Baltimore, Patricia C. Jessamy, who worked often with Mr. DiBiagio, said she believed that he had alienated too many important people to succeed.

"He was a good prosecutor," she said. "But he did not play politics well, and that was his downfall."

N.M. Calls May Spark Probes (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, March 6, 2007

A pair of Judiciary panel hearings today featuring testimony from at least four U.S. attorneys who were summarily fired by the Justice Department could spark the first major ethics probes of the 110th Congress.

The star witness at this morning's Senate Judiciary hearing and this afternoon's House Judiciary session will be ousted U.S. Attorney for New Mexico David Iglesias, who has told various media outlets that two New Mexico lawmakers contacted him in mid-October 2006 to inquire about the pace of an ongoing corruption probe of local Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0140798

Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) already has admitted to, and apologized for, making a phone call to Iglesias in mid-October. But Domenici denied doing anything improper, saying in a statement over the weekend that "at no time in that conversation ... did I ever tell [Iglesias] what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter."

Various media reports have singled out Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) as the other lawmaker who contacted Iglesias to ask about the corruption probe. Her office did not return phone calls on Monday.

On Monday, ethics attorneys off Capitol Hill said that Domenici's behavior involved seriously suspect activity and could result in Senate Ethics Committee action, a major investigation by the Justice Department or even an independent counsel.

"Having been in Washington for 35 years, I'm sure we're headed to a full-blown obstruction investigation of some variety that will involve not only the Members of Congress but the Justice Department itself," said Stan Brand, a former House general counsel who now works at Brand Law Group.

"This isn't some rulemaking, this is serious stuff and I don't know where it ends or what the outcome is, but it's going to have to be investigated," Brand added.

Senate Rule 43 states that: "Senate offices should refrain from intervening in such legal actions ... until the matter has reached a resolution in the courts."

Attorney Jan Baran of Wiley Rein, who has counseled GOP clients, said it is unclear if there was a violation of Senate Ethics rules, let alone any laws that would lead to a broader probe.

"It can be an issue with the Senate Ethics Committee as to whether he was properly inquiring about an ongoing investigation," Baran said. "We just don't have all the facts."

Several attorneys said the situation was a rare one and drew comparisons to the "Keating Five" scandal in which lawmakers intervened with federal regulators on behalf of savings and loan operator Charles Keating.

"The ethics rules attempt to balance the job of a Senator representing constituents and making sure the government is responsive with the ethical consideration that they not intervene in investigative or other formal agency type proceedings," Baran explained.

"The lines are not always clear," he said.

But attorney Kenneth Gross of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom said that both the timing — right before an election — and the nature of Domenici's call were suspect.

"The more I look at this, the more troubling it is," Gross said, a former associate general counsel at the Federal Election Commission. "It's one thing if it's a mere status request as opposed to one that carries with it pressure. And the nature of the proceeding, in this case a criminal prosecution, is among the most delicate for any type of inquiry."

On Monday, the liberal group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington wrote to the Senate Ethics Committee asking the panel to investigate Domenici's behavior. The Senate Ethics panel can consider complaints from groups such as CREW when deciding whether to launch an investigation, while the House ethics committee does not allow complaints to be filed by outside groups.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) — who is currently serving as chairwoman of the Senate Ethics Committee while Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) recuperates from brain surgery — did not return a call for comment.

If the Senate panel launched an investigation of Domenici or the House panel began a probe of Wilson, both committees would attempt to keep their activities secret.

Brand suggested any investigation would go beyond the scope of the ethics committees and directly expand into a criminal probe, which could not be managed by the Justice Department since it is involved in the allegations.

Justice Department officials have conceded that Domenici personally called Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on at least four occasions to complain about Iglesias. Those contacts occurred in September 2005, January and April 2006, and again in October 2006.

The Domenici revelations further fuel Democratic charges that there has been improper political interference by the Bush administration in judicial proceedings. They say at least seven U.S. attorneys were unfairly fired for political reasons and are set to be replaced with political cronies. The Justice Department maintains that the seven — with the exception of Bud Cummins III, the ex-U.S. attorney for Eastern Arkansas — were dismissed for "performance based" reasons.

"More than any other Justice Department officials, U.S. attorneys must be above reproach," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who will chair today's Senate Judiciary hearing. "Today's revelations call into serious question whether they allowed such independence in this administration."

Schumer also questioned the timing of the imminent departure from the Justice Department of Mike Battle, the director of the executive office of U.S. attorneys. The Justice Department released a statement Monday saying Battle's departure, which he notified Justice of months ago, was "unrelated" to the U.S. attorneys controversy.

"This raises another question about a subject where there are already too many unanswered questions," Schumer charged.

A Republican, Iglesias serves in the Navy Reserve and was the model for Tom Cruise's character in the movie "A Few Good Men."

Though he would not name the lawmakers who contacted him, Iglesias told The Associated Press last week that he "frankly felt violated" by the contacts. "They were very troubling phone calls," he said.

The other prosecutors slated to testify today are Cummins, ex-San Diego Attorney Carol Lam, who secured the guilty plea of former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), and John McKay, the former U.S. attorney for the Western district of Washington.

Since their firings and the Congressional uproar, the U.S. attorneys have remained relatively silent about their treatment. In earlier testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Deputy U.S. Attorney Paul McNulty claimed that the bulk of the firings were "performance related."

One Democratic Senate aide said he expected the U.S. attorneys to speak "candidly" about their frustrations today.

The House Judiciary hearing today will consider legislation drafted by Rep. Howard Berman (D-Calif.) that would reverse an amendment to the USA PATRIOT Act that allows the U.S. attorney general to permanently appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The subcommittee on commercial and administrative law plans to meet this morning to consider subpoenaing two other fired U.S. attorneys: Daniel Bogden of Nevada and Paul Charlton of Arizona.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has already passed legislation to amend the USA PATRIOT Act and return that power to district courts until the Justice Department submits a name for Senate confirmation.

Yang Denies Departure Is Linked To That Of Other U.S. Attorneys (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, March 6, 2007

A former U.S. attorney for Los Angeles, Debra Wong Yang, dismissed questions about the timing of her departure, which occurred about a month before several other U.S. attorneys were fired late last year.

Wong Yang was heading up the investigation into Rep. Jerry Lewis's (R-Calif.) ties to a lobbying firm and the millions of dollars in contracts the firm's clients received from Congress. Wong Yang, the first Asian-American woman to serve as a U.S. attorney, left her post with Justice to become a partner at Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher, the law firm representing Lewis. She will co-chair the firm's crisis-management practice group, along with Washington, D.C., partner Theodore B. Olson, a former Bush administration solicitor general.

Wong Yang said her departure was a personal decision based on financial concerns and the fact that she is a single mother, and had nothing to do with the firings of other U.S. attorneys. She also said her departure would not affect the case against Lewis in any way, noting that the Justice Department said it would have allowed her to stay in the position "as long as I wanted to."

"The investigation [into Lewis] would never be delayed or affected in any way because of my departure," she said. "We had 260 attorneys in that office."

She said that she had been looking for a more lucrative position in the private sector for months and that a longtime friend, Nick Hanna in the Orange County office of Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher — not Olson or anyone else with close ties to the Bush administration — first contacted her about the position. She said she turned down a more lucrative offer from another firm to take the job at Gibson, Dunn and Crutcher.

Issa To Testify On Lam Firing (NCT)

By William Finn Bennett, Staff Writer

North County Times, March 6, 2007

NORTH COUNTY -- U.S. Rep. Darrell Issa will testify Tuesday at one of two congressional hearings addressing the firing of former San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam and a handful of other U.S. attorneys.

The hearings come in the wake of pressure from Democrats who have raised questions about whether the recent sacking of Lam and the other U.S. attorneys was politically motivated.

Issa has been one of the chief critics of the Yale-educated Lam, who left her post on Feb. 15 after being asked to resign in December. Issa criticized Lam for what he saw as a failure to prosecute illegal immigrant smugglers.

Issa said Monday that Lam lost her job because she failed to fulfill part of her mandate.

"Clearly she needed to be fired for not implementing policy over a long period of time," the Vista Republican said during a telephone interview. Issa's 49th District covers much of northern North County and Southwest Riverside County.

Starting in early 2004, Issa and other Republican members of Congress began sending letters to Lam and the attorney general's office complaining about the job she was doing.

Issa, who will testify before a House panel, said he takes "maybe one twentieth" of the credit for Lam's dismissal, adding that he believes that California Democratic U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein also played a role.

On Monday, Issa's office sent to the North County Times a copy of a June letter from Feinstein to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in which Feinstein expressed concerns about the low rate of human smuggler prosecutions by Lam's office.

"It has come to my attention that despite high apprehension rates by Border Patrol agents along California's border with Mexico, prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office Southern District of California appear to lag behind," Feinstein wrote.

Feinstein spokesman Scott Gerber said Monday that Lam's office addressed the issues Feinstein had raised and that the senator never suggested Lam be dismissed.

"There is a difference between raising a concern and saying someone should be fired," Gerber said. "What the Justice Department has done is unnecessarily dismiss a number of U.S. attorneys with good records."

In a written release issued Monday, Issa maintained Lam's firing was justified.

"Only someone who believes that trafficking human beings isn't a serious crime could look at Carol Lam's record and say she was removed for no good reason," he wrote.

But Feinstein's office continues to maintain the dismissal was political. In late February, Feinstein sent a letter to Democratic Majority Leader Harry Reid, in which she noted the Justice Department had given Lam and five of the other fired U.S. attorneys positive performance reviews.

"These reports confirm my speculation that the rash of firings that occurred in December was not based on misconduct or poor performances," Feinstein wrote.

A spokeswoman for Gonzales said privacy issues prevented her from talking about performance review details but confirmed Issa's position that the San Diego office had the lowest number of prosecutions of any U.S. attorney's office on the Southwest border.

The spokeswoman, Tasia Scolinos, also said the performance reviews Feinstein referred to evaluated the U.S. attorneys' offices as a whole and "not necessarily ... the U.S. attorneys themselves."

Lam's four-year tenure was highlighted by the investigation and indictment of former 50th District U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who pleaded guilty in late 2005 to taking more than $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for steering tens of millions to defense contractors.

The former eight-term Republican congressman is now serving an eight-year sentence in a federal prison near Tucson. Cunningham's former district covers most of North County including Encinitas, Carlsbad, San Marcos and Escondido.

U.S. Rep. Linda Sanchez, the chairwoman of the subcommittee conducting Tuesday's 2 p.m. House hearing, also sent a letter Gonzales in mid-February suggesting the firings were politically motivated.

In her letter, Sanchez questioned why Lam had been asked to step down even as the investigation into Cunningham's co-conspirators was starting to "bear fruit."

"It is vital that U.S. attorneys be able to prosecute wrongdoing free from political pressure," Sanchez and the others wrote.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will conduct a similar hearing starting at 10 a.m.

The dismissed attorneys issued a joint statement Monday, saying they were given "little or no information about the reason" for their firings.

"When we had new ideas or differing opinions, we assumed that such thoughts would always be welcomed by the department and could be freely and openly debated within the halls of that great institution," they said.

Group Seeks Probe Of Domenici's Call To Iglesias (ALBTRIB)

By Michael Gisick

Albuquerque Tribune, March 6, 2007

Low-profile during his five years as New Mexico's U.S. attorney, David Iglesias now finds himself at the center a growing national controversy.

Although no member of the New Mexico delegation sits on the two congressional committees that will interview Iglesias and other dismissed U.S. attorneys Tuesday, Republicans are expected to ask tough questions about Iglesias' tenure.

Democrats say they believe Iglesias and other federal prosecutors were political victims, and want to know more.

Iglesias is scheduled to testify in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee in a hearing that begins at 8 a.m. New Mexico time. The cable news channel C-SPAN may televise the hearing, but the channel's Tuesday schedule will not be finalized until late this afternoon, a spokesman said.

Iglesias will testify before a House Judiciary subcommittee beginning at noon MST. C-SPAN coverage is possible, but not confirmed as of early today, a C-SPAN spokesman said.

A Washington, D.C., group today called for a congressional investigation into whether Sen. Pete Domenici violated Senate ethics rules by contacting then-U.S. Attorney David Iglesias about an ongoing corruption case.

But about the same time Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said the call to Iglesias looked like political pressure, the Justice Department released information that Domenici, an Albuquerque Republican, had long-held concerns about Iglesias' performance, starting more than a year earlier.

The two announcements help illustrate the debate expected Tuesday as two congressional panels take up the firings of eight U.S. attorneys, including Iglesias: Were the dismissals unwarranted political pressure, or simply the end result of poor performance?

After Iglesias announced last week he had received calls from two members of Congress before the Nov. 7 election pressing him about the pace of corruption investigations involving New Mexico Democrats, Domenici has denied any involvement.

"I have no idea what he's talking about," the senior senator said.

On Sunday, Domenici admitted he had called Iglesias, but denied putting pressure on the U.S. attorney.

The citizen group that filed the complaint points to a Senate ethics rule that say senators "should refrain from intervening" in an ongoing case "until the matter has reached a resolution in the courts."

The manual also indicates that senators are not to communicate with an agency regarding ongoing enforcement or investigative matters, according to CREW.

Apparently based on Iglesias' statements to the press, CREW's complaint alleges Domenici pressured Iglesias to act quickly on the pending corruption investigation.

And in initially denying Iglesias' allegation, Domenici may have violated Senate rules by engaging in "improper conduct which may reflect upon the Senate," the group said in a statement.

In the meantime, the Justice Department said today that Domenici called Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his deputy four times - starting in September 2005 - to question whether Iglesias was "up to the job."

In a written statement this weekend, Domenici apologized for his October phone call to Iglesias, then said he had been concerned for several years about the slow pace of prosecutions.

"New Mexico needed a new U.S. attorney," Domenici concluded.

Iglesias has said he was fired for resisting pressure to rush a corruption probe reportedly focused on Democrats.

Similar claims have been made about seven other U.S. attorneys, all Republicans, fired in recent months. Democrats have called it an unprecedented political purge of federal prosecutors.

Indeed, the Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Tuesday, called by Chairman Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat, is titled, "Preserving Prosecutorial Independence: Is the Department of Justice politicizing the hiring and firing of U.S. attorneys?"

"I would say this statement sets the stage for the hearings," University of New Mexico political science professor Lonna Atkeson said. "I'm sure you'll see the Republicans try to establish these issues."

Ethics rules permit members of Congress to request a status report on a case from federal agents if they're doing so at the behest of constituents.

In his statement, Domenici seemingly moved to insulate himself from ethics charges, saying he'd received a "growing number of inquiries from constituents" about the courthouse case.

"I asked Mr. Iglesias if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at," Domenici said. "It was a very brief conversation, which concluded when I was told that the courthouse investigation would be continuing for a lengthy period.

"In retrospect, I regret making that call and I apologize," the senator said.

Domenici, who recommended Iglesias' appointment by the Bush administration in 2001, said his frustration grew "as we tried to get more resources for it, but public accounts indicated an inability within the office to move more quickly on cases."

Iglesias has said the October calls seemed especially interested in whether indictments in the courthouse case would come ahead of the Nov. 7 election.

U.S. Rep. Heather Wilson, an Albuquerque Republican, was then locked in a bitterly close race with Attorney General Patricia Madrid, whom Wilson had accused of being soft on corruption.

Iglesias has said he felt "violated" by the calls and believes he was fired because he refused to "play ball" by rushing the indictments.

Iglesias has, however, acknowledged that he failed to report the calls to the Justice Department as required, a decision he said he regrets.

Wilson, who has not responded to several reports naming her as the other person who called Iglesias, did not have any comment Sunday, a spokesman said.

As Democrats continue to refer to the firing of the attorneys in the terms of a nefarious mystery, observers say the new majority in Congress is certain to push an issue that pits powerful Republicans against their own appointees as far as they can.

"Where this goes is going to depend on where the Democrats take it," said Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond. "And that's going to depend largely on what the U.S. attorneys have to tell them - what they give the Democrats to work with."

Rep. Linda Sanchez, the California Democrat who heads the House subcommittee that subpoenaed four of the prosecutors, has said contact like that described by Iglesias might violate ethics laws.

While Domenici's statement may have taken some of the heat off her for the moment, Atkeson said Wilson will still have to address the matter. Iglesias has said he will identify who contacted him when he testifies Tuesday.

"I still think this has the potential to be much worse for (Wilson) because she's the one who stood to gain" from the indictments, Atkeson said. "She was the one up for re-election, not Pete."

Lawmakers On The Line (WP)

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

WHEN MEMBERS of Congress call, people listen -- especially if those people are political appointees who owe their positions in part to support from the lawmaker at the other end of the line. That is why the phone calls made to David C. Iglesias, the since-replaced U.S. attorney in New Mexico, by home-state Republicans Sen. Pete V. Domenici and Rep. Heather A. Wilson are so troubling. The Senate and House ethics committees have a duty to investigate.

Mr. Domenici has acknowledged calling Mr. Iglesias, as did Ms. Wilson in a statement to The Post yesterday. Inquiring about the status of a criminal investigation would be ethically dicey under any circumstance, but this was not any old criminal investigation. It was a corruption probe that involved a local Democrat, and the calls were made in the run-up to last November's election, in which Ms. Wilson's seat was in peril amid a swirl of allegations involving congressional Republicans. So when Mr. Domenici says he simply asked the prosecutor "if he could tell me what was going on in that investigation and give me an idea of what time frame we were looking at," the query was not a simple act of senatorial curiosity. It was an ill-advised intrusion into an ongoing criminal investigation.

Mr. Domenici says that "at no time in that conversation or any other conversation with Mr. Iglesias did I ever tell him what course of action I thought he should take on any legal matter. I have never pressured him nor threatened him in any way." Simply placing the phone call was pressure enough, and if Mr. Domenici didn't mean to exert improper pressure on the prosecutor, he should have realized that his actions were nonetheless susceptible to that interpretation.

Mr. Domenici's initial response to the allegations of Mr. Iglesias was to tell reporters, "I have no idea what he's talking about." As his statement on Sunday demonstrated, Mr. Domenici knew full well that he had talked to the prosecutor, and his failure to be forthcoming adds to the questions about his conduct. As for Ms. Wilson, her repeated refusal to answer questions about "that personnel matter" did not reflect well on her. Now she says she had merely been relaying constituent complaints that the prosecutor was "intentionally delaying corruption investigations." She owes her constituents and colleagues an explanation.

Mr. Iglesias should have reported the lawmakers' phone calls to the Justice Department in Washington, as protocol dictates. He is to testify on Capitol Hill about the calls today. That may be illuminating. But more urgent is for the Justice Department to stop hiding behind vague assertions of "performance-related issues" and explain, finally and clearly, why Mr. Iglesias and seven other U.S. attorneys were dismissed.

U.S. attorney scandal update: Who's to blame for those alarming Patriot Act revisions?

The U.S. attorneys purge scandal is heating up. The House and Senate have convened hearings for Tuesday, promising an orgy of named names and pointed fingers. Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., now admits what he once denied: that he may have had a hand in the removal of New Mexico's U.S. attorney. And the senior Justice Department official who personally canned the U.S. attorneys has just announced the date of his resignation.

But as the political scandal spreads, the question at its heart gets less and less public attention: Who changed the Patriot Act to make it easier to replace U.S. attorneys without oversight, and how did it happen with nobody looking?

U.S. attorneys are well aware that they serve at the president's pleasure, but new wording in the Patriot Act made it worth the president's while to fire a big, fat lot of them and hire a group of new ones. And while certainly half the scandal is that the

Justice Department did that—let eight U.S. attorneys go, seemingly for no reason—we seem to have forgotten that even without the mass firings, this law had been changed in the sneakiest way imaginable.

The background: When Congress reauthorized the Patriot Act last year, it included little-noticed language that changed the way U.S. attorneys would be appointed if their predecessors were removed in the middle of their term. Under the old regime, interim U.S. attorneys needed to be confirmed by the Senate after 120 days. If they weren't, federal district judges could select their replacement. The new language removed both judicial and congressional oversight of the interim U.S. attorneys, letting DOJ anoint them indefinitely. This served three important goals: consolidating presidential power, diminishing oversight, and ensuring that "interim" prosecutors had permanent jobs.

On Feb. 6, when the Senate held hearings on the issue of prosecutorial independence, former judiciary committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., proudly claimed to have been as clueless as the rest of us. Denying New York Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer's claim that he or his staff had "slipped the new provision into the Patriot Act in the dead of night," Specter asserted, "The first I found out about the change in the Patriot Act occurred a few weeks ago when Sen. [Dianne] Feinstein approached me on the floor."

Specter added that he only looked into how the provision was altered after Feinstein told him about it. As he explained, "I then contacted my very able chief counsel, Michael O'Neill, to find out exactly what had happened. And Mr. O'Neill advised me that the requested change had come from the Department of Justice, that it had been handled by Brett Tolman, who is now the U.S. attorney for Utah, and that the change had been requested by the Department of Justice because there had been difficulty with the replacement of a U.S. attorney in South Dakota."

Thus, at least according to Specter, O'Neill had merely been following orders from the Department of Justice when he snuck new language into the Patriot Act that would consolidate executive branch authority. Huge relief there.

Now, it's not necessarily outrageous that Sen. Specter didn't know what his subordinate slipped into the legislation. The Patriot Reauthorization was a long and hotly debated bill. While one might hope that the committee chairman would have read the legislation, you can understand that he might skip a clause or two in the melee. But this was not some minor technical amendment. It was a substantial enhancement of executive power. So, Specter now finds himself in an exceedingly strange position: His staff either lied to him or misled him about what he acknowledges to be a significant legal change. He himself observed at that same hearing: "I did not slip it in and I do not slip things in. That is not my practice. If there is some item which I have any idea is controversial I tell everybody about it."

So, Specter concedes that the item is controversial. He denies knowing about it. That implies it was O'Neill who slipped the new language in, and misled Specter and the Senate. And yet, at least as far as I can tell, nobody in power has said a word about O'Neill's conduct, and not one iota of blame has been laid at his doorstep. Joe Conason noted in Salon last month that 1) O'Neill is a former Clarence Thomas clerk, and 2) he joined Specter's staff at the same time Specter was fighting accusations of being wobbly in his fealty to the White House.

The Justice Department has been quite clear that this change was needed to do away with judicial incursions into an executive function: They felt it improper that judges were effectively making executive-branch appointments. And it now seems that either the DOJ snookered O'Neill, O'Neill snookered Specter, or Specter snookered his colleagues. But any way you slice it, the executive seems to have encroached on congressional turf in order to expand executive turf.

Whether Specter actually knew that O'Neill was carrying water for Karl Rove and turned a blind eye, or whether he was duped by O'Neill may never be known. But either way, it seems to me that Specter's office has done terrible damage to the very notion of independent and co-equal branches of government in this affair, and has yet to be called to account for it. Given that respect and esteem for co-equal independent branches of government is one of the senator's sacred cows, it's doubly ironic that no one has questioned him on this.

It's a good thing that the ousted U.S. attorneys will testify before the House and the Senate. It will clear up a good deal of confusion about the Justice Department's claim that there was something wrong with their job performance. But it seems to me that that's precisely 50 percent of the scandal here. And there are some other folks deserving of subpoenas as well. Mr. O'Neill and Mr. Tolman spring to mind. The outrage isn't merely that the Justice Department abused its power to hire and fire. The real scandal is that it rewrote federal laws to do so, yet nobody seems to know who did it or why.

Unaccountably Called To Account (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

So this is what accountability looks, sounds and feels like. It's been so long -- since George W. Bush moved into the White House -- that we hardly recognize what used to be a commonplace phenomenon, as much a part of Washington's behavioral DNA as megalomania and mendacity.

Imagine how surprised Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey must have been when Defense Secretary Robert Gates fired him last week over the shocking neglect of injured veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Gates, who cut his teeth in George Bush the Elder's administration, obviously didn't get the memo about how blatant malfeasance is handled by George Bush the Younger's crew.

Remember what happened to George Tenet (the former CIA director who said it was a "slam-dunk" that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction), Gen. Tommy Franks (who led the Iraq invasion, making decisions that allowed the insurgency to form) and Paul Bremer (who botched the Iraq occupation, allowing the insurgency to grow)? Bush gave them all the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Harvey would have had every right to expect the usual tut-tut from the White House. The commander of Walter Reed, Maj. Gen. George Weightman, had already fallen on his sword. Never mind that Weightman had been in charge only since August, which means he inherited the situation. The post commander was resigning, and that should have been enough. Harvey needed an interim director to run Walter Reed, so he turned to the medical center's former commander, Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, on whose watch the shabby treatment of outpatient vets became standard practice.

Gates was not amused, and the next day Harvey was out of a job. Kiley was out as well, at least as Walter Reed's chief. It's hard to believe, but the officials who presided over a terrible failure of government are actually being held accountable.

This administration's nonchalance about its most grievous transgressions has been stunning, and the only inference that fits the facts is that the people running our government don't really believe in government at all. They certainly haven't taken it seriously.

The White House has accepted even the worst outrages with a shrug. Look at what happened after the Abu Ghraib atrocities came to light. The low-ranking troops who tormented those prisoners were brought to justice. But senior officers -- who should have installed procedures and oversight that never would have let that kind of depravity take place -- were allowed to go their merry way. What message did this send to the Arab world?

The debacle after Hurricane Katrina was so total that the hapless FEMA director, Michael Brown of "heck of a job" fame, had to go. But what did the White House expect, after putting the former judges-and-stewards commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association in charge of marshaling the nation's first response to the disaster? Why did the administration keep Brown on the payroll for weeks as a consultant? And now, with New Orleans and much of the Gulf Coast still prostrate, is anyone being called onto the carpet?

Before Gates arrived, it was awfully difficult to get fired by this administration for failing to do your job. Brown hardly counts, since he never should have been hired in the first place. Donald Rumsfeld presided over the Iraq war mess for years before his policies were essentially rejected by the American people last November. Generally, though, incompetence has not been a firing offense.

Political incorrectness, on the other hand, seems to be more than enough to get you shoved aside.

In December, the Justice Department fired eight U.S. attorneys -- top federal prosecutors -- in New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, California, Washington and Arkansas. The administration acknowledges that one of the prosecutors, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, was ousted so his job could be given to a former aide to White House political czar Karl Rove. Hey, what's wrong with that?

Another of the fired prosecutors, David C. Iglesias, said he was being pressured by two members of Congress to speed up a criminal investigation that involved a Democratic legislator. The pressure came last fall, before the midterm election, Iglesias said. Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) admitted on Sunday that he called Iglesias and asked about the investigation, saying he was looking for "an idea of what time frame we were looking at" -- but he denies pressuring Iglesias.

The White House acknowledges that complaints from members of Congress factored into the decision to fire the prosecutors, who say they had no prior indication of unhappiness with their performance.

Do a good job, do a bad job -- who cares? With his quaint ideas about accountability, clearly Robert Gates doesn't understand how this White House works.

Worth A Second Look (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WHEN LAST we left the question of whether the Bush administration had improperly removed a handful of U.S. attorneys, there was a lot of smoke and no fire. A month later, some of the smoke — such as the theory that Carol Lam was removed in San Diego to thwart the prosecution of a politically connected defense contractor — has dissipated. But other firings have created sparks of concern that Congress is right to investigate.

DOJ_NMG_0140805

A House Judiciary subcommittee has subpoenaed some of the dismissed prosecutors, including Lam, to testify today about their removals. The Senate Judiciary Committee is close behind. We hope that the hearings generate light and not just partisan heat.

Today's star witness is likely to be David Iglesias of New Mexico, who has complained that, before being fired, he was approached by two Republican politicians who wanted him to expedite an investigation that could have embarrassed state Democrats before last November's election. Over the weekend, Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) acknowledged that he had called Iglesias to ask about the "time frame" of that investigation. On Monday, the Justice Department said Domenici called U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales or his deputy on four occasions to complain about the prosecutor.

Last month, Deputy Atty. Gen. Paul J. McNulty assured the Senate Judiciary Committee that none of the removals were designed to thwart ongoing investigations or to punish prosecutors for investigating public corruption. At the same hearing, McNulty said that the firings were "performance related." Yet some of the dismissed prosecutors had received positive evaluations. This seeming contradiction needs to be cleared up, not just by Congress but by the Justice Department's inspector general.

That said, we continue to oppose a proposal by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would return to federal judges the power to appoint interim U.S. attorneys. The bill is grounded in a suspicion that the Bush Justice Department wants to install cronies in U.S. attorneys' jobs indefinitely and without Senate confirmation — a claim the administration denies and must now refute with prompt presidential nominations subject to Senate confirmation.

Even after being approved by the Senate, a U.S. attorney — like a member of the Cabinet — is an officer of the executive branch who under our system of government can be removed by the president at a moment's notice. Congress has no business asking whether such dismissals are wise, but it has every right to determine whether they are intended to thwart or politicize the administration of justice. That question should be the focus of today's hearings.

Purged Prosecutors (HC)

Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, March 6, 2007

Competent U.S. attorneys should not be fired for petty politics or cronyism.

The unprecedented dismissal of eight top U.S. prosecutors at the behest of the White House late last year finally is getting the attention it deserves. House and Senate judiciary committees are preparing to question the ousted U.S. attorneys.

There are indications the purge was anything but the routine bureaucratic shuffle claimed by Justice Department spokesmen. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' deputies gave conflicting explanations as to why the officials were forced to resign.

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam in San Francisco was relieved of her post after successfully prosecuting Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham for taking bribes. In Arkansas, a former aide to Bush political adviser Karl Rove, J. Timothy Griffin, was named as the temporary replacement for H.E. Cummins III.

A former U.S. attorney in New Mexico, David Iglesias, says GOP officials pressured him concerning a pre-election investigation of Democrats before he was forced out. U.S. Sen. Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., admitted contacting Iglesias to inquire about the probe of Democratic state lawmakers and issued an apology. Iglesias says he also was contacted by a second Republican lawmaker, U.S. Rep. Heather Wilson of New Mexico. She has not commented.

Congressional ethics rules mandate that lawmakers refrain from any contact with parties to specific legal actions until the matter has been resolved in the courts. According to the Justice Department, Domenici also repeatedly complained about Iglesias to Attorney General Gonzales and Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty.

All of the ousted attorneys are Bush appointees, with good records as prosecutors. McNulty testified at a congressional hearing that the shake-up occurred because of performance-related issues, but he was mistaken. Most of the attorneys' personnel evaluations turned out to be highly complimentary.

The most innocuous explanation for the mass firing is that White House officials simply wanted to create vacancies so cronies could burnish their resumés during the closing years of Bush's presidency.

Considering that at least one of the dismissed prosecutors was highly effective in bringing corruption cases against high-ranking Republicans, partisan revenge probably played a role in some of the firings.

Former U.S. Attorney Daniel G. Bogden of Nevada told The New York Times that superiors told him he was being dismissed to make room for a favored appointee.

"You hear something like that, there is a sense of disbelief," Bogden said.

DOJ_NMG_0140806

Getting rid of dedicated federal prosecutors in order to dispense their jobs as short-term plums places patronage above justice. If some government attorneys were dismissed in order to derail or speed up investigations for partisan gain, such conduct borders on the criminal.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Supreme Court Turns Down Appeal From Imprisoned Former WorldCom Chief (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, March 6, 2007

The Supreme Court turned down an appeal Monday from former WorldCom chief Bernard Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year prison sentence for fraud and conspiracy.

The justices rejected without comment Ebbers' bid for review of his 2005 conviction based on his contention that he was denied a fair trial.

Ebbers argued in court papers that the trial judge improperly allowed prosecutors to use testimony from witnesses who had been given immunity, but denied immunity to potential defense witnesses.

The judge also instructed jurors that they could find Ebbers guilty if they believed he suspected a crime was being committed but intentionally looked the other way.

A federal appeals court upheld the conviction last year, acknowledging that Ebbers' sentence for a white-collar crime was longer than sentences routinely imposed by many states for violent crimes. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said Ebbers' actions to hide WorldCom's financial problems were substantial and had cost investors dearly.

Ebbers was convicted for his role in the massive fraud that drove Clinton, Miss.-based WorldCom into bankruptcy in 2002.

Investigators uncovered $11 billion in fraud at WorldCom Inc., much of it because accountants were classifying regular expenses as long-term capital expenditures. The company re-emerged under the name MCI. Verizon later bought MCI.

In 2005, the court unanimously threw out the conviction of the Arthur Andersen accounting firm for destroying Enron Corp.-related documents because the jury instructions were too broad.

The case is Ebbers v. United States, 06-590.

Toronto Holding Company Pleads Guilty In Hollinger Fraud Case (AP)

By Mike Robinson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, March 6, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-A private Canadian holding company used by former media baron Conrad Black to control the Hollinger International newspaper publishing empire pleaded guilty Monday to defrauding Hollinger.

Toronto-based Ravelston Inc. entered its plea to a single count of mail fraud as lawyers for Black and the federal government prepared to start jury selection March 14 for his racketeering and fraud trial.

Black, 62, and three other former Hollinger executives are charged with plundering $80 million (â,¬61 million) from Hollinger, mainly by selling off hundreds of community newspapers across the United States and Canada.

Black allegedly received sizable payments from the buyers in exchange for signing agreements not to compete with them by starting or buying newspapers in markets where the ones sold by Hollinger were circulating.

Prosecutors say the non-compete money should have gone to Hollinger shareholders and not into the pockets of Black and other executives.

Black and the three other executives have pleaded not guilty and vowed to fight the charges.

Ravelston had been trying for weeks to plead guilty, but the company was blocked until last week in a Canadian court from going ahead with the plea.

Black owns 65.1 percent of Ravelston and had sought to block the plea. But the company is in receivership and the receiver, who is responsible to the creditors, won permission from a Canadian court last week to go ahead and plead guilty.

Chicago attorney Deborah Steiner, representing Ravelston, entered the plea with authorization from the Toronto-based receiver. Under a signed agreement with prosecutors, the company would pay a $7 million (â,¬5.3 million) fine under terms of the plea agreement.

U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve must still decide whether to give her approval to the agreement.

In pleading guilty, Ravelston admitted its role in a complex legal maneuver growing out of the September 2000 sale of community newspapers.

DOJ_NMG_0140807

The total sale price was $14 million (â,¬10.7 million). Of that amount, $400,000 (â,¬305,740) was set aside as compensation for agreement not to enter into competition.

Ravelston arranged to have $300,000 (â,¬229,305) of the non-compete money sent to Hollinger International, based in Chicago, and 25 percent to Hollinger Inc., a separate Canadian holding company controlled by Ravelston.

Ravelston admitted it knew of no request from the buyer for a non-compete contract with Hollinger Inc., whose name sounds like Hollinger International and which owns part of International but is a separate firm.

Ravelston acknowledged that its decision to siphon $100,000 (â,¬76,435) of International's coffers represented a conflict of interest.

In its plea agreement, Ravelston acknowledged that the loss to Hollinger from the count to which it was pleading guilty was only $100,000. But it also acknowledged that the loss from the entire scheme - which took in a number of other sales of Hollinger International assets - came out to $83,950,000.

How much the decision of Ravelston to plead guilty will affect the Black trial is unclear, but prosecutors already had key documents involved.

Lead prosecutor Eric Sussman declined to comment.

Also Monday, both sides began sorting out the questionnaires that prospective jurors filled out in advance of March 14 jury selection. Defense attorneys agreed on 16 individuals they wanted to exclude from a list of 106 prospective jurors.

St. Eve set a further hearing in the Ravelston case for June 29. 2007

Clock Ticking On Prosecuting Backdating Of Stock Options (MERCN)

By Troy Wolverton

The San Jose Mercury News, March 6, 2007

Federal prosecutors investigating the backdating of stock options are bumping up against a legal deadline that will probably affect when they file charges and what charges they bring.

Under federal law, prosecutors typically have five years to bring charges of securities fraud. For many of the backdating cases, that time window could be closing, because the misdating of stock options largely ended in 2002 thanks to new regulations.

``It's a prevailing issue in most of the cases," said one Bay Area defense attorney, who asked not to be named. Added the attorney, who is a former federal prosecutor, ``Is the government under pressure (to make decisions) sooner rather than later? The answer is yes."

The five-year deadline also means that the government could soon lose the chance to file charges on some of the most egregious instances of backdating.

There are ways around the deadline issue: The government can attempt to pause the clock, for instance, or file charges related to the backdating (for example, conspiracy or lying to prosecutors) if not on the backdating itself. But prosecutors can't get the clock to stop permanently, and the related charges could well be easier for defendants to challenge and can carry lighter penalties.

``There's some room for creativity," said another former federal prosecutor, who also asked not to be named. ``But they don't want to risk that. They want to go with the most solid theory they have."

Quicker indictments

The U.S. Department of Justice investigated alleged backdating at Brocade Communications Systems for 18 months before moving to indict former Chief Executive Greg Reyes. Indictments of officials at other companies could take a fraction of that time, in part because of concern about this legal ticking clock.

Indeed, the pace of the overarching backdating investigation appears to have quickened. In recent days, federal prosecutors secured a guilty plea from a former executive at Monster Worldwide in a backdating case and are reportedly close to bringing similar charges against the former general counsel of McAfee. Take-Two's former CEO also recently pleaded guilty to backdating in New York state court.

Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, declined to say whether the government felt pressured by the five-year deadline or if it would prompt quicker actions in outstanding cases.

``It's something we're aware of," said Macaulay, whose office has been handling the lion's share of the backdating investigations. ``It's something we take into account in the final analysis of how we are investigating and prosecuting cases."

The government can -- and frequently does -- seek waivers from potential defendants that pause the clock. But the government generally has to have a pretty good idea about what charges it might bring against a defendant before it can seek such agreements, meaning that it has to have done at least a cursory investigation.

Even then, defendants don't always agree to them, and when they do, the so-called tolling agreements usually don't last more than six months -- a year at most, legal experts say. At the end of that time, the clock starts ticking again, unless the government can secure another waiver, typically for an even more limited duration.

``The tolling agreement doesn't completely get the government off the hook," the first former prosecutor said. ``You don't know (if) the next time you call for further extension, the answer is going to be no."

A little extra room

However, prosecutors could have a bit of deadline leeway in some cases and with some potential defendants. Even if most backdating ended five or more years ago, the misdated options were generally accounted for inaccurately.

Companies restate their financial results in new regulatory filings years after the fact. Many didn't restate their results until the past six months or so to include the real cost of the backdated options. Theoretically, prosecutors could allege that executives in the know about the backdating were covering it up until recently through the understated financial reports.

``That could extend the statute for a couple years," said Jeffrey Bornstein, a white collar defense attorney with K&L Gates. But he adds, ``I don't know if that's been tested or not."

Judge Declares A Mistrial In BDO Seidman Fraud Case (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

A judge declared a mistrial in a $170 million fraud case against accounting firm BDO Seidman LLP after an attorney for the Portuguese bank suing the firm mentioned the suicide of one of the company's executives, against the judge's orders.

Miami-Dade County Circuit Judge Jose M. Rodriguez agreed with BDO Seidman that it couldn't receive a fair trial.

A lawyer for Banco Espirito Santo SA last week mentioned the suicide while questioning a witness. The judge had prohibited references to the suicide, in an order issued before the trial began.

In a 2004 lawsuit, Banco Espirito Santo accused BDO Seidman of failing to uncover the fraud at a former partner of the bank, E.S. Bankest LLC. The bank said BDO Seidman, hired to audit Bankest's books, failed to find signs of the fraud beginning in the late 1990s in part because the firm had financial ties to another Bankest partner.

The Big Four accounting firms typically settle high-stakes cases. Those actions often involve damage claims that run to the billions, rather than millions, of dollars. But BDO, along with fellow second-tier firm Grant Thornton LLP, are often willing to risk a trial.

A lawyer representing BDO Seidman, Mark Schnapp, argued that the jury would associate the suicide with the uncovering of fraud at the financial-services firm, a connection that was never suggested.

Testimony in the aborted trial began in late January. A meeting was set for tomorrow to plan for a new trial.

Steven Thomas, an attorney for Banco Espirito Santo, said his co-counsel's reference to the suicide was unintentional.

RIM Sets Restatement, Shake-Up On Board In Backdating Fallout (WSJ)

By Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

In the latest fallout from the stock-options backdating scandal, Research in Motion Ltd. said it made widespread accounting errors in issuing some 3,000 improperly dated options grants going back to the 1990s and would take a roughly $250 million restatement.

Co-Chief Executive Jim Balsillie, a recipient of some of the grants improperly accounted for, stepped down as chairman of RIM. He and co-CEO Mike Lazaridis, who also received options, agreed to pay about $4.25 million each "to assist RIM in defraying costs" from the board probe and restatement, the company said.

Though some executives have repaid some gains from backdated shares, no executives have made such payments in the unfolding backdating scandal.

RIM, the maker of the popular BlackBerry hand-held device, said all options granted before late February 2002 and approximately 321 grants made between that time and August 2006 were improperly accounted for. The 321 grants represent approximately 63% of the grants made by the company after Feb. 28, 2002. Correcting the accounting likely will cut earnings up to the end of RIM's fiscal year 2006 by $250 million, a much larger restatement than investors had expected. In September, RIM indicated it would have to restate between $25 million and $45 million in results. The company didn't name a new chairman.

· The News: Research In Motion said correcting options-related accounting errors will reduce earnings through fiscal year 2006 by about $250 million.

· The Backdrop: The maker of the popular BlackBerry devices is among scores of companies hit by options backdating.

· The Explanation: Co-CEO Balsillie said the accounting issue slipped by management amid the company's quick growth.

DOJ_NMG_0140809

RIM posted $382 million in net income on $2.1 billion in revenue in its most recently reported fiscal year, ended March 4, 2006. RIM said the announcement yesterday came after a seven-month probe by a special board committee.

RIM also said Dennis Kavelman, the company's finance chief, will become chief operating officer of administration and operations. Two board members on the compensation committee, E. Kendall Cork, who is with Sentinel Associates Ltd., and Douglas Wright, president emeritus of the University of Waterloo in Ontario, have resigned from all board committees and won't stand for re-election. The company also added two board seats.

RIM said an informal investigation is continuing by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Ontario Securities Commission. RIM shares fell $1.45, or 1%, to $134.52 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The improprieties identified by the board included the practice of backdating options -- that is, pretending they were issued at an earlier time than they actually were, when RIM's share price was lower. Such backdating can increase the payoff for recipients by setting an artificially low strike price, increasing the gain when the options are exercised. About 140 companies are under investigation for backdating.

"It has been determined that several errors occurred in the accounting for options, including the fact that in many cases, the company did not grant options with an exercise price equal to the fair-market value of the shares on the day of the grant," RIM said in a written statement.

BlackBerry Head Ousted; Earnings To Be Restated (WP/BLOOM)

By Chris Fournier And Ville Heiskanen, Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Research in Motion, maker of the BlackBerry e-mail phone, will restate earnings by about $250 million and said James Balsillie will give up his post as chairman following a review of its stock-options grants.

Research in Motion did not find intentional misconduct by its executives, according to a statement released by the company, based in Waterloo, Ontario. The restatements, which are not yet complete, cover more than three years of results dating back to 2004.

The adjustment exceeds an earlier prediction by Research in Motion, which forecast in January that restatements would cut past earnings by more than $45 million. In concluding its options probe, the company said Balsillie would remain co-chief executive as it separates the roles of chairman and chief executive to upgrade corporate governance.

Research in Motion is one of at least 200 companies that have disclosed internal or federal investigations into options. Investigators are trying to determine whether companies inflated the value of employee options by backdating or timing the grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low.

Balsillie and co-chief executive Michael Lazaridis will voluntarily contribute $8.5 million to cover some costs of the review and the restatement, the company said. Directors and officers will return any benefit from mispriced options, the company said.

All grants except those to the company's chief executives were made "by or under the authority of" Balsillie, the company said. A special committee of the board found the company had "failed to maintain adequate internal and accounting controls with respect to the issuance of options in compliance with the company's stock option plan," it said.

Balsillie said in an interview yesterday the company's options probe "hasn't affected our business one bit."

McAfee Plucks EMC Executive For CEO (WSJ)

By Vauhini Vara And Joann S. Lublin

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

McAfee Inc., trying to move past fallout from a federal investigation of its stock-options grants and revive its growth, named EMC Corp. executive David DeWalt as its new chief executive.

The hiring of Mr. DeWalt, EMC's head of world-wide customer operations, comes as McAfee tries to stabilize its executive bench after a string of financial debacles, including probes into improperly dated stock-options grants. Mr. DeWalt, a 42-year-old software industry veteran, will be the Santa Clara, Calif., security-software maker's fourth CEO in six years.

George Samenuk, McAfee's last permanent chief executive before Mr. DeWalt, resigned in October after an internal probe found accounting irregularities related to stock-options grants. Last month, a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint claimed that Mr. Samenuk had known about a change to a 2002 stock-option grant made in his favor by a subordinate. The complaint charged Kent H. Roberts, McAfee's former general counsel, with fraud for his alleged role in manipulating options and followed a criminal indictment of Mr. Roberts. Mr. Samenuk hasn't been charged.

Mr. DeWalt, who starts at McAfee on April 2, is expected to clean up the mess. The company plans to restate several quarters of past financial results in the wake of the stock-options problems. Interim chief Dale Fuller, the board member who temporarily replaced Mr. Samenuk, will remain on the board. Chuck Robel will remain chairman.

Mr. DeWalt joins McAfee as the security-software industry enters a more difficult phase after years of go-go growth. McAfee's antivirus software for home users and companies was once in demand as computer users sought to protect themselves against viruses and worms. But new threats like "phishing" have displaced the old ones, leaving McAfee and other security-software makers scrambling to catch up. Priorities have also shifted at businesses, where security officers are focused on new problems like keeping corporate data from getting lost or stolen. McAfee recently launched products to fight phishing and data leakage, but those areas are already crowded.

McAfee also faces new pressure from big technology companies that are investing heavily in security. International Business Machines Corp., Cisco Systems Inc. and Mr. DeWalt's former employer EMC have all bought security companies in the past year.

McAfee's stock price has risen more than 4% so far this year, fueled partly by rumors that McAfee could be a candidate for a takeover by private-equity investors or a big technology maker. Mr. DeWalt's appointment is likely to quell such speculation, at least for a while. Yesterday the stock was down 43 cents to $29.55 in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

EMC directors tried to keep Mr. DeWalt by offering him a chance to become chief operating officer and possible successor to 59-year-old CEO Joe Tucci, according to one person familiar with the situation. "They certainly wanted [Mr. DeWalt] to stay and made it very difficult for [him] to leave," another knowledgeable individual said.

Though EMC directors were grooming Mr. DeWalt for the corner office, "Tucci isn't going to retire anytime soon," the second person added. And Mr. DeWalt, who ran Documentum Inc., a storage-software vendor that EMC acquired in 2003, "very much wanted to be a CEO" again.

Acceptance of the chief operating officer post also would have required Mr. DeWalt to move cross country. EMC is based in Hopkinton, Mass., while Mr. DeWalt worked from Documentum's Pleasanton, Calif., headquarters. EMC yesterday announced that its vice chairman, Bill Teuber, will expand his responsibilities to include Mr. DeWalt's customer-operations duties.

Mr. DeWalt emerged as front-runner for McAfee CEO soon after the search began last December. "The board was immediately impressed by him because he had been a CEO before" and grew a business with stalled growth, the first informed individual recalled. The main stumbling block was whether McAfee directors "could extract him out of EMC."

The new McAfee leader will enjoy a pay package roughly comparable to Mr. Samenuk's, and include equity partly linked to performance triggers, this person reported. McAfee promised Mr. Samenuk a 2006 salary of $900,000 and set his maximum bonus at $1.35 million for last year, according to McAfee's April 2006 proxy statement.

If Mr. DeWalt thrives running McAfee, there is always the chance that EMC someday might buy his new employer, too. "He could end up being CEO of EMC anyway," the first informed individual observed.

Grasso Case's New Lawyer (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

NEW YORK -- New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo named lawyer Benjamin E. Rosenberg to be his chief trial counsel, a role that will include handling high-profile cases such as the long fight against former New York Stock Exchange Chief Executive Dick Grasso.

Mr. Rosenberg, a partner with law firm Dechert LLP, will start in the state's law-enforcement office Monday, said a spokesman for the attorney general's office. His salary will be $140,000. Mr. Rosenberg, 48 years old, worked on several high-profile white-collar cases while at Dechert, said the attorney general's spokesman. Mr. Rosenberg couldn't be reached to comment.

The attorney general's office won a partial summary judgment in the Grasso case last year, but Mr. Grasso is appealing. A decision on the appeals is expected in coming months, and if Mr. Grasso loses, he may have to give $100 million or more of his compensation back to the NYSE, where he worked for decades. Mr. Grasso has been fighting the case and has said he did nothing to warrant giving back part of his pay package.

Mr. Cuomo's predecessor, New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, brought the case. Mr. Spitzer harshly criticized Mr. Grasso for collecting a pay package of $187.5 million while at the NYSE, which at the time was a not-for-profit company under New York state law.

Some legal experts predicted Mr. Cuomo would focus less on Wall Street cases than Mr. Spitzer. But the appointment of Mr. Rosenberg, a former assistant U.S. attorney in the Southern District of New York, shows that Mr. Cuomo is putting a formidable figure to take over the case against Mr. Grasso.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jurors Consider Cooper Conversation (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Jurors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby indicated yesterday they remain focused on whether Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff lied to the FBI about a July 12, 2003, conversation with Matthew Cooper, then a reporter for Time magazine.

In a note to the presiding judge late yesterday afternoon, jurors asked three questions about how they should decide whether Libby is guilty of making a false statement to investigators about his conversation with Cooper.

After sending the note, the jury concluded its ninth day of deliberations without reaching a verdict. During that time, it has sent U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton five questions about Libby's statements to the FBI regarding his conversation with Cooper.

The note was not released to the public. According to a partial description by Walton, who summoned lawyers for both sides to go over the note, the 11 jurors sought in one of the three questions to know whether they may consider Libby's March 2004 grand jury testimony about his conversation with Cooper as they deliberate whether he made false statements to the FBI months beforehand about the same conversation.

Libby gave the FBI and the grand jury similar descriptions of the conversation, saying he passed along gossip from other reporters about an undercover CIA officer to Cooper, and told Cooper he was not sure it was true. But the grand jury testimony is tape-recorded, and the defense has questioned the accuracy of an FBI agent's notes.

Walton released the jury for the day and said he would decide how to instruct them today.

Libby, 56, is charged with five felony charges of lying to the FBI and grand jury about his role in disclosing the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media. Her name and CIA job were revealed in a syndicated column in July 2003, days after her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly accused the White House of twisting intelligence he had gathered.

The CIA sent Wilson to Africa in 2002 to assess reports that Iraq had been trying to buy uranium from Niger for use in a nuclear weapons program. Wilson concluded those reports were baseless, and shortly after the Iraq war began, denounced President Bush and Cheney for using the claim as a central argument for war.

Prosecutors allege that, in the spring and early summer of 2003, Libby was part of a White House campaign to discredit Wilson, then lied to investigators to protect his job and spare Cheney and Bush political embarrassment.

Defense attorneys contend their client inaccurately remembered conversations about Wilson and Plame because he was busy with critical national security issues.

Also yesterday, defense and prosecution lawyers argued about how Walton should respond to a question the jury posed Friday about the definition of reasonable doubt. He responded by asking the jury for more information.

Libby's Jurors Inquire About One Charge (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — The jury considering the perjury case against I. Lewis Libby Jr. suggested on Monday that some of its members were deeply uncertain about one of the five felony charges.

Before the jurors departed at the end of their ninth day of deliberations, they sent a note to Judge Reggie B. Walton asking for clarification of Count 3, in which Mr. Libby is charged with giving a false statement to an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is charged with lying to the F.B.I. and to a grand jury investigating the leak, in 2003, of the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative, Valerie Wilson.

Judge Walton did not disclose the text of the query, which he is expected to address on Tuesday. But in the discussions he had with both sides' lawyers, it appeared that the jury was asking whether its members might consider Mr. Libby's testimony to the grand jury in March 2004 to help determine whether he made a false statement in his F.B.I. interview six months earlier.

The false-statement charge, which many lawyers view as the weakest count, involves a conversation Mr. Libby had on July 12, 2003, with Matthew Cooper, then a reporter for Time magazine, about Ms. Wilson.

Judge Walton has also yet to deal with a jury request to explain further the concept of reasonable doubt.

FBI To Probe Wal-Mart Employee (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0140812

By Jonathan Birchall

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

The FBI is investigating the activities of a Wal-Mart "technician" who was fired by the retailer after it learnt that the employee had been intercepting electronic messages transmitted by people outside the company.

A company spokeswoman said the employee had used personal equipment to intercept all text messages sent "within a few miles" of Wal-Mart's Bentonville headquarters, and had collected messages containing certain key words, without giving more details.

ADVERTISEMENT

The unnamed "technician" also had been involved in recording telephone conversations between its public relations staff and a reporter for The New York Times without appropriate clearance, said Mona Williams, the Wal-Mart spokeswoman.

The company gave no details of the objective of the surveillance, which marks the latest in a series of internal scandals at the largest US retailer.

It follows trouble last year at Hewlett-Packard, the computer maker, over questionable techniques used in a leak investigation to obtain phone records.

Wal-Mart said it had found no evidence that the employee, who worked in the company's information systems division, was acting on anyone else's orders. "As far as we know, he was acting alone," Ms Williams said.

Wal-Mart said it had learnt about the phone surveillance from another company employee in January and had informed the FBI, which has now launched an investigation into the affair.

The retailer said that while recording phone conversations involving its employees was not illegal, the taping of the reporter's conversations over a four-month period had been carried out without the necessary approval.

It said that "the interception of text messages and pages that does not involve Wal-Mart associates is not authorised by company policies under any circumstances".

Wal-Mart Tapings Spark Probe (WSJ)

By Gary Mcwilliams

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Federal investigators are probing a Wal-Mart Stores Inc. employee's electronic interception of telephone conversations and text messages of other employees and outsiders, including a New York Times Co. reporter.

People familiar with the issue said the criminal probe targets an employee who was searching for the identities of those who had leaked embarrassing company memos to the newspaper and others. Wal-Mart has been the subject of articles by the Times and others for its health-care, wage and benefit policies.

· News: Investigators are probing a Wal-Mart employee's interception of phone conversations and text messages of other employees and outsiders, including a New York Times reporter.

· Background: Wal-Mart has been the subject of articles by the Times and others for its health-care, wage and benefit policies.

· The Law: U.S. law prohibits intercepting wireless communications without a court order.

The U.S. attorney for Western District of Arkansas confirmed it has begun a probe after being notified by the Bentonville, Ark., retailer of the recordings and electronic interceptions. Deborah Groom, first assistant U.S. attorney, declined to say whether it had subpoenaed records or interviewed employees of the world's largest retailer.

Mona Williams, a Wal-Mart vice president, said the retailer fired two employees of its computer-systems department as a result of a nearly two-month internal review. One was a manager, who was dismissed yesterday. A third employee, also a computer-systems unit manager, was disciplined but not fired for "failure to carry out management duties," Ms. Williams said.

The technician, who Ms. Williams wouldn't identify further, had programmed the company's computers to search for calls originating from or directed to a Times reporter and to record those calls. A handful of other calls also were recorded, the Wal-Mart spokeswoman said. While she wouldn't name the reporter, people familiar with the issue said Times staff reporter Michael Barbaro was the primary target of the interceptions.

Wal-Mart Chief Executive H. Lee Scott Jr. personally apologized to Janet Robinson, chief executive of the New York Times, in a telephone call yesterday. The spokeswoman also personally contacted the Times reporter to deliver the news, she said.

In a statement, the Times said: "We are troubled by what appears to be inappropriate taping of our reporter's conversations. At this point we don't know many of the key facts such as what the purpose of this taping was and the extent, if any, to which the action was authorized."

The effort captured calls for a four-month period beginning in September and continuing until January of this year, Ms. Williams said. She added the technician used wireless equipment brought into the retailer's headquarters to capture text messages from personal digital assistants and pagers within a several mile radius of its Bentonville headquarters. She described the wireless equipment as the employee's personal gear.

Those text messages, from a variety of sources, were stored on company-owned computers and later scanned for unidentified "key words" that the employee had designated. Wal-Mart declined to identify the words.

Ms. Williams also wouldn't reveal the technician's motivations for recording the calls and messages, citing the federal investigation. She confirmed agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation were carrying out the probe for the U.S. Attorney's office.

The recordings began about the same time that a former Hewlett-Packard Co. board member publicly exposed a similar effort at the Palo Alto, Calif., computer maker. There, company-paid investigators had improperly obtained phone records and text messages of employees and news reporters in an effort to identify the source of embarrassing leaks about its former chief executive. Those complaints led to indictments of Patricia Dunn, the company's former chairwoman, and others.

U.S. law prohibits the interception of wireless communications without a court order. Wal-Mart said the technician's recording of phone calls involving its employees isn't against the law in Arkansas, but violated its corporate policies. It said recording text messages violates its corporate policies as well as U.S. law.

The two employees fired include a computer technician who allegedly intercepted and recorded phone calls, pager and text messages, and the technician's boss. Ms. Williams declined to further identify them.

"As far as we know, he was acting on his own," she said of the fired technician. "We can't speak to why the technician did what he did." She declined to say how many messages were intercepted during those four months.

Wal-Mart said it launched an internal investigation and contacted the U.S. attorney in January after an employee reported the interceptions. An internal investigation found phone, pager and text messages were captured and stored on its computers.

In the case of Hewlett-Packard, director Thomas Perkins had complained of the tactics being used by outside investigators hired to find the source of information leaks to reporters. Private investigators hired by H-P were accused of illegally accessing phone records of reporters, employees and directors. Criminal charges were filed by the California attorney general against Ms. Dunn, who pleaded not guilty, and security experts used by the company.

Wal-Mart Says Employee Taped Reporter's Calls (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Federal investigators are looking into the actions of a computer systems technician at Wal-Mart Stores who, over a period of several months, intercepted pager and text messages and also secretly taped telephone conversations between Wal-Mart employees and a reporter for The New York Times, the company said yesterday.

The United States attorney's office for the Western District of Arkansas and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are assessing the actions of the employee and others inside Wal-Mart to determine whether federal and state laws were broken and whether they have jurisdiction in the matter, according to spokesmen for the investigators' offices.

Wal-Mart said the technician was not authorized to monitor and tape the conversations between members of its media relations staff and Michael Barbaro, a retail reporter for The Times.

The company did not say what led the technician to make the recordings or why Mr. Barbaro's conversations were the target.

Over the last year, Mr. Barbaro has written dozens of articles about Wal-Mart, including some that were based on internal company documents that were given to him by union-financed groups that were critical of Wal-Mart's business practices.

Mona Williams, a spokeswoman for Wal-Mart, which is based in Bentonville, Ark., said the company fired the technician and a supervisor yesterday. A third manager in Wal-Mart's information technology group was disciplined. Ms. Williams declined to identify the technician or his supervisors.

H. Lee Scott Jr., Wal-Mart's chief executive, called the chief executive of The New York Times, Janet L. Robinson, early yesterday to explain the situation and apologize, Ms. Williams said.

Ms. Williams added that she contacted Mr. Barbaro and personally apologized to him, as well.

Wal-Mart said it began an internal investigation into the matter on Jan. 11 after executives were notified by an employee about the recordings. It then notified the United States attorney's office two days later.

Over the course of a two-month internal investigation, Wal-Mart discovered that the technician had used a program that identified calls coming in from, or made to, Mr. Barbaro at The Times's New York headquarters from last September to mid-

DOJ_NMG_0140814

January, Ms. Williams said. The inquiry involved an outside technology firm that scoured more than 100 computer drives and other devices, she said.

Members of the media relations group, including Ms. Williams, were unaware they were being taped, Ms. Williams said.

"No one knew he was recording these conversations," Ms. Williams said in a conference call with reporters yesterday afternoon. "As a matter of fact, I'm not even sure he knew whose conversations he was recording. He simply programmed in the reporter's phone number and captured those calls."

It is unclear whether the technician was able to sort Mr. Barbaro's calls from those other Times reporters might have made to Wal-Mart since all calls from the newspaper's New York office register on caller ID screens as a series of numeral 1s.

The technician told investigators of some motives for his actions, Ms. Williams said, but she declined to say what they were because of the continuing investigations.

In a statement, a spokeswoman for The Times, Diane C. McNulty, said: "We are troubled by what appears to be inappropriate taping of our reporter's conversations. At this point, we don't know many of the key facts, such as what the purpose of this taping was and the extent, if any, to which the action was authorized."

Mr. Barbaro declined to comment.

At first blush, it does not appear that the taping of the conversations was illegal.

Under federal and Arkansas state law, a telephone conversation can be recorded if one party has given consent. Wal-Mart said that under its policy, all employees give their consent to the monitoring and recording of their calls made through Wal-Mart systems and equipment.

Wal-Mart said, however, that calls were monitored only in cases of suspected criminal activity or fraud and only with written consent from the company's legal department. No approval for the recordings was sought or given, the company said.

Ms. Williams added that in the course of the investigation only one person — a "senior-level lawyer" at Wal-Mart — listened to parts of the tapes between Mr. Barbaro and the media group.

The focus of any criminal investigation might be on the text messages and the pages transmitted near company headquarters by people who were not Wal-Mart employees; the technician made those interceptions using his own personal radio-frequency equipment.

"He captured all of the text messages that were within a range of his equipment," Ms. Williams said. "Some of those messages had key words in them that he was watching for. Those were captured and put into a separate file or bucket from the others." She declined to provide details of the messages or motives for those actions by the technician.

Federal and most state laws forbid the unauthorized interception of messages, said Rodney Smolla, dean of the University of Richmond Law School.

Wal-Mart Worker Secretly Taped Reporter's Calls (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

An employee for Wal-Mart secretly taped phone conversations between members of its public relations staff and a reporter at the New York Times, and intercepted text messages between people who do not work for the company, Wal-Mart officials disclosed yesterday.

Wal-Mart fired the technician it said was responsible and the employee's supervisor, both of whom worked in information systems at the retailer's headquarters in Bentonville, Ark. Another manager was disciplined. Spokeswoman Mona Williams said she could not say why the technician recorded the conversations.

"I can't really speak for why the associate did this," Williams told reporters yesterday during a conference call. "No one knew that he was recording these conversations."

The U.S. attorney's office for the Western District of Arkansas has opened an investigation into the case to determine whether the technician violated federal wiretapping laws, said Deborah Groom, first assistant attorney. A spokesman for the FBI did not return several phone calls or respond to an e-mail asking whether an investigation was underway.

The conversations took place between September and January and involved New York Times reporter Michael Barbaro, according to the newspaper's spokeswoman, Diane McNulty. Barbaro, who formerly worked for The Washington Post, wrote 38 articles about or referencing Wal-Mart during that time, including articles about new uniforms for workers, the retailer's marketing of energy-efficient light bulbs and the departure of top advertising executives.

Wal-Mart told the Times about the tapes yesterday. McNulty said the Times was not planning legal action, but was concerned about the actions. Reached by e-mail, Barbaro declined to comment.

"We are troubled by what appears to be inappropriate taping of our reporter's conversations," McNulty said. "At this point, we don't know many of the key facts."

Federal and Arkansas law allow a telephone call to be recorded if one party consents. Wal-Mart said all its employees consent to a blanket policy that allows electronic communications to be monitored or recorded at any time. But the retailer said it tapes phone calls only in "compelling circumstances," such as suspected criminal fraud or security issues, with written permission from its legal department. Williams said the recordings did not meet that threshold and that the employees speaking with Barbaro did not know they were being taped.

An investigation could include an examination of the strength of Wal-Mart's policy, said Mark Rasch, managing director of technology for consulting firm FTI and a former federal prosecutor who specialized in computer crime. Having a policy does not automatically imply consent, he said, especially if workers have reason to believe it would not be applied.

"It has to be well known, well distributed, and it's got to be used at some point," he said.

The technician also captured text messages and pages between people who do not work for Wal-Mart that were sent with beepers or handheld devices from several miles around the retailer's headquarters, Williams said. Data including certain keywords were routed into a specified file, she said.

Williams said none of the intercepted information involved reporters or public figures.

Wal - Mart Fires Worker Over Eavesdropping (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

NEW YORK (AP)-- Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said Monday it fired a systems technician who allegedly recorded phone conversations between the company's public relations office and a newspaper reporter. The case is now being investigated by federal authorities.

Wal-Mart said the technician, whom it did not identify, also intercepted text messages using his own personal equipment. The retailer said he was acting alone, but declined to say what his motive may have been.

Wal-Mart said its internal investigation began on Jan. 11 after an unidentified party alerted the company. That led to the discovery that the technician had monitored and recorded phone conversations between Wal-Mart's public relations staffers and a New York Times reporter between September 2006 and January 2007. Wal-Mart said it notified The New York Times earlier Monday.

A New York Times spokeswoman, Diane McNulty, identified the reporter as retail writer Michael Barbaro. She said the newspaper does not plan "to take any legal action at this time."

During the investigation, Wal-Mart said it discovered that, in separate instances, the same technician had intercepted text and pager messages, including communications that did not involve Wal-Mart employees.

The eavesdropping by an employee is only the latest controversy for the world's largest retailer, whose stock has been battered in recent months as sales growth stalled. The company also has been targeted by union-back groups about its health care benefits and wages. It also is fighting a class action lawsuit that accuses it of gender discrimination.

Wal-Mart spokeswoman Mona Williams said the technician "acted alone" and used his own personal equipment to intercept the text messages. "I can't speak for why he did what he did," she said.

Williams declined to identify who the targets were besides the Times reporter, but said they did not include the company's union-backed critics like WakeUpWalmart.com or Wal-Mart Watch. No other journalists' calls or messages were tapped, she said.

But Chris Kofinis, a spokesman for WakeUpWalmart.com, questioned that assertion, saying "we're deeply concerned that our privacy was violated."

Williams said the technician gave Wal-Mart some indication about why he targeted the New York Times reporter, who has been covering such issues as the company's labor rescheduling program and wage capping, but couldn't go into detail now that the investigation has been turned over to federal authorities.

Barbaro declined comment.

Wal-Mart said it would never authorize the interception of text messages and pages that do not involve Wal-Mart associates, the company's name for its workers.

Wal-Mart said it notified its audit committee of the allegations on Jan. 12 and on the next day, attorneys for the company notified the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Arkansas.

The company kept the U.S. Attorney updated during its internal investigation. Last Thursday, the U.S. Attorney notified Wal-Mart that it would conduct its own investigation.

"We are looking at this to determine if there has been a violation of federal law in our jurisdiction," said U.S. Assistant Attorney General Deborah Groom Monday. "That's really the only comment I can make at this time."

DOJ_NMG_0140816

FBI officials in Washington said Monday the agency is reviewing the information "to determine if there was a violation of federal law and if the FBI has jurisdiction."

The company said it believes the unauthorized recording of telephone conversations by the systems technician did not violate any applicable federal or state laws because Wal-Mart policies subject all employees communications to possible monitoring or recording.

However, Wal-Mart said it records associate phone calls only in "compelling circumstances and with written permission from the legal department." The company said that the threshold for this permission is "high and limited to cases of high risk to the company or its associates, such as suspected criminal fraud or security issues."

In addition to firing the technician, Williams said it also fired the technician's direct supervisor and has taken disciplinary action against a management associate for failure to carry out their management duties.

Wal-Mart announced that it has taken a number of steps to strengthen its policies and controls surrounding the monitoring of recording of communications, effective immediately. It has also physically removed the recording equipment and any related hardware from the system.

"The company believes that these pager intercepts and the recordings of these telephone calls were wrong and has taken a number of actions to further strengthen our policies and controls," said Williams in a statement.

N.J. Man Accused Of Defrauding Cisco Of More Than $10M (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, AP Technology Writer

AP, March 6, 2007

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- A computer technician working for the city of Newark, N.J., was arrested on charges he defrauded technology giant Cisco Systems Inc. of more than $10 million by cheating one of the company's programs for replacing broken or defective parts.

Michael Kyereme, 40, of Piscataway, N.J., was arrested Friday on a charge of mail fraud and made his initial appearance in Newark federal court on Monday, according to the FBI. He will remain in custody at least until a bail hearing Thursday.

Kyereme worked as independent contractor for Newark, assisting city employees when their computers needed troubleshooting, the FBI said. When he could not resolve a problem without outside help, he was authorized to contact Cisco for technical assistance and to order replacement parts.

According to the criminal complaint, Kyereme ordered about 280 parts from Cisco since August 2002 _ some worth more than $250,000 _ and made false claims that they were replacements for Cisco parts in the city's computer system that were "dead" or "not responding."

Kyereme is accused of cheating a Cisco program that requires the company to immediately replace broken or defective equipment without customers having to send in the problem parts first.

Investigators said Kyereme ordered replacements for pricey equipment that the city never had or didn't need replaced, sold the new gear to an out-of-state computer reseller, and pocketed the profits. He often didn't send back the parts he claimed were defective, and in some cases sent back the wrong parts that were worth less than the defective hardware, the FBI said.

A search of Kyereme's home on March 2 uncovered more than $3 million worth of parts that he ordered under false pretenses, the FBI said.

According to the criminal complaint, Kyereme told investigators that he was offered an "overwhelming" amount of money by the unidentified computer reseller to procure the Cisco parts and that "I knew what I was doing was wrong and that it was stealing."

A call to Kyereme's lawyer by The Associated Press was not immediately returned late Monday.

Kyereme's arrest was the second in a week involving a multimillion-dollar scam of Cisco's equipment-replacement program.

Michael Daly, 53, of Danvers, Mass., was arrested Tuesday on a wire fraud charge after he allegedly used false identities in 39 states and ordered replacement parts at least 700 times from Cisco without ever returning the defective items, or in some cases returning worthless parts that weren't covered under the program.

A Cisco spokesman declined to comment, other than to say the San Jose-based company is aware of the investigations and is cooperating with authorities.

Federal Prosecutor In R.I. Goes To New Orleans To Fight Crime There (SCRIPPS)

By Mike Stanton, The Providence Journal

DOJ_NMG_0140817

Scripps Howard News Service (DC), March 6, 2007

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- Federal prosecutor Richard Rose makes presentations at schools on a regular basis. He has T-shirts and runs through the names of those killed by gang violence in Providence.

During the past few years, Rose has made a program called Street Smarts his mission as the anti-gang coordinator for the Rhode Island U.S. Attorney's office. He has spoken to more than 3,400 schoolchildren about the dangers of the streets, relating his own experiences as a fatherless black youth growing up in Providence.

The music that accompanies Rose's school presentation of the roll call of Providence dead is a New Orleans funeral dirge, by Wynton Marsalis. The music is part of a larger piece, writes author Stanley Crouch, "moving from a funeral march to a sermon to jubilation as the band comes back from the burying ground with an affirmative prance bent on beating the Devil and death itself."

Now Rose, the man best known for prosecuting ex-Providence Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr., is headed to New Orleans, where death is a near-daily occurrence in the wake of Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

Rose, 48, is part of a federal task force of prosecutors and agents from throughout the country who will spend the next six months in the Crescent City, combating the escalating gun violence. He is among the second wave of federal reinforcements in a program that began last year. On Wednesday, Rose will report for duty at the U.S. Attorney's office there.

"We've got to take the cowboys off the streets," said Rose, in an interview last week. "They had 161 murders last year, in a city of 200,000. Two weeks ago they had seven shootings in nine hours, five of them fatal _ that's a whole year for us!"

Katrina overwhelmed the city's law-enforcement structure, he noted. Floodwaters destroyed evidence and rendered courtrooms useless. Outside of the relatively safe tourist districts, criminals flooded lawless streets, emboldened by the chaos. Rose cried with his daughter as he watched television footage of refugees streaming across a bridge "like survivors in a B-movie where the nuclear bomb is dropped."

"The people with the resources got out," said Rose. The survivors have been left to "fight among the ruins."

Besides talking to students, Rose is part of a national effort by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to make gang and gun violence a top priority, second only to terrorism. While programs such as Street Smarts represents "the carrot," Rose also wields "the stick" by preaching zero tolerance. In the courtroom, he uses stiff mandatory minimum prison sentences to prosecute gun and drug crimes that the federal authorities would have ignored a few years ago.

Rose, who has been a federal prosecutor for 12 years, doesn't know what to expect in New Orleans. Federal drug and gun arrests are up. Last week, a man was indicted on federal charges of possession of a handgun at a Mardi Gras parade. A woman is charged with giving her 17-year-old son a gun that he allegedly used to kill another 17-year-old who had beaten him up.

Rose has read the online guidebooks that describe neighborhoods with soaring crime rates and streets still littered with debris. He will live in the Warehouse District, near the Mississippi River.

"There aren't many professions where you can do this," said Rose. "I have a great job and a great career, and now I have a chance to go down there and help a community in desperate need. Maybe I can learn some things that I can bring back and apply to Street Smarts."

Gang Peacemaker's Death Imperils Truce In Boston (USAT)

By Rick Hampson, USA TODAY

USA Today, March 6, 2007

BOSTON — Two hooded strangers walked out of the darkness at the end of the street.

Jahmol Norfleet and his sister Teah, standing in front of their apartment house that night last November, stopped talking. On Holworthy Street, an unfamiliar face could mean danger — even since Jahmol, a leader of the notorious H Block gang, helped arrange a truce four months earlier in the city's bloodiest street war.

In the 18 months before the truce, about two dozen people were shot. Jahmol himself was an inch from death; there was a crease where the bullet grazed his scalp. After that he took a gun to school, got busted and spent a year in jail.

Then the gangster turned peacemaker. At a secret summit, H Block and its rival gang, Heath Street, agreed to a truce. When word finally leaked out, Boston was enthralled. Perhaps the truce could spread across the city, maybe even across a nation where gang violence was helping jack up the crime rate for the first time in 15 years.

So as the two strangers came down Holworthy, Teah would recall, she fought the impulse to run. After all, it was peacetime. Suddenly, the guys reached under their sweatshirts, pulled out pistols, charged through the parked cars and opened fire.

When it was over, Jahmol lay dead on the sidewalk.

DOJ_NMG_0140818

The next day, Mayor Thomas Menino praised the young man for trying to "change his neighborhood from a place of violence to a community of peace." But now, three months after his death, it's unclear whether the gang truce is a national model, or even if it still exists.

National surge of violence

America has had street gangs almost as long as it's had streets. But gangs are turning up in more places, including towns, suburbs, even agricultural areas — "spreading like a virus," according to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Kevin O'Connor, an associate deputy U.S. attorney general, said at a conference on gangs last month that there was "a resurgence of gang violence in several U.S. cities." The Justice Department is surveying about 20 communities to determine how bad the problem is.

The National Youth Gang Center estimates the national number of gang members rose to 760,000 in 2004, the most recent year figures are available, up from 731,000 two years earlier. Los Angeles alone has about 40,000 gang members; the police say violent gang-related crime rose 14% last year.

Law enforcers are trying many strategies — midnight basketball leagues, gun buybacks, neighborhood sweeps, "start snitchin' " campaigns. None has approached the success a decade ago of what Newsweek hailed as "the Boston Miracle."

In the mid-1990s a coalition of law enforcers, social workers and inner-city black ministers imposed a gang cease-fire with a carrot-and-stick promise to gangsters: Keep fighting and face tighter probation checks, arrests on outstanding warrants, federal prosecution; stop and have a chance at a summer job, tutoring, a break in sentencing.

Its organizers drifted to other jobs or causes — including exporting the program to other cities — and some of its tactics were abandoned.

Jahmol Norfleet became enmeshed in an attempt to recapture and update that miracle. It was a risk, but, as he told Miniard Culpepper, a government lawyer and part-time pastor who became his mentor, he thought peace was worth it.

A tough beginning

Jahmol grew up poor. His parents split up, and he was raised by his grandmother in Roxbury, one of the city's toughest neighborhoods. In one thing he was lucky: He first hit the streets in the mid-'90s, during the Boston Miracle.

From 1990, when Jahmol was 5, to 1999, when he was 14, annual homicides in Boston dropped from 152 to 31.

He made it to his freshman year at Burke High School without incident. People liked 'Mol — the smile, the personality, the charm. "He'd always greet you — 'Hi Mr. B, how you doin?' " recalls Roscoe Baker, the dean of discipline.

Then he began to hang with kids like Yorki Lipscomb, whom police would later describe as a member of a gang named after a cluster of "H" streets — Humbolt, Holworthy, etc.

Heath Street, the rival gang, was based less than a mile away, in the big Bromley-Heath public housing project. The gangs shot it out over minor drug deals, turf, respect — all just a few miles from where tourists trod the Freedom Trail.

Although Baker and others say they thought Jahmol was good enough to play college basketball, he dropped off the school team. Soon his rap sheet had arrests for possession of marijuana and assault.

When he saw Jahmol at the basketball court, Culpepper would talk to him as long as he could. After the boy reached high school in 2001, the talks got shorter and shorter. Finally, Culpepper lost track of him altogether.

Jail and reform

Jahmol and some other H Block members were on the street one night in December 2004 when other youths began shooting, grazing Jahmol on the head, according to his relatives. His grandmother remembers him in the hospital, crying. For the first time, he seemed scared.

His family says that's when he began carrying a handgun wherever he went. On Feb. 8, 2005, he was taking his coat out of his school locker when the gun fell onto the hall floor. He got a mandatory year prison sentence for gun possession.

For most gangsters, jail is a criminal confirmation ritual; for Jahmol, it was aversion therapy. In letters and calls home, he professed his hatred for the routine, the boredom, the confinement.

The worst came that April, when his friend Lipscomb was shot. He died on the street, in the rain, a gun in his pocket.

There were no arrests. Out of hatred of the cops or fear of the perps, witnesses to gang shootings often refused to cooperate — to "snitch." Those seeking justice or vengeance were left to help themselves.

"These kids (Lipscomb's H Block mates) are on the warpath," Lipscomb's father later told The Boston Herald. "If the police don't get someone, it's going to get worse."

It did. On Nov. 28, 2005, Carl Searcy, a member of Heath Street, was shot to death as he rode his bike from a friend's house.

In a letter home, Jahmol wrote: "I don't want to live like this, and I don't want to die for violence. I want to die grey and old."

On the phone, he told his sister Teah, a year younger than he, the same thing.

DOJ_NMG_0140819

"He said he wasn't gonna carry a gun anymore," she says. "He said he didn't care if they were gonna come shoot him down. He wasn't carrying a gun anymore."

Jahmol was released from prison on Feb. 9, 2006. He got a job and started studying for his GED. Baker, the high school dean, was startled by the transformation. "He seemed to have grown up. … You could see it in his face, his body, his gestures, his conversation. It was not the same Jahmol."

Deric Quest, an employment counselor, also was surprised. Gang leaders were jumpy, surly, uncooperative. This guy was on the front of his seat, all eye contact. "He was proud to have a certain street rep, but he didn't have a threatening bone in his body," Quest says. "He didn't seem like a gang leader as much as the leader of his friends."

Culpepper, meanwhile, had been spending time with H Block, trying to defuse the feud with Heath Street. By now — early 2006 — the Boston Miracle was a memory. The city had 75 murders in 2005, the most in a decade.

Culpepper had an idea he called "Adopt-a-Gang," in which ministers would work one-on-one with gangs to turn them from violence. H Block, however, didn't want to be adopted. Culpepper needed to find a leader to hook into. Then, one day at the basketball court, there was Jahmol.

After they got reacquainted, Culpepper made his pitch: H Block would establish a truce with Heath Street and get GED tutoring and job counseling. There'd be perks like a basketball tournament at the park, Celtics tickets, a fishing trip.

In the Boston Miracle, peace had been imposed for a time by superior outside force; now, gangs themselves would make peace, face to face, because they wanted to. Truces had been tried elsewhere, but they never lasted. This one could, Culpepper told H Block: "You need peace. You need something better than a gun."

Since leaving jail, Jahmol had realized how much he couldn't do, how many places he couldn't go, because of "the problem."

"OK, Rev," he said. "We'll do it."

Culpepper also had been bugging Jahmol without success to come to church. Then, one Sunday morning in June, the gang leader walked in and sat in the last seat in the last pew.

Over the next few months, he gradually moved up the aisle, until he was third from the front. A few of his tough-looking friends began to come, too — proving that H Block would follow him anywhere.

The peace summit

Last July 24, Jahmol rode in a church van through neighborhoods he'd never seen before, heading … where?

That was a secret. He and his boys had been frisked for weapons, relieved of their cellphones and told only that they were going to a "peace summit" with Heath Street.

The summit was the result of weeks of shuttle diplomacy by Jeffrey Brown, a minister who'd been involved in the Boston Miracle. He and other members of the old Miracle team had worked with Heath Street, using the carrot and stick; Culpepper focused on H Block, using mostly carrot.

Finally the van moved onto a peninsula in Boston Harbor and to the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library, which had hosted antagonists from battlefields such as Belfast and Gaza. Culpepper had to smile at the thought of it: for Jahmol, who had rarely ventured outside the 'hood, it might as well have been the moon.

The gangsters sat across from each other, six on a side, at two rectangular tables about 5 feet apart. Moderators, including Rufus Faulk, a social worker who grew up on H Block turf, sat in between. This is like the United Nations, he thought. Where we come from, this doesn't happen.

The gangs agreed they could go on each other's turf — each side had girlfriends living behind enemy lines — if they behaved respectfully. In case of an incident, there'd be no immediate retaliation. A minister would be called and the incident quickly investigated.

Pizza and soda were served. Only 45 minutes after the conference began, it was over.

On the ride home, Jahmol was euphoric, "like a weight was lifted off his shoulders," Faulk recalls.

There were ominous signs, however. Not everyone shook hands at the end of the meeting; some, Faulk noticed, weren't ready. And the grievances underpinning the feud had not been aired. "It seemed like it would have been beating a dead horse," Faulk says.

In November The Boston Globe, citing anonymous sources, broke the story of the gang summit and truce. The paper said that crime in general was down on the gangs' turf and that other gangs had asked for similar talks.

Mayor Menino, eager for a second Boston Miracle, praised the truce. Jack McDevitt, a Northeastern University criminologist and government consultant, said it could be a model for other cities; if H Block and Heath Street could make peace, anyone could.

DOJ_NMG_0140820

On Nov. 28, seven days before his 21st birthday, Jahmol sat down at the church with Quest, the jobs counselor. He seemed relaxed — maybe too relaxed, Quest says: "He looked awfully comfortable, like he'd hit the Megabucks or something. That scared me, because he didn't appear to be on his guard. I wondered, 'Is the other side as relaxed as Jahmol?' "

Two hours later, the peacemaker was dead.

Detectives noted the date: a year to the day since Carl Searcy, the Heath Street member, had been shot to death.

The next day the mayor praised Jahmol for wanting to "change his neighborhood from a place of violence to a community of peace."

Jahmol's legacy

In his eulogy at the funeral, Culpepper said that Jahmol died for a purpose, echoing Christ's words at the Last Supper, "Jahmol says that I leave you my peace — this is my peace."

A week later, police announced the arrest of Jerome Brody, 19, who was stopped while driving a car containing the two guns that, according to ballistics, were used in Jahmol's murder. But Brody was not charged in the shooting itself — and he was not a member of Heath Street.

The day Jahmol was shot, another H Block member, Danny Hairston, got out of jail. Two months later, on Jan. 27, his body was found dumped in a backyard. He'd been shot once in the head.

Police have made no arrests and reported no leads in the Hairston and Norfleet murders.

Gang members from both sides refused — some personally, some through intermediaries — to speak to USA TODAY. But Teah Norfleet says she believes that Heath Street never took the truce seriously.

She says that some H Block members returned from the Kennedy Library summit unconvinced of Heath Street's sincerity; that some muttered insults out of the organizers' earshot; and that two of the Heath Street leaders did not attend. (Brown says they simply were late and missed the van.)

Is the truce holding? On Feb. 9, Boston Police Commissioner Edward Davis called it "an example of a collaborative process that uses innovative thinking and works."

Brown says that Heath Street denies responsibility for the Hairston and Norfleet murders, and that Jahmol's slaying on the anniversary of Searcy's might just have been coincidence. He and Culpepper both say the truce is holding.

Some question how it was implemented. "Where we've learned some lessons here is that these are very fragile things," says McDevitt, the Northeastern professor who had hailed the truce. "A truce is a piece of the puzzle. It's not the whole thing."

There was no airing of specific beefs at the summit; no follow-up meeting between the gangs afterward; no recognition of the approaching anniversary of Searcy's murder. Culpepper says he hasn't gotten over Jahmol's death. "I hated to lose that kid," the minister says, a catch in his voice. "He was gonna be the key to so much."

But since Jahmol's death, his sister Teah, his girlfriend and four members of H Block have gotten baptized. And people are spreading the story of the gangster-turned-peacemaker.

Culpepper thinks about something Jahmol wrote in jail: "I sit back and think, God left me here for a reason. He has something planned for me."

Inquiries Leave Officials In Limbo (AZREP)

By Billy House, Washington Bureau

Arizona Republic, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - There has been a long list of recent Justice Department investigations announced or leaked to the media targeting current and former members of Congress.

In many of those cases, the public has been left for months, or longer, to wonder about whether lawmakers will be charged or what, if anything, the investigations revealed. That air of uncertainty, which may never be wiped away, could ultimately tarnish reputations or destroy careers.

That includes the so-called preliminary inquiry and assessment launched last fall by Paul Charlton, then U.S. attorney in Arizona, regarding activities of Rep. Rick Renzi, R-Ariz., and former Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., respectively.

In the months since, nothing has surfaced about either case. Both Renzi and Kolbe have denied wrongdoing. Meanwhile, Justice Department officials in Phoenix and Washington, after initially confirming the existence of both inquiries, have declined to give additional comment. At times, the Phoenix and Washington offices don't seem to have a handle on who is in charge, referring inquiries about the matters to each other.

Charlton, who left office in January, recently declined to comment.

Charlton was one of half a dozen top prosecutors forced out of office last year by the Justice Department. Some lawmakers say the move was related to investigations of politicians. Hearings will be held in Washington today.

Meanwhile, potential targets wait to learn the status of the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0140821

Ex-Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., was linked in published news accounts in January 2006 to at least four other members of Congress reportedly under federal investigation in Virginia in connection with the influence-peddling scandal surrounding convicted former D.C. lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Hayworth, who lost his re-election bid in November, has denied wrongdoing. Only one of the five lawmakers cited, former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, has been convicted in the Abramoff scandal.

There has been no word since about where the inquiry involving Hayworth has led.

And there probably won't be, federal officials say.

"A lot of that is up to the discretion of the U.S. attorney. In some cases, they issue a statement clearing them," said Bill Carter, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington.

"In some cases, they say nothing at all," Carter said. "Or they send a letter to the individual, if requested."

But at what point does the government have an obligation to announce a "no finding" or "cleared" result when such inquiries lead nowhere but may leave public doubt forever hanging over lawmakers and former politicians?

For instance, a cloud that may have contributed to Hayworth's re-election defeat.

"There may never come such a point," said Atlee W. Wampler III, a former U.S. attorney for the southern district of Florida and now president of the National Association of Former United States Attorneys.

"The next time you hear anything, you either get a target letter (stating that you have an opportunity to tell your side of the story to a grand jury) or the case just fades because of the statute of limitations," he said.

Federal investigators rarely want to absolve anyone or shut the door on the possibility new evidence might emerge at a later date. And sometimes, investigations take time because of manpower issues.

"Some of these things have to be run down," Wampler said. "And that can take awhile when there are other things that the FBI and other investigators might also have to do, some with higher priority."

More Lawmakers Take A Stand Against Death Penalty (LAW)

By Vesna Jaksic, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, March 6, 2007

A perfect storm of problematic executions, wrongful convictions and recent court rulings against the practice of lethal injection has led a growing number of states to challenge the death penalty through lawsuits and legislative action.

Adding still more to the momentum are a public backlash against the cost of capital cases and the development of more effective defense techniques, such as mitigation specialists who humanize death row inmates.

Eleven states have halted some or all executions -- including Florida and Maryland in December -- and more lawmakers have been speaking out against the death penalty.

Last month alone, Maryland's governor urged legislators to replace the death penalty with life without parole, North Carolina's governor said executions should be halted until issues surrounding lethal injection are solved and Montana's Senate voted to abolish the death penalty.

Court decisions have also continued to come down, such as a Delaware judge granting class action status on Feb. 22 to all death row inmates based on a case challenging lethal injection. Jackson v. Danberg, No. Civ. 06-3000-SLR (D. Del.). "It's probably the strongest momentum since the death penalty was reinstated in the mid-1970s," said John Holdridge, director of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) Capital Punishment Project, which advocates against the death penalty.

The Death Penalty Information Center recently listed the following 11 states as those that have stopped some or all executions: Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Tennessee, according to Richard Dieter, executive director of the nonprofit Washington, D.C.-based organization, which opposes capital punishment.

North Carolina's officials were in talks last week in hopes of resolving the situation, and the state's attorney general hinted on March 1 that a solution may be imminent. The executions have stopped either through government-issued moratoriums or judges' rulings, and have had varying effect.

In South Dakota, for example, Gov. Mike Rounds on Feb. 23 signed legislation that clarifies the mixture of drugs to be used in executions, which is an issue that has delayed just one execution, said his press secretary, Mitch Krebs. The law goes in effect on July 1, and Krebs said other executions are expected to resume as scheduled.

Meanwhile, in New Jersey, executions have been on hold since January 2006, when the state Legislature appointed a commission to study the issue. This January, the group recommended the death penalty be abolished. Reverend M. William Howard of Bethany Baptist Church in Newark, N.J., who chaired the 13-member New Jersey Death Penalty Study Commission, agreed with speculation that the state could become the next to abolish the death penalty.

"I don't think that's a wild idea at all," he said, pointing out that Gov. Jon Corzine has pledged to sign such legislation into law.

'A CHANGING TIME'

Most of the 38 states that have the death penalty use the same lethal injection protocol to execute death row inmates. The method has come under fire recently, with lawsuits pending in several states questioning everything from the way the drugs and painkillers are administered to whether the procedure is cruel and unusual punishment.

Kelly Culshaw, assistant public defender in the Ohio Public Defender Office who is representing death row inmate Richard Cooey in a case pending in the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, said lethal injection is fraught with problems. Cooey v. Taft, No. 05-4057 (6th Cir.).

"The inmate is suffering excruciating pain during the execution process but is paralyzed so there is no way for you to see or know what's happening," she said. "Other issues have also been coming to the forefront, such as the training and experience of the people who execute people in Ohio."

A request for comment to the state attorney general's office, which is defending former Ohio Gov. Robert Taft in the suit, was not answered.

Because the same concerns have been expressed in many states, Dieter, the Death Penalty Information Center official, said it is possible that more states will halt executions, but he added that it is difficult to predict which ones. However, he and others agreed that conservative states such as Texas -- which easily leads the nation with 383 execution since 1976 -- are least likely to stop executing.

It is possible, moreover, for states with temporary moratoriums, such as Florida, to lift these bans and resume their executions soon, Dieter said. He also did not rule out the possibility of the U.S. Supreme Court hearing the issue. Late last week, a Florida commission recommended that death row inmates be completely sedated before being injected with lethal chemicals. The commission submitted its final report and recommendations to Gov. Charlie Crist, but he took no immediate action.

"It's a changing time right now for the death penalty," Dieter said. "Around the world the death penalty is slowly becoming eradicated, and I think the U.S. is coming to sort of a similar conclusion, not necessarily that it's wrong but that it just isn't working."

Dieter said one of the reasons the death penalty is under attack now is that many lawsuits only recently worked their way through the system to reach higher courts. In addition, a number of death row inmates were exonerated in recent years thanks to DNA evidence, putting the issue under a national spotlight, he said.

Holdridge, from the ACLU, said that while many inmates still have inadequate defense counsel, defense lawyers have improved in recent years and are increasingly using mitigation specialists to explain factors that are common in many defendants' lives, such a history of abuse and mental illness. All of that has helped humanize death row inmates and made more people question execution, he said.

Another reason behind the momentum is financial, Holdridge said, explaining that many taxpayers have only recently learned about the costs of the death penalty.

In an editorial last week against the death penalty, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley said that according to a judge, it costs $400,000 more to process and imprison a death penalty defendant than it does to keep someone serving a life sentence in prison, meaning the state spent about $22.4 million more by sentencing 56 people to death since 1978.

In New Jersey, the Office of the Public Defender testified in front of the New Jersey Death Penalty Study Commission that, given its caseload of 19 cases as of August 2006, elimination of the death penalty would result in savings of $1.46 million per year. And the state Department of Corrections estimated that eliminating the death penalty would save the state about $1 million per inmate.

The political climate has also contributed to the issue, the ACLU's Holdridge said, pointing out that Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine won election in November despite opposing the death penalty in a state that has the second-highest number of executions.

And David Elliot, communications director for the Washington-based National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, predicted that New Jersey and Maryland will be the next to abolish the death penalty, partly because the two states' governors have recently voiced opposition to it.

Finally, several recent botched executions also helped raise concerns. In California, officials took 12 minutes to find a vein in the muscular arm of the co-founder of the Crips gang, Stanley "Tookie" Williams, who was executed in December 2005. In May, similar problems occurred in Ohio, where Joseph Clark's execution took about 90 minutes. Also, this past December, Florida inmate Angel Diaz had to be given a second dose of drugs and needed 34 minutes to die.

Elliot said controversy regarding lethal injection has been building for years, but a lot of information regarding the procedure emerged only recently, as cases made their way past the discovery phase. More is known now, he said, about problems that can arise during executions, the level of pain suffered and the effectiveness of painkillers used.

"Sometimes you reach a tipping point and it could be that we're at the tipping point," Elliot said, "not just with the lethal injection but with the death penalty in the United States." Proponents of the death penalty acknowledged recent defeats, but stressed that most death penalty states still allow executions. Furthermore, some states have been trying to broaden it, such as Virginia, where the Legislature recently proposed that more murder accomplices also be eligible for execution. In Georgia, a lawmaker has proposed allowing a judge to impose the death penalty even if as many as three jurors vote against it.

Michael Rushford, president of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a Sacramento, Calif.-based nonprofit organization that supports the death penalty, said that states are simply trying to ensure their procedures can survive all criticism. "We need to have more medical professionals tell us this is the most humane way to deal with these murderers and make sure the scientists saw it, and that will eliminate the need for lawsuits in the area," he said.

Despite the flurry of activity against the death penalty, some states have said that it will not affect their executions.

"The Texas Department of Criminal Justice does not have any immediate plans to change its execution protocol," Michelle Lyons, the department's spokesman, said in an e-mail statement.

MISSOURI HOLDS ITS GROUND

In Missouri, where a case against lethal injection is pending in the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, officials have stood by their procedures.

"We continue to say that our lethal injection process has been quick, it's been humane and it's constitutional," said Brian Hauswirth, a spokesman for the Missouri Department of Corrections.

Hauswirth said he could not discuss the case specifically because it is ongoing. Taylor v. Crawford, No. 06-3651 (8th Cir.). In this case, death row inmate Michael Taylor has said that Missouri's three-chemical lethal injection process violates the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Chet Pleban, a partner with Pleban & Associates in St. Louis, who is one of Taylor's attorneys, said the case has been slowed down by a number of procedural issues. But he added that it illustrates the current view toward the death penalty.

"The pendulum perhaps is starting to swing the other way now," he said. "It's just a matter of time before we recommend as an orderly society that putting people to death is not where we want to be." A message seeking comment from the spokesman for the Missouri attorney general's office, which is representing the governor in the case, was not returned.

The American Bar Association, meanwhile, has been calling for executions to be halted for years. It established the ABA Death Penalty Moratorium Implementation Project in 2001.

The report on Indiana, the latest state that was assessed, was released in February. It said that executions should stop until the administration of death penalty cases improves. The report found a number of problems similar to the other four states that were already assessed -- Alabama, Arizona, Florida and Georgia -- such as the poor qualifications of, and lack of funding for, defense counsel and a racially disproportionate application of the death penalty, said Stephen Hanlon, who chairs the project.

Analyst's Wallet Not Stolen, Son Says (WP)

By Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

The assailants who shot an expert on Russian intelligence in Prince George's County last week did not, as law enforcement sources said, take his wallet, the victim's adult son said yesterday, showing the billfold to a reporter.

The disclosure, which contradicts a report in The Washington Post yesterday, adds to the allegations and theories about the shooting, which left Paul Joyal, 53, critically wounded in his driveway Thursday night.

During a brief interview at the family's home in the Adelphi area, Alex Joyal said his father was in critical but stable condition. He declined to say whether the family has a theory about the crime. "We're not going to speculate right now," he said.

The timing of the shooting -- four days after Paul Joyal said on "Dateline NBC" that the government of Russian President Vladimir Putin was responsible for the poisoning death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko -- raised the possibility that Joyal might have been targeted in retaliation for his comment.

"We really have no idea what the reason was," Elizabeth Joyal, Paul Joyal's wife, told the Associated Press yesterday, adding that "it could easily have been a random act of violence."

Several news outlets, including The Post, have cited anonymous law enforcement officials as saying that the shooting appeared to have occurred during a botched robbery. The claim that a wallet and briefcase had been taken from Paul Joyal was seen as offering additional support for the theory that he was targeted in a robbery or perhaps a failed carjacking.

A source in The Post's report said yesterday that the wallet and briefcase were initially thought to have been taken but that the wallet was found in Joyal's car. The location of the briefcase was unclear last night.

Wife: Wounded Russian Expert Not Robbed (WP/AP)

By Stephen Manning, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

ADELPHI, Md. -- The wife of an expert on Russian intelligence who was shot last week challenged reports Monday that her husband had been robbed.

In a brief interview at the couple's suburban Washington home, Elizabeth Joyal said reports that Paul Joyal's wallet and briefcase were taken were false. She didn't know of any motive for Thursday's shooting outside their home in what she said was a normally safe area.

"We really have no idea what the reason was," said Elizabeth Joyal, but added that "it could easily have been a random act of violence."

The shooting came days after Paul Joyal, 53, accused the Russian government of involvement in the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko and of trying to silence its critics. The FBI was assisting in the shooting investigation.

Russian President Vladimir Putin and Russian officials have repeatedly denied involvement in the Litvinenko case.

Joyal and Litvinenko were acquaintances.

A law enforcement official familiar with the investigation said the wallet was found in Paul Joyal's car and that the briefcase has been accounted for. The official requested anonymity because the probe is ongoing.

Law enforcement officials speaking on the condition of anonymity had told several media outlets, including The Associated Press, that the crime appeared to be a robbery gone bad.

Elizabeth Joyal said her husband's prognosis was good. Joyal was still under sedation, though, and authorities have not interviewed him, said Cpl. Stephen Pacheco, a Prince George's County police spokesman.

Joyal works for National Strategies, a Washington-based government consulting firm. He also has lobbied for the former Soviet Republic of Georgia.

Questions Arise Over Nevada Governor's Defense Fund (AP)

By Brendan Riley, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 6, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - A legal defense fund set up for Nevada Gov. Jim Gibbons in November, when he was dealing with brewing legal cases including a woman's claim he assaulted her, wasn't sanctioned by a House Committee even though Gibbons was still a congressman.

But representatives of the governor, who now has two high-priced lawyers handling an FBI probe into his associations with a longtime friend who's a wealthy federal contractor, say the fund was created properly. They add that the fund shouldn't run afoul of a state law limiting contributions during legislative sessions.

Gibbons spokeswoman Melissa Subbotin said Monday that a U.S. House committee's approval of the defense fund wasn't sought in November because Gibbons, a Republican who served five terms in the House, was seeking election to a state office and not a federal office.

"We are being thoughtful in our review of all the laws to ensure that we are in full compliance," Subbotin added. "We have nothing to hide."

Attorney Michael Pagni, who helped to set up the defense fund, said the federal rules didn't come up for discussion at the time. He added that such rules generally "don't apply to a candidate for state office even if he's a federal officeholder at the time."

Pagni also said Gibbons is "erring on the side of caution" and plans to provide details of the defense fund contributions in a filing this week with the secretary of state's office.

Subbotin said she didn't think the exact amount of Gibbons' debts to his attorneys would be public, but added that any leftover money would be donated to the Nevada Patriot Fund, set up to help families who lost a soldier in the Iraq war.

The U.S. House rules state that legal expense funds can be set up to handle expenses stemming from campaigns for federal office or from a House member's official duties, but must be authorized by the House Ethics Committee.

The rules also state that the funds can be used to defray "a criminal prosecution; or a civil matter bearing on the individual's reputation or fitness for office."

If the legal defense fund had been set up under House rules, quarterly reports on contributions would have been required, and the first report would have been due Jan. 30. There are no state laws requiring such disclosures.

While Gibbons maintains the defense fund was set up properly, there may be some practical problems created by the state law limiting political contributions a month before, during and a month after Nevada's legislative sessions.

DOJ_NMG_0140825

The law, which applies to the governor, lieutenant governor and all members of the Legislature, prohibits soliciting or accepting contributions or commitments for contributions "for any political purpose." It covers a period from early January to early July this year.

But Pagni said his reading of the state law is that it wouldn't conflict with the purpose of the legal defense fund, which "would come under personal use."

Attorneys Don Campbell of Las Vegas and Abbe Lowell of Washington, D.C., currently are helping Gibbons deal with FBI questions about his associations with Warren Trepp. Gibbons has denied that he accepted payments or gifts from Trepp in exchange for helping the wealthy Reno software contractor get defense contracts while Gibbons was a member of Congress.

Trepp, a former chief trader for convicted junk-bond dealer Michael Milken, also has denied any wrongdoing.

Gibbons had asked the House Ethics Committee in November for an opinion about whether he improperly reported private jet flights and a Caribbean cruise paid for by Trepp, whose company has classified federal software contracts with the Air Force, U.S. Special Operations Command and the CIA. That request apparently was shelved after he left the House.

Lowell has defended many high-profile clients, including now-imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Campbell, a well-known Nevada criminal defense lawyer, helped Gibbons when he was accused just before the November elections by Chrissy Mazzeo of assaulting her. Authorities decided against filing charges in that case.

Gibbons also faced allegations that he and his wife Dawn had employed an illegal immigrant as a nanny. The nanny, Martha Patricia Sandoval, was represented by an immigration attorney when the issue, which dated to the late 1980s and early 1990s, came up late in the 2006 campaign season.

Criminal Case Must Link Positionon Council To Illicit MLGW Gain (MCA)

By Trevor Aaronson

Memphis Commercial Appeal, March 6, 2007

City Councilman Edmund Ford will take his seat at the dais today for the first time since Memphis Light, Gas and Water Division president and CEO Joseph Lee admitted the politician received special treatment.

But Ford's actions as a public official -- including during his tenure as chairman of the council committee that oversees MLGW's spending and budget -- are key to elevating the utility scandal to criminal charges.

The crux of the case: Federal prosecutors need to prove that Ford used his position on the City Council to benefit MLGW improperly in exchange for leniency on his more than $16,000 in debt to the city-owned utility.

"It would seem to me that some sort of bribery would be the only type of charge that could apply," said Steve Mulroy, a former federal prosecutor and University of Memphis law professor who was elected to the Shelby County Commission in November.

"For that, they would have to prove Ford did something or agreed to do something in his official capacity in return for the favors provided by MLGW."

The federal investigation of MLGW became public following the delivery of grand jury subpoenas to the utility in mid-February.

On Feb. 22, vice president of customer operations Alonzo Weaver and Gloria Washington, a top assistant to Lee, testified before the grand jury. Five days later, on Feb. 27, Lee responded to his grand jury subpoena.

"I testified truthfully and honestly and answered all questions posed to me," Lee told reporters in a prepared statement that afternoon.

If the government can document quid pro quo, prosecutors' law of choice could be the Hobbs Act, a federal code that prohibits bribery and extortion, among other crimes, affecting interstate commerce. As a utility company, MLGW engages in interstate commerce. The Hobbs Act allows crimes usually prosecuted in state courts -- from robbery to racketeering -- to be brought to U.S. District Court, which has strict penalty guidelines and no opportunities for parole.

"If there was quid pro quo of some sort, something that was expected in return for the favor, that is both a violation of state law and potentially a Hobbs Act violation," said Randy Alden, a federal public defender in Memphis.

Federal prosecutors in the Bluff City have historically chosen the Hobbs Act as a tool to build public corruption cases.

Former state senator Edgar Gillock was convicted of extortion under the Hobbs Act in 1982. The act was used in some of the Tennessee Waltz charges. More recently, in August 2006, the U.S. Attorney's Office employed the Hobbs Act against three Memphis police officers on charges of drug conspiracy and civil rights violations.

If prosecutors can construct a bribery case against Ford, they might have enough to charge MLGW employees as well.

DOJ_NMG_0140826

"To the extent there was any kind of quid pro quo bribery situation, the statute involving bribery makes the briber just as guilty as the bribee," Mulroy said. "In terms of this hypothetical scenario in which MLGW and someone agree to give this benefit in the power bill in exchange for some official action, it would be bribery on MLGW's side."

Even without Lee's public admission, prosecutors already have enough evidence to show Ford received special treatment.

Documents subpoenaed by the federal government reveal the City Council member's business water account was improperly included in On Track, a special program for low-income customers that protects their service from disconnection due to unpaid bills. What's more, according to March 2006 e-mail, Lee told Washington that, despite unpaid bills, he did not want Ford's service cut off.

L.A. Bridges Anti-gang Effort Scrutinized (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

Los Angeles has spent $100 million over the last decade on a gang-prevention program, even though it doesn't track how many youths it keeps out of gangs and has been repeatedly criticized for not adequately coordinating with schools and police.

Unlike anti-gang efforts in other cities that have been held up as models by the federal government, L.A. Bridges lacks a system for determining whether its clients are involved in gangs, so there is no way of knowing whether the program actually works.

The program has come under growing scrutiny at City Hall as L.A. and federal authorities have launched a new gang crackdown. Critics point out that in 2006, gang crime increased 15.7% over the year before, according to LAPD statistics.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa has vowed to increase funding for intervention programs, saying the gang crackdown can't focus solely on law enforcement. But he is limiting funding of L.A. Bridges through September while officials try to assess its effectiveness.

Supporters acknowledge that L.A. Bridges needs to do a better job of working with other agencies, but they maintain it provides a valuable community service and would be more effective if the city expanded it.

The city spends $14 million annually on Bridges, which essentially screens and gives money to community organizations that do the actual intervention. Bridges I is a gang prevention program that provides after-school tutoring, counseling and other services to students from 27 middle schools. Bridges II offers job training to gang members in the hope that employment will get them out of gang life. The contracts range from $227,000 to $1.7 million.

The city funds are provided to the contract agencies by the Community Development Department. John Chavez, the longtime head of L.A. Bridges, was pushed out recently by CDD management.

L.A. Bridges was launched during a crackdown on gang violence in 1997, largely in response to public outrage over the fatal gang shooting of a 3-year-old girl whose family car was ambushed on a dead-end street in Cypress Park.

But almost from the beginning, critics have said the program is ineffective.

In 2000, the city controller recommended that L.A. Bridges be shut down and redesigned, saying that the contractors lacked the required coordination with other gang programs, the police, schools and community groups.

Then-Controller Rick Tuttle also concluded that Bridges agencies were not required to show what effect the program might be having on gang violence and membership.

The mayor at the time, Richard Riordan, agreed with the findings and announced he was cutting off funding to L.A. Bridges. The City Council unanimously voted to overturn his decision.

"They had money coming into their districts," said Malcolm Klein, a UCLA scholar on gang programs, regarding the council vote.

The vote occurred after more than 300 backers of L.A. Bridges, including employees of contractors who were receiving millions of dollars from the program, packed City Hall.

It also helped that many of the contractors themselves were influential in city politics, which led to criticism that the program involved political patronage. Six of the contracts are held by current or former appointees to city commissions.

In addition, 172 political contributions were made to city politicians by executives and employees of 20 of the 26 contractors for L.A. Bridges I and II. The contributions totaled $48,500, including $7,200 to Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and smaller amounts to council members Wendy Greuel, Janice Hahn, Bill Rosendahl, Jose Huizar, Jan Perry, Ed Reyes and Bernard Parks. Those who commented about the contributions said they support the program because it helps young people, not because it provides campaign checks.

"I think it has done some good," Perry said.

Seven years after Tuttle's scathing audit, a new city report produced by attorney Connie Rice made the same criticisms of L.A. Bridges and other city gang programs.

DOJ_NMG_0140827

Both studies urged L.A. Bridges to shift to the type of model used by Chicago, Riverside, Mesa, Ariz., and other cities, which emphasizes close coordination between multiple agencies and measurable results.

Those programs were designed under the stewardship of Irving A. Spergel, a sociologist at the University of Chicago.

"The secret of success," Spergel said, is to have probation officers, community organizations, the police and former gang members serving as intervention workers collaborating as street teams in gang neighborhoods.

The programs also have to evaluate how many gang members or wannabes are helped out of the gang life. Spergel said that is done by using police records and conducting annual interviews with youths to determine which ones are no longer involved in gang crime.

In his book, "Reducing Youth Gang Crime," Spergel looked at one anti-gang effort in Chicago during a five-year period and found a 60% reduction in serious violence for 200 young people as well as a 25% drop in gang membership.

Bridges officials said they are trying to work more with police.

Still, some contractors are interacting more than others. The head of one group said his intervention workers just started working with police this year and are in touch with them only once a month. The workers go out on their own instead of teaming with police officers.

"We let them do their work, and we do our work," said Mustafa Fletcher, executive director of Unity Two Inc.

Police Chief William J. Bratton said there is inadequate coordination between intervention agencies and the police.

"The gang interventionists will tell you they don't want to be seen as working too closely, being too closely aligned with the police, because they are fearful that gang members won't work with them then," Bratton said. "But I think there can be better working relationships than we have."

State Sen. Mark Ridley-Thomas (D-Los Angeles), who as a city councilman helped launch L.A. Bridges, said the city's gang intervention and prevention programs need to be more comprehensive and better-coordinated.

"I think it makes sense to incorporate it in a more comprehensive system," Ridley-Thomas said. "But the question people should be asking, given what L.A. Bridges has accomplished, is what would the lives of young people who were part of it be like had it not been implemented when it was?"

He said the problem is Bridges' scope, adding that it should be expanded to every middle school in the city.

Supporters note that while L.A. Bridges doesn't track whether its clients join gangs, it does keep other statistics. Bridges I, for example, reports on the number of youths who improve their grades and attendance.

But some of the numbers presented by L.A. Bridges have given City Hall pause. It found that the majority of middle-schoolers in the program failed to boost either their attendance or their grades.

Another issue has been how well contractors screen employees to determine whether they are still in gangs. At least three employees of Bridges contractors have been arrested in the last two years. The latest was Mario Corona, jobs coordinator for Communities In Schools in Pacoima, who was arrested last week by the LAPD on suspicion of possessing a pound of methamphetamine.

In looking at alternatives to Bridges, Villaraigosa said he is especially impressed with Homeboy Industries Inc., which takes a more comprehensive approach to gang members, providing counseling, tattoo removal and real jobs — not just referrals to job-training programs.

By providing actual jobs, Homeboy is able to track the progress of participants and lay down strict rules about their connections to gangs.

The nonprofit agency, run by Father Gregory Boyle, has accepted only $15,000 out of the $14 million distributed annually by L.A. Bridges.

"We balk at taking part in all that public entity stuff," Boyle said. "They don't know what they are doing."

For Sex Offenders, A Dispute Over Therapy's Benefits (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough And Monica Davey

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

ATASCADERO, Calif. — During five years of psychotherapy at a treatment center here for sex offenders who have finished their prison terms, Bill Price, a pedophile who admits to 21 victims as young as 3, has constructed a painstaking plan for staying straight.

A requirement of his treatment, the plan catalogs on five single-spaced pages the tactics Mr. Price has learned to stop molesting.

There are 42 so far, including avoiding places where children congregate, abstaining from alcohol, shunning the Internet and sniffing ammonia whenever he has a deviant thought.

DOJ_NMG_0140828

"It was just like a hunt for me," Mr. Price, 59, a former Sunday school teacher, said of his sexual crimes. "I kept choosing children because they were easier prey; they were easier to deal with than women."

Treatment plans like Mr. Price's, known as relapse prevention, have been a cornerstone of efforts to reform sex offenders for the past 20 years. Yet there is no convincing evidence that the approach works, or that others do either.

Similar to aspects of Alcoholics Anonymous, relapse prevention has sex offenders own up to wrongdoing and resign themselves to a lifelong day-to-day struggle with temptation. But one of the few authoritative studies of the method, conducted in California from 1985 to 2001, found that those who entered relapse prevention treatment were slightly more likely to offend again than those who got no therapy at all.

Clinicians who work with sex offenders cling to relapse prevention nonetheless, and its durability speaks volumes about the troubled, politically fraught science of treating sex offenders. Not only is relapse prevention of questionable value, but so are the tests to gauge whether sex offenders in treatment still get inappropriately aroused, the drugs used for so-called chemical castration and the methods of predicting risk of reoffending.

Treatment methods have become particularly topical as thousands of sex offenders are confined or restricted beyond their prison terms under civil commitment laws on the books in 19 states. The laws have been found constitutional in part because they aim to provide treatment if possible; New York legislators announced last week that the state would soon allow civil confinement.

On average, the civil commitment programs cost four times more than keeping sex offenders in prison. But too little research has been conducted into how to treat sex offenders, experts say, putting psychotherapists and others working in civil commitment centers at a distinct disadvantage.

"It has never been regarded as a legitimate and recognized topic for research by psychologists," said Robert A. Prentky, director of research at the Justice Research Institute in Boston. "There is a very strong undercurrent of disrespect for this area of research and perhaps even skepticism, frankly."

As recently as the 1970s, research on treating sex offenders was practically nonexistent. Barbara Schwartz, a psychologist with New England Forensic Associates in Arlington, Mass., said that when she wrote her first paper on rehabilitating sex offenders in 1971, "I read everything there was to read, and I had a half of one page of references."

That is partly because sex offenders present major challenges as research subjects. There are far fewer convicted sex offenders than most other kinds of criminals, so sample groups are unreliably small. And sex offenders tend to be so secretive that "it's really hard to get information from them that you can have confidence in," said Ted Shaw, a forensic psychologist in Gainesville, Fla., who has treated offenders since 1982.

Even now, in an advanced phase of California's treatment program for the most persistent sex offenders, Mr. Price says he questions his ability to keep his urges in check. His relapse prevention plan says that if let out, he will seek more treatment at Pure Life Ministries in Kentucky, whose Web site says its goal is "leading Christians to victory over sexual sin."

"I'm very afraid of just being out there," Mr. Price said, sitting near the nasturtiums and petunias he had grown in a courtyard of the Atascadero State Hospital here, which includes a wing for civilly committed offenders. "I'm less dangerous than I was, but I'm definitely in touch with my dangerousness."

Treatment in Phases

During one therapy session, Mr. Price and five other men aggressively tested one another's ability to stay straight, while two social workers moderated. Sitting in a circle in a locked conference room, briefly sealed off from the loud, grim bustle of the hospital halls, they fell into an argument over whether to protect a young new arrival from predatory older residents.

"If I can save this kid from being hustled or taken advantage of," said Paul George, a convicted pedophile who has admitted roughly 100 offenses, "I'm going to at least try to make that effort."

But another man pointed out that Mr. George had habitually groomed child victims by acting as their protector, asking him, "How was that different from this situation?"

At most civil commitment centers around the nation, offenders young and old meet several times a week for group therapy rooted in relapse prevention as well as what are known as cognitive-behavioral techniques. While the former is meant to curb sex offending in particular, the latter are intended to change broader destructive patterns of thinking and reacting, and are commonly used in treating other ailments like anxiety.

Civilly confined men move from one phase of treatment to the next, learning to recognize which situations, thoughts and behaviors have led them to offend, developing skills to avoid them, and applying those skills to their daily lives. They try to learn empathy by writing detailed letters to their victims and even essays in their voices.

"It's a slow business," said David Thornton, the treatment director at Wisconsin's civil commitment center. "You're talking about years of work, two steps forward, one step back."

DOJ_NMG_0140829

Dr. Thornton said relapse prevention forced sex offenders to focus too heavily on a concrete list of high-risk situations — sometimes as long as 50 pages — that could overwhelm them and lead to failure. Wisconsin's program rejects relapse prevention and sticks to cognitive-behavioral techniques in an effort to change deep-rooted traits and behaviors.

"It's much less dependent on the guy having some conscious, deliberate self-control plan in his head," Dr. Thornton said. "You're trying to change how he automatically functions."

Instead of helping a sex offender compile a list of specific situations to avoid, therapists in Wisconsin might seize on the fact that he reacts impulsively when something upsets him, teaching him self-regulation skills. Instead of having the offender recount every last detail of his crimes, they might help him correct long-held misperceptions about children (that they enjoy sex), power (that it is best attained by raping or molesting) and so forth.

Some who represent offenders in Wisconsin, though, say that even the new program there has not answered offenders' frustrations about their ability to progress in it and to demonstrate that progress.

"The program has gotten larger, more involved and progressively longer," said Robert W. Peterson, a lawyer in Wisconsin who has worked on such cases since 1998 and says he has seen the state's program shift repeatedly in design and focus.

"Regardless of the structure of the treatment program, the duration of the treatment program, the nature of the treatment program," Mr. Peterson said, "what we basically have is living experiments."

Research Is Sparse

Reliable studies on the treatment of civilly committed offenders do not exist, since so few have been set free. Much of the research into the treatment of sex offenders has come out of Canada, where national criminal history records are easily accessible.

Canadian psychologists have studied not only treatment outcomes but also risk assessment, or determining who is likely to reoffend.

Combining findings from hundreds of smaller studies, R. Karl Hanson, senior research officer for the Department of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness in Canada, has found that roughly 15 percent of convicted sex offenders are caught reoffending after five years and that those driven by deviant sexual interests, like pedophiles and exhibitionists, are the likeliest to do so.

Dr. Hanson's research has also suggested that even lifelong offenders tend to stop, for the most part, by the time they reach their 70s.

He said various studies had shown that "most treatments don't work very well," but that, over all, treatment had a modest beneficial effect. One analysis that he published in 2002 found that 12 percent of offenders who got treatment were caught committing new sex crimes, compared with 17 percent of untreated offenders.

Researchers have found that chemical castration, or using hormonal drugs to curb sexual appetite, can be problematic, too.

Doctors have experimented for decades with antiandrogens, which block the effects of sex hormones like testosterone and are most commonly used to treat advanced prostate cancer. But while some consider antiandrogens crucial for the most predatory offenders, the drugs remain controversial, not least because they are expensive and can cause weight gain, osteoporosis and breast development. It is also hard to ensure that released offenders keep taking the drugs.

More than half of states with civil commitment programs say they allow voluntary antiandrogen treatment, but as of last fall, only California, Illinois, Washington and Wisconsin had more than one offender taking the drugs, which can cost several hundred dollars a month. Dr. Fred S. Berlin, founder of the Johns Hopkins Sexual Disorders Clinic in Baltimore and a longtime critic of civil commitment, said he was troubled by the scant use of antiandrogens.

"I get letters from men around the country, in prison or sometimes civil commitment, asking if I can help them in their efforts to have it made available," Dr. Berlin said, "because the administrations in their facilities are not even willing to discuss it with them."

Here in California, where about 40 civilly committed men took antiandrogens several years ago but only four do now, Jesus Padilla, a clinical psychologist at Atascadero State Hospital, said the drugs did not address the underlying emotional problems that lead to offending, nor even necessarily eliminate sex drive.

"I've had numerous situations where they say they are working just fine," Dr. Padilla said of civilly committed men on antiandrogens, "only to catch them having sex with each other or engaging in deviant sexual fantasies even though their testosterone level was down to zero."

Some doctors see more potential in antidepressant drugs, which can dampen sexual desire while also curbing compulsive behaviors like chronic masturbation, which can preclude offenders from participating in treatment. Some civil commitment programs prescribe antidepressants sparingly or not at all, while others, including South Carolina's and Wisconsin's, have dozens of men taking them.

One approach that civil commitment centers have avoided is surgical castration, though at least one state, California, allows it if the offender pays for the procedure himself.

In Virginia, the General Assembly considered a proposal last year to allow voluntary surgical castration as an alternative to civil commitment, but took no action. One pedophile in Virginia castrated himself in a jail shower with a shoelace and a razor blade as his civil commitment trial approached.

Douglas Carlin, a convicted rapist who completed treatment and was released a year ago from the commitment center in Florida, said he thought a lot of offenders there were deceiving their therapists.

"Most of those guys, they are just faking it to make it," Mr. Carlin said. "They're just waiting to get released so they can go right back to what they were doing."

Tools of Assessment

Therapists can gauge the success of various treatments by observing offenders' behavior, interviewing them and using two instruments. All have serious shortcomings.

One instrument, the polygraph, is routinely used to determine if people continue to offend once conditionally released or have deviant thoughts in the course of treatment. Civil commitment centers also use polygraphs to make sure an offender has admitted all his crimes, a requirement for progressing past the early stage of relapse prevention treatment.

"Usually they will give up lots of information soon after failing a polygraph test," Dr. Thornton, the Wisconsin treatment director, said.

But polygraphy, which measures blood pressure, breathing rate and perspiration while a series of questions is asked, is generally considered so unreliable that its results are inadmissible as proof in court. Some offenders, especially psychopaths who feel no anxiety when lying, can beat it, experts said.

"Polygraph on its own isn't the answer to anything," said Dr. Don Grubin, a forensic psychiatrist at Newcastle University in Britain who has studied the tests. "As part of a bigger package it seemed to have an effect — to help reduce the risk of reoffending."

The other device routinely used at civil commitment facilities is the penile plethysmograph, which measures changes in the circumference of the penis while the offender is shown sexually suggestive pictures of men, women or children.

Some clinicians and offenders say it is easy, particularly in a laboratory, to stifle arousal and thus cheat on a plethysmograph test.

Mr. Carlin, the Florida rapist, said that during one plethysmograph test, "I just stared at a shelf of cleaning products and read the labels."

The field of risk assessment, or determining which sex offenders are likely to repeat their crimes once released, has been equally slow to evolve, even as judges and juries are keeping more men locked up after their prison sentences in the belief that they will be dangerous on the outside.

A cottage industry of professionals who diagnose sexually violent predators has developed in the last two decades, and several hundred psychologists, often with little or no background treating sex offenders, make a lucrative business of recommending who should be committed.

During a recent commitment trial in St. Augustine, Fla., one psychologist with hardly any experience treating sex offenders told a jury he had evaluated 350 candidates for civil commitment and testified in dozens of commitment trials since 2000.

Some in the field question why professional organizations like the American Psychological Association have not set ethical and training standards for the many psychologists entering the civil commitment field.

"I don't think, in my personal experience, that the vast majority of the examiners I've come across have sufficient working knowledge of the empirical literature," said Dr. Prentky of the Justice Research Institute.

But that literature is still of limited use. Most actuarial tools used to predict someone's risk of recidivism consider only unchanging factors, like their number of past offenses and the sex of their victims. Some scientists say that so-called dynamic factors — how much treatment an offender gets, for example, and how old he has grown — should factor heavily into actuarial risk assessment, too.

"Science hasn't gotten there yet," said Eric Janus, a professor at William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul, Minn., who opposes civil commitment.

Professor Janus said he hoped for "an explosion of knowledge" about how to prevent sexual violence before it happened, which he said would prevent far more sex crimes than civilly committing offenders.

That sort of research is unlikely to happen in the United States, Dr. Berlin and other experts said, because so many Americans believe that the only investment in sex offenders should be punitive.

"People need to recognize that these are not just criminal justice problems but also public health problems," Dr. Berlin said, "and the surgeon general as well as the attorney general ought to be supporting research in this area."

Earlier efforts to rehabilitate sex offenders, like Freudian psychoanalysis and electric shocks to the skin, failed definitively decades ago. A recent case in Orange Park, Fla., offered more evidence that relapse prevention treatment is no solution, either.

There, the authorities say, a convicted rapist who had spent 12 years in prison and 5 at the Florida Civil Commitment Center raped and killed a young woman before dawn on Jan. 23 after following her into the veterinary clinic where she worked.

The suspect, Michael Renard Jackson, 37, won release from the commitment center in 2005 after reaching the highest levels of a relapse prevention treatment program, people familiar with the case said.

U.S. Investigates Counterfeiting Of Rare Wines (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Federal prosecutors have uncorked a criminal investigation into counterfeit-wine sales, sending subpoenas to rare-wine collectors and to some of the world's leading auction houses, including Christie's in London and Zachys in New York.

A federal grand jury in New York has begun hearing evidence in the case, and the art-fraud unit of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has conducted interviews, according to people who have been contacted in the course of the probe.

The criminal investigation is focusing, among other things, on whether auction houses, collectors or importers knowingly sold counterfeit wines despite doubts about their authenticity, those close to the case said. Such sales could be prosecuted under federal fraud statutes.

The inquiry comes as wine sales are booming amid a broader surge in the market for luxury goods. Backed in part by robust profits on Wall Street, collectors and speculators increasingly are paying $1,000 or more per bottle, especially for the rare Bordeaux vintages of France.

That's raised new fears about counterfeiting, which is beginning to threaten confidence in the market for rare wines -- except those sold directly from wineries. Wine Spectator magazine recently estimated that as much as 5% of rare vintages sold privately or at auction today may be fake.

Auction houses say they go to great lengths to ensure that the bottles they sell are genuine. "We piece together the history of each bottle of wine, its provenance, ownership and appearance," says Richard Brierley, wine auctioneer at Christie's.

Christie's experts have stepped up their vigilance, he added. "In the past, it was only the most rare vintages. But with more wines falling into the $1,000-plus category, there is more opportunity in counterfeiting."

Jeff Zacharia, who runs Zachys Wine and its fast-growing Web and auction operations, says counterfeiting technology is becoming increasingly sophisticated, forcing the industry to be more alert for fraud. But he says concerns about forgeries haven't kept his business from soaring; Zachys auction revenue was a record $35 million last year, more than double the $15 million it had in 2003. "And this year is shaping up to be the best so far," Mr. Zacharia said.

Christie's, a unit of Christie's International PLC, also had its best year ever in 2006, including wine-auction sales of $58 million in 44 sales from New York and Los Angeles to London and Paris, and its first-ever online bidding.

Both Christie's and Zachys declined to comment on the subpoenas the firms received. Royal Wine Merchants, another New York firm that people close to the case said was served with a subpoena, didn't return calls or emails.

The criminal investigation began in December, after several collectors began pressing auction houses and wine merchants to take some measure of responsibility for the alleged sale of counterfeit wines. The collectors included Russell Frye, a wealthy software entrepreneur, and William Koch, president of closely held Oxbow Corp., a global mining and energy concern. His billionaire brothers control Koch Industries, a $25 billion business empire.

Mr. Koch filed a civil suit last year in federal court in New York, alleging that a German wine merchant, Hardy Rodenstock, forged bottles of wine he claimed had belonged to Thomas Jefferson and had been discovered in a bricked-up cellar in Paris. Mr. Rodenstock also claimed to have other extremely rare wines, including a cache belonging to Czar Nicholas II of Russia, Mr. Koch alleged. Those allegations were detailed in September in a page-one story in The Wall Street Journal.

In a Jan. 19 court motion, an attorney for Mr. Rodenstock denied the claims and deflected responsibility to the merchants who sold them directly to Mr. Koch. The attorney, Birgit Kurtz of New York law firm Alston & Bird LLP, also told the court that the statute of limitations had lapsed because the sales in question had occurred years earlier, and that Mr. Rodenstock, in any case, couldn't be sued in New York.

Whether auction houses and merchants can be held liable for counterfeits provided to them by others could be a big issue in any prosecution arising from the federal probe. A civil suit filed by Mr. Frye in federal court in San Francisco last year names a seller, the Wine Library Inc., of Petaluma, Calif., as a defendant. The firm, which isn't related to an online wine seller of the same name based in Springfield, N.J., denies the claims.

"It's not just Rodenstock," Mr. Frye said. "Counterfeiting is a big problem, especially in the high end. These networks need to be exposed," and merchants must be accountable, he said.

Other incidents of counterfeiting in recent years include a 20,000-bottle cache of bogus Tuscan Sassicaia 1995 and other top wines seized in a raid by Italian government inspectors. France's Chateau Mouton Rothschild and Australia's Penfolds Grange have also been targeted by counterfeiters.

Mr. Brierley, head of Christie's wine department in the U.S., said growing awareness of the problem has made collectors and merchants more cautious. "People should be confident buying from reputable auction houses. It's a public forum that protects buyers."

Wine has become a lucrative business for many auction houses in recent years. As rare-wine prices have risen, sellers have found that public auctions maximize their profits. The rising prices have also helped to fatten auction houses' commissions.

The federal investigation and civil lawsuits could draw in some well-known names in wine. Michael Broadbent, a Christie's board member and author of a widely used wine-tasting reference book, is among those who have vouched for Mr. Rodenstock; the German's tastings are legendary for the rarity of the vintages, and are widely cited in wine books.

Christie's declined to make Mr. Broadbent available for comment and he couldn't be reached. But in the catalog for a glittering wine auction held in New York's Rockefeller Plaza in December, Christie's continued to tout Mr. Broadbent's tasting notes from a Rodenstock dinner. He described a 1934 Petrus Bordeaux as exceptional, "deeply coloured, very rich... where Hardy Rodenstock gets these wines I know not. There are simply no records of production, of stock or sales prior to 1945."

The wine, which was expected to fetch as much as $5,000 a bottle, went unsold.

You Pay G-man's Legal Bills (NYDN)

By William Sherman, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 6, 2007

Taxpayers are footing part of the mounting legal bills for an ex-FBI agent accused of helping a Brooklyn Mafia boss commit four murders, the Daily News has learned.

The Justice Department is helping fund retired agent Lindley DeVecchio's defense, which has cost more than $450,000 since his indictment last year by the Brooklyn district attorney's office.

"It's an expensive litigation," said DeVecchio's lawyer Douglas Grover, who declined to comment further.

A highly informed source confirmed the Justice Department contributions, saying, "It's on an hourly rate. Not a top New York City rate, more like a federal public defenders' rate."

It could not immediately be determined how much the department is paying.

"There is a process in place by which employees or former [FBI] employees who are the subject of civil litigation or criminal charges can apply for coverage of their legal costs. The recommendation is forwarded to the Department of Justice, where a final determination is made," FBI spokesman John Miller said.

In a case that rocked New York law enforcement, DeVecchio, 66, was indicted last year for providing information on informants and mob rivals to Colombo family boss Gregory Scarpa before the murders.

DeVecchio, who spent 33 years as an agent, is also charged with receiving payoffs from Scarpa totaling more than $66,000.

Now dead, Scarpa was DeVecchio's top secret informant for more than a decade, beginning in 1982. The murders occurred during the brutal Colombo family wars of the late 1980s and early '90s.

Grover, DeVecchio and numerous agents who worked with him maintain he is innocent of the charges and that the Brooklyn DA's prosecution is baseless and misguided. wsherman@nydailynews.com

Casino Cheats Bet On Midwest Marks (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, March 6, 2007

CHICAGO — Casinos sprouting across the Midwest are attracting sophisticated cheaters from Las Vegas, Atlantic City and overseas who believe they can scam new, unseasoned staff, gambling officials say.

Cheating is often discovered only when casinos' books don't add up, making it difficult to nab culprits, says Joe Diaz of the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation.

"We've had people coming in from out of state trying to take advantage of inexperienced staff or a staff that hasn't got all the bugs worked out," he says. Most casinos' security staffs are aided by state or local police.

Joe Massa, general manager of Iowa's Riverside Casino & Golf Resort, knew scammers might target his casino, which opened in August. He hired experienced pit and security staff, he says, and hasn't detected any out-of-state cheaters.

Nevertheless, casinos in Iowa — where a half-dozen have opened since 2000 — and other states allegedly have been hit by out-of-state cheats:

DOJ_NMG_0140833

·Three gamblers from the East Coast, including one from Atlantic City, were charged in Osceola, Iowa, with using shaved coins to trick slot machines into awarding credits.

·A casino in Joliet, Ill., was targeted by a team that included a Nevadan. They were charged with using fake cash vouchers to steal $50,000.

"They have gone from site to site, and they seem to prey on riverboats or smaller venues," says Ernest Yelton of the Indiana Gaming Commission. "They perhaps believe that we are less sophisticated."

Casino security officers in Indiana attend an eight-week training academy that includes three weeks of training in casinos, Yelton says. Other states have similar programs.

Eric Bush of the Michigan Gaming Control Board says many casinos in the Midwest use security measures as sophisticated as those in Las Vegas and Atlantic City.

Many of them, Bush says, have digital cameras covering every inch of the casino floor that can "read the serial number on a bill lying on the table." Detroit casinos, he says, are testing chips embedded with electronic signals that allow every movement to be tracked.

George Joseph, a Las Vegas-based consultant, trains casino workers. Cheats like the Midwest because "there are so many casinos in one area," he says. He tells staff to watch for:

·Cellphones used to photograph and convey poker players' hands to cheaters.

·Ringlike devices that are worn on fingers and have a stem that attaches to bills. The device quickly retracts the bills from slots after the machines validate them.

In 2005, Indian casinos created a national network to share information about cheaters. Members get e-mail notices alerting them to new postings. Many casinos also share information with others in their state.

Some states, including Nevada and New Jersey, have online "exclusion lists" with photos of cheaters banned from their casinos.

Diaz says plenty of Iowa gamblers also try to cheat. "We have a lot of local people who will try to add or take chips away when the dealer's not looking," he says.

Employees also steal. Six casino workers were charged in Minnesota with filing phony paperwork to get reimbursed for jackpots they never paid to customers.

Yelton says the latest scam in Indiana is simple: people stealing the vouchers that have replaced coins as payouts from slot machines.

Manufacturing Misdemeanors (NYT)

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

The New York Police Department has been going fishing. Not content to nab criminals when they break the law on their own, the department has been planting unattended bags in subway stations to see who might take them, at which point waiting officers pounce.

As NY1 News reported last week, 220 people were arrested last year in the sting, known as Operation Lucky Bag. In dismissing one of these cases, a Brooklyn judge said the police “do not need to manipulate a situation where temptation may overcome even people who would normally never think of committing a crime.” This program bothers us for that and many other reasons and should be discontinued immediately.

Civil libertarians have argued that the program is entrapment. That is a legal distinction for the courts to decide, but it certainly looks like that to a layperson. It is clearly a poor use of resources. People wandering off with lost property ranks far down the list of law enforcement priorities.

There is also the question of whether the sting does actual harm. In an era of terrorism, where the police have to rely on the help of average people to notice anything suspicious — including apparently abandoned bags — the last thing New York needs are cynical operations that encourage mistrust between the police and subway riders.

And of course, there is the effect on neighborliness. It is remarkable how many people in this city are willing to track down the owners of lost cellphones, wallets or bags. Arresting good Samaritans is bad enough, but encouraging them not to help in the future through this kind of overly aggressive policing is a downright shame. The best thing to do with this misbegotten program would be to end it.

Aftermath Of A Savage Scene (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Book Looks Behind Headlines of a D.C. Murder

It has taken him almost 14 years to put to paper the story of that night in 1993 when Norman Harrell took the lives -- and the hearts -- of Hawkins, who was his ex-girlfriend, and her daughter.

Homicides were everyday occurrences in the District then. The city was in the clutches of a crack war and its impulsive, impersonal violence. But the slayings of Hawkins and Harris were different. They were personal, savage.

And they seized Flynn, then a 36-year-old homicide prosecutor who had just become a father, like no other case had -- or has.

The crime scene at the house in Northeast Washington was like nothing he had ever seen, the killer's rage so evident. Hawkins's heart was left adrift among her innards; her daughter's was gone.

And the sons and daughters, sisters and cousins Flynn first encountered at D.C. Superior Court were like no family he had met. Angry as they were, the victims' family shared a faith in God and a belief in the law and in Flynn himself.

"All of those things . . . made it just a unique experience," he said.

Indeed, after the jurors had listened to him, even after they had convicted Harrell in the summer of 1994, Flynn found himself with more to say -- about Hawkins, her daughter, the incredible strength of the family they left behind and himself.

"The story needs to be told," he said to himself at the time.

Many drafts -- and many murder cases -- later, Flynn's book, "Relentless Pursuit," arrived in stores this month.

It is a true-crime memoir by a prosecutor who took on the biggest trial of his career in the midst of his own family crisis. On the opening day of the trial, his father learned that lung cancer had spread to his brain and that he probably had only months to live.

It is also the story of how, in his own time of need, Flynn says he found a measure of comfort in the company of a family that was wrestling with painful emotions that have never gone away.

Talking in his study, where a framed sketch of him standing before the jury in the Harrell case sits above his desk, Flynn, now 49, still seems awed by the family. "In the midst of what had to be the most agonizing experience of their lives, it was amazing how thoughtful they were, how they extended themselves to me," Flynn said.

Diane Hawkins and her home in the 3400 block of Eads Street NE were the center of the family until the final minutes of May 25, 1993. A mother of six, Hawkins had a son with Harrell. She had filed a claim for child support from him, and Harrell had made it clear more than once that he didn't think the government had any place telling fathers how to support their children.

The night before they were to appear in D.C. Superior Court, Harrell showed up at Hawkins's rowhouse, as he did with some regularity, usually to see his son. That night he apparently had other intentions. When he walked out, Hawkins, 42, was dead, found in the dining room area. Katrina was found in an upstairs bedroom, nearly decapitated and her heart cut out.

The bloodbath left only one survivor, a 22-month-old girl named Kikki who was found in tears, sitting on a bed near Katrina's body. A veteran police official described it as "the most graphic violence I have ever seen." Counselors were brought in to talk to emergency personnel who saw the bodies.

Recounted in unsettling detail in the early chapters of his book, the crime scene sets up Flynn's story of how Harrell was caught and ultimately convicted of first-degree murder, for which he is serving 60 years in prison. Harrell, a truck driver, was an avid hunter, and authorities found a manual in his home about how to gut animal carcasses.

The Washington Post praised "Relentless Pursuit," saying it worked on many levels and was a welcome break from so many tales of police and prosecutorial misconduct. The New York Times loathed the book, calling it "weak" and criticizing Flynn's "myopic view of his importance."

It is certainly a book about Flynn, an assistant U.S. attorney, and his pride in the work that he and other prosecutors do.

He was raised in Annandale and now lives in Great Falls with his wife and their son and daughter. His work has long been in court.

"I am a prosecutor," he writes. "I carry other titles that I cherish more: father, husband, son. But the specifics of my character, good and bad, are best defined by the job title I've held for more than seventeen years. . . . I had an easy familiarity with humanity at its most base and my career had consisted of an extended tour through a veritable museum of amorality and depravity."

"Relentless Pursuit" did not start out as a book built around himself, Flynn said. He intended to write about Hawkins and her family, ordinary people caught up in something terrible. In his early drafts, in fact, Flynn did not appear, he said, for more than 100 pages.

But a first manuscript found no takers when it circulated in 1997 and 1998. He was told the book, at about 450 pages, was too long. He cut it down and shopped it around again. By 2001, he still had found no takers.

A writer and a lawyer who does a lot of work in publishing were asked to look at the manuscript, and they suggested a change, Flynn said. "They said, 'You need to put yourself more up front. The reader needs to see this case through your eyes.' "

Flynn was reluctant. "Philosophically, that was not the book that I had set out to write," he said. He wanted it to remain the family's story. They had embraced him as one of their own. They had prayed with him at the courthouse for his father, who died later that year. Day after day, they had touched Flynn.

But he also wanted the book published, and he knew this would be his best and almost certainly his last chance. "We pretty much thought that was going to be it," he said. So he agreed to make himself a central figure. "It made me sit down and see how I was changed, for the good, by this," Flynn said.

An only child, he had grown into something of a loner when it came to his job. The Harrell case changed that, he said. Since then he's been more inclined to team with other prosecutors. "I got a sense of community that I hadn't necessarily been exposed to, not in my professional life," he said.

G.P. Putnam's Sons signed him to a deal in January 2006, and Flynn set about finishing the book on a leave of absence he had already planned to take. He holed up in his library, surrounded by titles that leaned toward the law and those who've crossed it ("In Cold Blood," "Bundy"). To keep his focus, he worked on a computer that wasn't linked to the Internet.

Some of Hawkins's sisters and children had known for years that Flynn was working on a book, and a few had read an early draft. A lot of time had passed, though, and Flynn wanted to be sure that the whole family -- the brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles and cousins who had flocked to the home the night Hawkins was found and to the courthouse for months afterward -- knew what was coming.

So last month, when the book was finished and the Justice Department appeared ready to approve its publication, Flynn met with the family. The book had taken him back to a painful time in his life and career and, he explained, might take some of them on a similar journey.

Copies of "Relentless Pursuit" began circulating among the relatives, who were generally supportive of Flynn's endeavor.

Shaunta Jackson wanted to read it. She was 15 the night of the slayings and arrived home to chaos -- and a glimpse of her dead mother's leg. She had counseling in the years that followed, and she thought she was ready to reexamine that horrible time so she started reading.

She didn't make it far.

"I couldn't read it," said Jackson, now 30 and the mother of an 11-year-old girl. "It made me sad. I started crying. . . . It just brought back a lot of memories. . . . I thought I could handle it."

It had taken Flynn 14 years to make his peace with what happened.

CIVIL LAW:

Radio Companies To Pay $12.5 Million Payola Fine (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Four of the nation's largest broadcast radio companies have agreed to pay a combined $12.5 million to settle a federal investigation into "pay-for-play" practices and will provide thousands of hours of free airtime to local musicians and independent record labels, sources familiar with the agreement said today.

Details of the settlement are being worked out and the Federal Communications Commission still must approve it. Under terms of the agreement, Clear Channel Communications Inc., CBS Radio Inc., Entercom Communications Corp. and Citadel Broadcasting Corp. would pay one of the largest fines ever levied by the FCC. The companies allegedly received money, airline tickets, clothing and other gifts from major record companies to play certain songs.

The under-the-table payments, known as payola, have been illegal since a series of pay-for-play scandals in the early days of rock 'n' roll in the 1950s. Any payment in exchange for airtime must be disclosed by broadcasters.

The $12.5-million fine to be paid by the four companies is in line with settlements two of the companies reached with former New York Attorney General Elliott Spitzer. CBS Radio agreed to pay $2 million in October and Entercom agreed to a $4.45 million fine two months later.

But the proposed FCC fine pales in comparison to big settlements Spitzer got from major record companies. Universal Music Group, for example, agreed last year to pay more than $12 million to settle payola allegations. The FCC's jurisdiction, however, is limited to broadcast radio stations.

FCC Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein, an amateur musician who helped broker the deal, said the fines and airplay agreements were significant.

"I think it's a real breakthrough in the battle to wipe payola off the airwaves," he said. "If you take payola out of radio then music gets heard on the basis of merit, not on the basis of who's got wads of cash backing the artist. That's likely to make radio fresher and restore its vitality."

In a separate agreement, the radio companies have agreed to set aside 8,400 half-hour segments of free airtime over the next three years for local and independent artists. The segments would have to air between 6 a.m. and midnight.

"It's a watershed moment in our industry," said Peter Gordon, president of Thirsty Ear Recordings, an independent record label based in Connecticut. He helped negotiate the airtime provisions as a board member of the American Association of Independent Music.

"The independent sector has a chance to have a voice once again on commercial radio," Gordon said. "I think you're looking at the airwaves being refreshed."

Stations Agree On Anti-payola Settlement (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 6, 2007

Radio listeners weary of hearing the same songs over and over may have something to cheer about: Broadcasters have tentatively agreed to anti-payola settlements that could shake up music playlists at some of the nation's largest radio chains.

Four major broadcast companies would pay the government $12.5 million and provide 8,400 half-hour segments of free airtime for independent record labels and local artists, The Associated Press has learned.

The agreement is aimed at curbing payola — generally defined as radio stations accepting cash or other consideration from record companies in exchange for airplay. The practice has been around as long as the radio industry and was made illegal after scandals in the late 1950s.

Two Federal Communications Commission officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because final language has not been approved by the full commission, said the monetary settlement is part of a consent decree between the FCC and Clear Channel Communications Inc., CBS Radio, Entercom Communications Corp. and Citadel Broadcasting Corp.

The settlement was reached at the same time as a separate deal designed to lead to more airtime for smaller record companies and their lesser-known artists as well as local musicians.

The American Association of Independent Music, a group of independent record labels, has received a commitment from the same four broadcasters for the free airtime, the officials said.

In addition to airplay, the broadcasters and the independent labels have also negotiated a set of "rules of engagement" that will guide how record company representatives and radio programmers interact.

The free airtime would be granted to companies not owned or controlled by the nation's four dominant music labels — Sony BMG Music Entertainment, Warner Music Group, Universal Music Group and EMI Group.

Payola, or "pay-for-play," can be difficult to track.

In recent years, independent record promoters have acted as middlemen to deliver payments to radio stations in exchange for airplay. Other forms of inducement include lavish prizes meant for listeners that wind up going to station employees, promises by record companies of concerts by well-known artists in exchange for airplay, and payments for promotional expenses and station equipment.

Under the FCC consent decree, broadcasters would agree to closer scrutiny in their dealings with record companies, including limits on gifts, a promise to keep a database of all items of value supplied by those companies, the employment of independent compliance officers to make sure stations are following the rules and a new "payola hot line" for employees to report infractions.

Broadcasters would admit to no wrongdoing under the three-year settlement, which would end an FCC investigation into payola practices.

Under the separate agreement, the new "rules of engagement" are aimed at requiring equal access to radio music programmers for all record companies as well as transparency in their dealings, said Peter Gordon, who has been leading the negotiations on behalf of the independents.

Gordon is president of Thirsty Ear Recordings, an independent record label, and has been in the music business for 31 years.

"It's absolutely the most historic agreement that the independent community has had with radio," he said. "Without a doubt, nothing else comes close."

DOJ_NMG_0140837

Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein, himself an amateur musician, has been in the forefront of the payola fight and has been credited with working out the settlements. "I love music and I want radio to sound fresh, dynamic and real. But payola gets in the way of authenticity because money drives the music, not its quality," he told the AP.

Pay-for-play scandals have not been a high priority for the FCC. The last time it took action was March 2000 when Clear Channel-owned stations KHKS-FM in Denton, Texas, and WKQI-FM in Detroit, Mich., were assessed fines of $4,000 each.

Most of the recent headlines regarding payola have been generated by former New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, now governor, who has criticized the FCC's inaction. He made settlement deals with the four major record labels totaling $30.1 million, as well as with two broadcasters, CBS and Entercom, for another $6.25 million.

Federal law and FCC rules require broadcasters to inform listeners if a station is being paid to play a song. The FCC can fine its licensees, but any criminal investigation would be undertaken by the Department of Justice.

When finalized, the consent decree will result in the second-largest fine ever issued by the FCC — if a recently reported $24 million settlement with Univision Communications Inc. regarding children's television obligations is also approved.

The broadcasters represent four of the six largest radio firms in the U.S. and own a combined total of 1,653 stations. The cash breakdown on the settlement is Entercom, $4 million; Clear Channel, $3.5 million; Citadel, $2 million; CBS, $3 million.

Representatives of the companies could not immediately be reached for comment Monday.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin was widely credited with pushing through the large cash settlement. Speaking generally, FCC spokeswoman Tamara Lipper said of the payola issue that "the whole point is that people should know when they're being influenced and by whom."

In a statement Monday, Commissioner Michael Copps said pay-for-play "cheats radio listeners and will not be tolerated." Radio, he said, is "supposed to be our pipeline to exciting, local undiscovered acts — not more nationalized pablum from big media companies."

Big Radio Settles Payola Charges (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Radio listeners sick of hearing the same tunes again and again may soon encounter surprising new voices, thanks to a $12.5 million settlement pending against major broadcasters accused of taking record companies' bribes.

The four broadcast conglomerates, which together own more than 1,500 stations, have agreed to pay hefty fines and to provide air time for local artists and independent record labels, government and industry officials said yesterday. The negotiated settlement is meant to end a probe into the practice of what is known as "payola," in which large record companies quietly give cash or other benefits to radio station employees who agree to play music by the companies' artists.

"This is the largest collective fine in the history of American broadcasting," said Jonathan S. Adelstein, one of the five members of the Federal Communications Commission. "It wipes payola off the radio dial," he said, and gives lesser-known musicians a chance to reach a wider audience.

For years Adelstein, a Democrat, has railed against pay-to-play practices. But he said the government was making little headway until New York attorney general Eliot L. Spitzer (D) -- now the state's governor -- conducted a major investigation. "He brought us the evidence we needed," Adelstein said in an interview.

Under the pending agreement -- reported yesterday by the Associated Press and confirmed by Adelstein -- Entercom Communications will pay $4 million in fines, followed by Clear Channel Communications ($3.5 million), CBS Radio ($3 million) and Citadel Broadcasting ($2 million). Adelstein said he expected a majority of the commissioners to approve the settlement this week.

Small record companies say payola limits the breadth of radio playlists because big labels pay to have their artists aired repeatedly. It is illegal for stations to accept such payments without publicly disclosing them.

Andy Levin, Clear Channel's executive vice president, said in a statement that his company has "devoted tremendous resources" to preventing payola at its stations. "While no violations were found," he said, "we are pleased to announce that Clear Channel has agreed to settle this longstanding payola investigation with the FCC. We believe it is time to close the door on this ongoing inquiry and move forward."

The other three companies declined comment or did not respond to requests for interviews.

Aside from paying the fines to the FCC, the four companies have agreed to give about 4,000 hours of air time to small record companies and local artists. "This is a new opportunity for fresher, newer artists to be heard on the radio," Adelstein said.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a Republican, said in an interview that he supported the settlement, which he said would "hopefully set a strong tone for the enforcement of the rules" regarding radio play.

Previous investigations have targeted the giver rather than recipients of payola. In 2005, music producer Sony BMG agreed to pay $10 million and Warner Music Group agreed to pay $5 million to settle Spitzer's allegations of offering payola to radio stations.

4 Radio Firms Commit Airtime To Indie Labels (WT)

By Kara Rowland

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

Kill Rock Stars, Appleseed Recordings and Fatboy Records may be coming to a station near you.

Four major radio companies have agreed to set aside more than 4,000 hours of free airtime to independent record labels, representatives from the broadcasters and labels said yesterday.

In a separate deal, Clear Channel Communications Inc., CBS Radio, Entercom Communications Corp. and Citadel Broadcasting Corp. also reached a $12.5 million tentative settlement with the Federal Communications Commission, according to company and FCC officials.

The agreements, first reported yesterday by the Associated Press, are intended to deter what is commonly known as "payola" or "pay for play," in which a radio station provides airtime to a record company in exchange for money or other goods.

Payola has been around for decades and was outlawed in 1960, when Congress passed a law making it punishable by a $10,000 fine and a year in prison. The term itself is a contraction of "pay" and Victrola, an early record player.

The monetary settlement with the FCC is part of a consent decree that has yet to be voted on by the full commission, sources said. It was reached at the same time broadcasters committed to providing 8,400 half-hour segments of airtime to small record labels and unsigned artists.

Broadcasters do not admit fault under the FCC deal, which calls for stricter oversight of their interactions with record labels. Some of the new requirements would include a limit on gifts from record companies; a special hot line for employees to report violations; and a fleet of compliance officers to monitor stations, which would list all items of value received from record companies in a database.

Of the four broadcasters involved, Clear Channel and CBS Radio own stations in the Washington area.

"While no violations were found, we are pleased to announce that Clear Channel has agreed to settle this long-standing payola investigation with the FCC," said Andy Levin, Clear Channel's chief legal officer. "Separately, the company is pleased to announce we are reaffirming our commitment to new and emerging artists by committing a significant amount of airtime to music performed by unsigned artists."

Clear Channel owns several local stations, among them WIHT-FM (99.5) and WASH-FM (97.1). CBS Radio, whose roster includes WJFK-FM (106.7) and the new WTGB-FM (94.7), declined to comment.

"It's one of those little miracles," Peter Gordon, president of independent record label Thirsty Ear Recordings, said of the airtime deal. Mr. Gordon, who acted as a chief negotiator for the American Association of Independent Music, said the parties have yet to hammer out the details of implementation but noted, "We have an understanding in principle."

In addition to airtime, broadcasters and the independent record companies agreed to new "rules of engagement" aimed at providing equal access to radio station programmers.

"Hopefully we'll hear more dynamic music on the radio," said FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein, a Democrat who has led the charge against payola, which he said puts smaller labels with less money at a disadvantage. "Everybody wants to turn the page and put payola behind us."

Many credit former New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who is now the state's governor, for exposing payola scandals. After opening an investigation three years ago, Mr. Spitzer reached settlements with the big four record labels -- Sony BMG Music Entertainment, Warner Music Group, Universal Music Group and EMI Group -- amounting to $30.1 million.

The FCC can regulate licensed radio stations but has no authority over record companies. Federal law allows radio stations to play songs in exchange for money as long as they disclose it.

During his tenure as attorney general, Mr. Spitzer also settled with Entercom and CBS Radio for a total of $6.25 million in agreements that are legally binding only in New York. Afterward, the FCC opened its own investigation.

Tom Taylor, editor of Inside Radio, warned that implementing the private agreement between labels and radio broadcasters "could be really sticky."

"The devil is in the details," said Mr. Taylor, a radio veteran. "People listen to songs because they like them. You can't turn it into a hit if it's not a hit."

Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat who has authored payola legislation, said he is withholding judgment on the decree until it is official. However, he said: "The apparent lack of acknowledgment of wrongdoing sends the wrong message.

Whatever the final settlement says, it is clear that we need continued oversight both internally and by the FCC to make sure the changes in the industry's practices are not just on paper."

An FCC official said the agreement could be made public as early as this week.

Broadcasters Agree To Fine Over Payoffs (NYT)

By Jeff Leeds

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Radio broadcasters have long been accused of corrupting the public airwaves by accepting bribes from corporate music giants.

But in a pair of agreements disclosed yesterday, the broadcasters moved to resolve accusations that they had auctioned off the airwaves by agreeing to pay a landmark penalty and pledging to play more music from independent recording artists.

Under a tentative settlement with the Federal Communications Commission, four of the largest radio station owners have agreed to pay a total of $12.5 million to resolve claims that they accepted cash and other incentives in exchange for playing songs — a practice popularly known as payola.

If approved, the settlement would rank as the biggest penalty ever imposed at one time by the F.C.C. — at least until the agency levies another proposed fine, $24 million, against Univision, the Spanish broadcasting giant, which is accused of sidestepping its obligations to supply educational programming for children.

The new penalty, which would come as part of a consent decree with the radio companies — Clear Channel Communications, CBS Radio, Entercom Communications and Citadel Broadcasting — would reflect perhaps the toughest F.C.C. enforcement of the decades-old regulations that prohibit broadcasters from taking secret payments in exchange for playing specific songs. Critics have accused the agency of lax enforcement.

The agency chairman, Kevin J. Martin, said, “I hope it sends a strong message to the industry that we will be enforcing these rules.”

The F.C.C. started formal investigations of the radio companies last year after disclosures that radio programmers accepted gifts, luxury trips and other enticements surfaced as part of an inquiry led by Eliot Spitzer, then the New York attorney general.

Mr. Spitzer reached a series of settlements with the four major music conglomerates — the Universal Music Group, Sony BMG Music Entertainment, the EMI Group and the Warner Music Group — totaling more than $30 million. CBS Radio and Entercom settled cases with Mr. Spitzer’s office for a combined $6.25 million.

The settlement with the F.C.C. comes at the same time as a separate arrangement in which the broadcasters agreed to devote more time to playing artists who are not signed to contracts with the four big record companies.

The deal, negotiated by the American Association of Independent Music, provides that the radio companies will broadcast the equivalent of 8,400 half-hour segments of music from such artists. The segments can run any time from 6 a.m. to midnight any day of the week, according to people briefed on the deal.

Representatives for the broadcasters declined to comment on the proposed settlements in detail.

Andrew W. Levin, Clear Channel’s executive vice president and chief legal officer, said: “While no violations were found, we are pleased to announce that Clear Channel has agreed to settle this longstanding payola investigation with the F.C.C. We believe it is time to close the door on this ongoing inquiry and move forward.”

The deal appears to close an embarrassing chapter for the music and radio industries.

Mr. Spitzer’s inquiry disclosed how such payments had become widespread as label executives pressed to obtain exposure for stars. In some cases, label executives offered payoffs directly; in others, they hired middlemen known as independent record promoters, to funnel gifts or other enticements to radio station personnel.

Many terms of the proposed consent decree mirror those in the settlements with Mr. Spitzer’s office. Under the three-year term of the F.C.C. deal, the broadcasters would tighten their policies governing the contact of their programmers with record labels, including limits on gifts they could receive.

As for the independent labels, Peter Gordon, who negotiated the separate arrangement on behalf of the independent labels, said radio programmers had been making decisions in a “climate of fear” after Mr. Spitzer’s inquiry, adding fewer new songs and all but shutting out small independent labels.

Mr. Gordon said that under a set of “rules of engagement” planned as part of the separate agreement with stations, programmers could now listen to lobbying efforts by certain independent promoters working on behalf of independent labels.

Smaller labels should be permitted to lobby for access using “proper professional honorable working relationships,” said Mr. Gordon, owner of an independent label called Thirsty Ear Recordings.

Some industry officials were skeptical that the new arrangements would result in a noticeable change for either artists or listeners.

Paul Porter, a former radio programmer who now runs Industry Ears, a Washington-based media research organization, said that compared with the settlements extracted by Mr. Spitzer, the F.C.C. settlement "basically lets the four biggest companies off the hook for peanuts."

Mr. Porter said he did not believe that the separate pledge to broadcast more independent music would amount to much.

"It sounds great, but it's business as usual," Mr. Porter said. "Only a fool would believe differently."

Prescription For Trouble (WSJ)

By Scott Gottlieb

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Inside the federal agencies that oversee parts of the health-care system, there is a palpable view that doctors can no longer be trusted to do the right thing.

The Food and Drug Administration, Medicare and even the Justice Department all believe they cannot rely on many doctors to heed safety warnings, wisely weigh new medical information, or follow treatment approaches that maximize health benefits or lower costs. So in recent years, these agencies have hatched rules that dictate when treatments should be delivered and even how they can be administered -- especially when it comes to new drugs.

The result is increasing federal regulation of medical practice that constrains health-care providers and limits the choices patients have. It might get worse. New legislation offered by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.,) and Michael Enzi (R., Wyo.,), intended to make drugs safer, would raise this regulatory burden by reducing a physician's discretion to exercise clinical judgment and erecting barriers that will exacerbate disparities in access to care.

The legislative proposal extends the FDA's ability to restrict which physicians can prescribe a medicine, and which pharmacies can dispense it, through risk-management plans that would accompany the approval of many new drugs. These "RiskMAPs," as they are called inside the FDA, already guide the use of about 30 marketed drugs as part of "voluntary" arrangements with drug companies.

Right now, pharmaceutical companies propose the plans to better balance the risks and benefits of their drugs, in order to secure FDA approval. But these plans impose burdens, especially on patients who already face difficulty obtaining the specialist care that many RiskMAPs require for the dispensing of new drugs. Thus the FDA and the pharmaceutical industry have mostly confined RiskMAPs to drugs with unpredictable and potentially deadly risks, such as anaphylaxis or rapid organ failure.

That sense of restraint is lifting. New proposals by Congress and the Institute of Medicine advocate RiskMAPs for mitigating a wider set of less-serious problems and to constrain the off-label prescribing of new drugs, even though such prescribing is the standard of care for many diseases. The proposals are gaining traction. Once the FDA is granted the authority to simply impose these RiskMAPs on drug companies, there will be a lot of political pressure on the agency to constrain prescription writing in the name of drug safety.

What would this mean? Consider the RiskMAP recently imposed by the FDA on the use of the diabetes drug Symlin. The new medicine can help very serious diabetics control swings in blood sugar and is one of the few drugs that promote weight loss. But Symlin has a narrow therapeutic margin and can sometimes cause dangerously low blood sugar. The FDA did not trust ordinary generalist doctors -- who treat most diabetics, especially poor or rural patients -- to properly prescribe the medicine or to limit its use to the labeled indication. So Symlin's RiskMAP tries to keep the drug out of generalist hands by, among other things, limiting promotion to doctors specializing in diabetes and who are also supported by certified diabetes educators.

Reflecting this pervasive mistrust of medical practitioners, Medicare is increasingly tying payments to the choices doctors make, compensating doctors more to follow certain cookie-cutter treatments or practice guidelines that are promoted by the agency because they are believed by government experts to maximize benefits or reduce health-care costs.

The Drug Enforcement Administration is also intruding into medical practice. Waging a campaign to cut down on prescription-drug abuse, the DEA has sought legislative authority that would give it a role in limiting the approvals of new pain products -- even though the agency has no ability to appreciate the public health considerations that create a medical need for better drugs to treat serious pain.

Meanwhile, the Department of Justice's war on off-label promotion by drug companies ends up criminalizing the exchange of truthful, non-misleading medical information with doctors on new uses for medicines. This even includes information derived from studies funded by other arms of the government such as the National Institutes of Health. Such was the case in the litigation DOJ recently waged and won against information exchanged on promising new anti-cancer uses for the osteoporosis drug Evista -- some of those uses are now standard care.

All of these approaches harm patients because they impose one-size prescriptions in an area of science that is marked by variation. Furthermore, parameters on the prescription of new drugs, like those imposed on the use of Symlin, create obstacles for patients who already face significant problems getting access to the latest drugs or the specialists who are ordained by FDA's RiskMAPs to prescribe them.

Medicare's treatment guidelines are not the right answer for everyone, because there is a need for judgment in medicine that attunes treatments to individual variations and preferences. DOJ's restrictions on the exchange of medical information deny doctors updated data on the most cutting-edge and specialized uses of new treatments.

Ultimately, we need a better system for accumulating new information about the risks and benefits of treatments, and for communicating this information to providers and patients so people can make more informed choices. The key to improvement is not direct regulation of patient care, but better tools and approaches for evaluating the pros and cons of the many choices patients confront.

Doctors share some blame for inviting this kind of regulation. Agencies have plenty of data showing that some doctors do not heed safety warnings or follow sound advice. Professional societies like the American Medical Association, the various medical journals, and even licensing boards have grown self-interested and have failed the first tenet of an autonomous profession: the ability to regulate itself.

The solutions to any of the health-care problems that government is trying to mitigate will not rest in Washington's constraining "fixes," but with these organs of medicine working with agencies to promote practice standards and safety measures that do not sacrifice medical autonomy and patient choice.

FBI Plans Probe Of Teen's Death (BSUN)

By Greg Garland And Gadi Dechter, Sun Reporters

The Baltimore Sun, March 6, 2007

Medical examiner rules case at juvenile facility a homicide

On the same day the state medical examiner ruled that the death of a student at the Bowling Brook Preparatory School was a homicide, the FBI said it is conducting an independent investigation into the incident.

At a joint news conference Monday in Westminster, federal officials said their investigation into the death of 17-year-old Isaiah Simmons was ordered last week by the Justice Department. Local officials said they would present evidence already gathered by the Carroll County sheriff to a grand jury to determine whether criminal charges should be brought in Maryland.

Simmons died Jan. 23 after being physically restrained for three hours by counselors at Bowling Brook, a privately run residential program for juvenile offenders.

Officials stressed that the medical examiner's ruling of a homicide -- meaning the death was the result of actions by another person or people -- does not necessarily mean a crime was committed. That will be decided by the grand jury next month, said David P. Daggett, Carroll County deputy state's attorney.

"I have no doubt in my mind that nobody intended to kill this young man," Daggett said. But he said the medical examiner had made clear Simmons did not die of a pre-existing medical condition. "They are ruling out any health issues [as causing] the death," he said. "They did say there were certain health issues, but that they were not the cause of death."

The examiner used broad language in describing the cause of Simmons' death as "sudden death during restraint." Medical examiners sometimes use the term when they suspect more than one factor might have contributed to death, such as asphyxia and heart failure.

Simmons' mother, Felicia Wilson, and four other family members sat in the front row of the county government meeting room where the news conference was held.

Faced with a phalanx of television cameras and microphones, Wilson briefly lost her composure and dissolved into tears. She said she was relieved, however, to hear of the homicide ruling.

"I'm just happy to hear of the news that they found out what really happened to my son," she said.

Simmons' sister, Danielle Carter, said she was glad to learn of the FBI's separate investigation.

"The family feels that it's always good to have several sets of eyes on an investigation, to make sure everything is done in compliance," she said. "We feel confident that the FBI and all other parties will get to the bottom of this and that justice will be served."

DOJ_NMG_0140842

Witnesses have told The Sun that Bowling Brook workers sat on a struggling Simmons until he passed out and died.

Under pressure from state officials, Bowling Brook announced last week that it will close Friday after five decades in operation. Simmons was placed there by the state Department of Juvenile Services after being found responsible in juvenile court for the robbery of another youth at the Inner Harbor.

The Carroll County Sheriff's Office has been investigating the death. Daggett said the grand jury will be asked to determine whether evidence supports any criminal indictments.

The state medical examiner's office has not released a report about Simmons' death but briefed county investigators. Daggett said he decided to present the case to a grand jury to get the benefit of the collective wisdom of a panel of citizens who will review the evidence and determine whether indictments are warranted.

He said a key question in such cases is whether the death was due to "gross negligence" or simple negligence. A finding of "gross negligence" could lead to criminal sanctions.

As an example, Daggett said, a motorist could be prosecuted for manslaughter if he were drunk or drove in an especially reckless way, but might not be prosecuted if he were simply negligent -- such as losing control while changing a radio dial.

Queen Anne's County State's Attorney Frank Kratovil Jr., who heads the Maryland Association of State's Attorneys, said cases like Simmons' death can pose a difficult challenge for prosecutors.

"Not every tragic event is a criminal matter," Kratovil said. "The question is going to be: 'Was this a grossly negligent act that is the functional equivalent of an intentional act?' "

He said it is common for prosecutors to take such cases before a grand jury. Some Maryland counties bring all felony cases before a grand jury, he said.

"As a prosecutor, it gives you some feedback on what the issues are in the event you decide to indict," he said. "When you have a case where there are real questions about either the facts or the law, then a grand jury is a very valuable tool."

In announcing the findings of the medical examiner, the sheriff's office said it had collected more than 100 pieces of evidence and had interviewed dozens of staff members and students. Some student witnesses have told The Sun that they were interviewed only while held at Bowling Brook, not outside and away from the school's staff where they could speak more freely.

Kevin R. Lewis, the assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Baltimore office, said at the press conference that federal authorities began monitoring the Simmons' case several weeks ago at the request of the sheriff's office.

"You've got a young person's loss of life at an institution, and that gets our attention," he said.

Last week, the U.S. Department of Justice asked the FBI to formally launch a separate investigation to determine whether federal civil rights laws were violated, Lewis said.

The investigation will "be starting right away," he said, and the results will be reported to the Justice Department.

An FBI spokeswoman, Michelle Crnkovich, stressed that the investigation is not an indication that the federal government lacks confidence in Carroll County's probe.

"Absolutely not. We have every confidence in them," she said.

The death at Bowling Brook marks the third time in the past four years that federal authorities have investigated Maryland's troubled system for dealing with juvenile offenders.

A federal investigation of the state-run Charles H. Hickey Jr. School in Baltimore County chronicled deplorable conditions. The state addressed the issue by shutting down most of the school in 2005.

Federal officials also have investigated dangerous conditions at another program run the state, the Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center, which often has been crowded and understaffed.

Maryland's newly appointed Juvenile Services secretary, Donald W. DeVore, said Monday there is no question Maryland's system is badly in need of reform.

"Today's ruling by the state medical examiner highlights the critical need to reform our Department of Juvenile Services so that all children in state custody are safe," DeVore said. "That is our mission, and failure is not an option."

Feds To Monitor Tuesday Elections In Four SoCal Cities (FBEE)

The Fresno Bee, March 6, 2007

The U.S. Justice Department said Monday it planned to monitor municipal elections in four Southern California cities to ensure they comply with federal voting law.

Federal observers on Tuesday will visit polling places in Azusa, Gardena, Paramount and Rosemead.

Last year federal investigators visited polling places in the region and determined that Azusa and Paramount failed to fully translate election materials into Spanish, as they are required to do under the federal Voting Rights Act. Authorities also said Rosemead failed to offer all voting materials in Spanish, Chinese and Vietnamese.

DOJ_NMG_0140843

The Voting Rights Act requires cities to provide election materials in any foreign language that is spoken by a substantial number of people within their boundaries.

Azusa, Paramount and Rosemead each signed federal consent decrees last July requiring them to fix flaws in their election procedures.

Gardena, which has a large non-English speaking population, said on its Web site that it planned to provide ballots and polling place officials who can speak in English, Spanish, Japanese, and Korean.

Federal Monitors Will Oversee Gardena Election (TORDB)

By Gene Maddaus

Torrence (CA) Daily Breeze, March 6, 2007

The Department of Justice won't say why polling in the South Bay community will be receiving special attention on Tuesday.

The U.S. Department of Justice will monitor Tuesday's election in Gardena to ensure that the city complies with the federal Voting Rights Act.

In announcing the decision Monday, federal authorities did not explain why Gardena had been selected for special attention.

The other three cities chosen for election monitoring — Azusa, Rosemead and Paramount — are all subject to federal consent decrees related to ballot translations. But Gardena, which prints ballots in English, Spanish, Japanese and Korean, has not been cited for translation problems in the past.

"It's not a sign of censure," said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson. "It's routine. We want to do this to ensure compliance with the law."

Federal observers will be on hand at polling places in the city throughout the day. An attorney from the Civil Rights Division will coordinate the office's activities.

Election monitors can be deployed based on requests from local officials or complaints from the public. Magnuson said the department does not disclose the nature of the complaints.

City Attorney Ed Lee said he had received a call from the Justice Department last week informing him of the monitoring.

"They wouldn't tell me why they selected Gardena, whether it was a random choice or what," Lee said, adding that he believes it was random.

The City Council race has seen its share of allegations of misconduct, though it is impossible to know whether any of them got the attention of federal election monitors.

On Feb. 23, challenger Tasha Cerda filed a complaint with the state Fair Political Practices Commission, in which she asserted that Gardena police officers had been harassing her campaign workers. She claimed the officers had been writing down license numbers at her headquarters and stopping motorists nearby for no apparent reason.

The Gardena Police Officers Association has endorsed the incumbents, Oscar Medrano and Rachel Johnson.

Detective Russ Temple, president of the GPOA Political Action Committee, called the allegations "ridiculous," adding that no officer would risk his career over a City Council campaign.

In her complaint, Cerda objected to the use of Gardena officers to escort ballots from the precincts to City Hall.

Opponents of Medrano have accused him of repeatedly violating the city's sign ordinance, and many suspect Medrano illegally mailed an anonymous flier attacking challenger Dan Medina — a claim that Medrano denies. Medrano is also sharing a headquarters with the GPOA, an unusual situation that raised questions about a potential violation of city campaign financing law.

Johnson said she had heard complaints from residents that the multiple translations made it difficult for voters to navigate the sample ballot. The city has long provided Spanish and Japanese translation, but has only recently added Korean. But Johnson said she had not heard of any formal complaints related to that issue.

None of the candidates contacted Monday had been informed of the federal monitoring, or had any idea why it had been ordered.

"I guess it's for the better," Medina said. "If it's something that has to be done, then obviously it'll avoid some kind of hanky-panky."

Justice Department To Tour King County Jail As Part Of Investigation (SEAPI)

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, March 6, 2007

Justice Department officials are expected to spend the next few days in Seattle as part of an ongoing federal investigation, touring the King County Jail and interviewing staff members.

DOJ_NMG_0140844

In October, the department sent a letter to King County officials announcing that it would be investigating the main jail in downtown Seattle. Primary concerns were occurrences of sexual misconduct by corrections officers, suicides, and controlling the spread of infectious diseases.

Federal investigators made their first visit in December. A final report could take six months to a year.

KING 5 Seattle, March 6, 2007

SEATTLE - The Department of Justice will begin a three-day tour of the King County Jail Tuesday as part of an intensive investigation into possible civil rights abuses inside the Seattle facility. The D.O.J. plans to spend at least three days inside the adult jail focusing on sexual abuse of inmates as well as allegations the jail isn't doing enough to prevent suicide or the spread of infectious diseases.

Jail Director Reed Holtgeerts told KING 5 News he welcomes the investigation and has already begun providing the requested documentation into jail safety and procedures. Holgeerts is meeting this afternoon with the Department of Justice and union representatives for corrections officers and others who work in the jail.

Video

Allegations include sexual misconduct

Two former jail guards were recently convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates and a third is awaiting a retrial.

"The message has been sent very clearly that there is zero tolerance (for sexual misconduct)," said Holgeerts. "If we find it, you're gone and you're going to be charged."

Health issues

During a KING 5 investigation in the fall of November, 2005, corrections officers said that they were being exposed to serious diseases such as MRSA (Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus Aureus) and that the jail wasn't doing enough to prevent the spread of the highly contagious disease. Some guards told KING 5 they had contracted MRSA and passed it on to their spouses and children.

"Nobody wants to go home and be infected," said Holtgeerts. "We have added some sinks, improved training and ordered new mattresses. The more we learn, the more we do," he said.

The American Civil Liberties Union toured the jail late last month and says that while some improvements have been made, more needs to be done to stop the spread of MRSA. "We found cracked mattresses which can harbor the MRSA bacteria and problems with laundry not being exchange frequently enough," Doug Honig, Communications Director, said today.

LAPD Cops Object To Financial Disclosure Policy (CBS2)

CBS 2 Los Angeles, March 6, 2007

(CBS) LOS ANGELES Up to 600 Los Angeles Police Department anti-gang and narcotics officers have threatened to retire or transfer to other units if they are required to provide personal financial information, as mandated by a federal consent decree, police union representatives said Monday.

Los Angeles Police Protective League officials are considering a lawsuit to block the disclosure requirement, which was imposed following the Rampart Division corruption scandal, in which gang officers were caught stealing drugs and framing suspects.

The U.S. Justice Department's consent decree with the city requires future gang officers disclose their finances so supervisors might more easily tell if they were illegally profiting from police work.

"We have seen the LAPD repeatedly allow gang members and others to manipulate the system to target officers," Bob Baker, president of the league said.

"We have little confidence that information will be safeguarded once it has been released," Baker said. "The simple fact is that the financial disclosure rules that the LAPD is about to implement open the Pandora's box, once somebody's financial information is available and public, there is no way to turn back and make it private again."

In May, U.S. District Judge Gary Feess extended the five-year consent decree for another three years.

The LAPD has delayed implementation of the financial disclosure requirement while trying to modify the consent decree. Last year, Feess directed the department to move ahead with the plan.

LAPD officials have negotiated with the police union on how to implement the mandate, but talks have reached an impasse and the department could impose the requirement as early as this week.

"This still has to go before the Police Commission and the mayor and I have been working with the Department of Justice, the (consent decree) monitor and the federal judge to satisfy all parties," Police Chief William Bratton said in a statement.

Former Akin Gump Attorney Accuses Firm Of Age Discrimination (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 6, 2007

The old guard has been getting its dander up. First there was Sidley Austin, where partners are challenging the firm's mandatory retirement policy.

Other lawyers have followed, and just last week one Washington attorney filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia alleging that he was fired from one of the city's largest firms because he was too old.

Donald Gross, who is in his 50s, says he was let go from Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld in October 2004, not even a year and a half after he was hired as senior counsel in the Korea practice. Before his termination, Gross alleges that his practice group's head, Sukhan Kim, "reiterated to him that Akin Gump was terminating him not because of any defects in his performance, but because he was 'too senior' because of his age and, therefore, 'not a good fit.'"

Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman partner Christine Kearns, who is representing Akin Gump, says the firm treated Gross fairly. "The firm certainly denies the allegations of age discrimination," she says.

Gross' case differs from some of the other suits that allege more systemic problems or forced retirements. But it paints a picture of the trouble an older attorney had acclimating to life in a law firm.

According to the complaint, Kim was skeptical of Gross' age from the start. "You seem very old to be starting out in a major law firm," Kim allegedly told Gross before he was hired. (Before joining Akin Gump, Gross had worked at the State Department and National Security Council and practiced law in South Korea.)

Troubles grew worse, Gross states, after he took three weeks off for heart surgery in March 2004. When he returned, Gross alleges, Kim sidelined him and forced him to report to a much younger partner. The complaint says another partner, Michael Quigley hinted that Gross' experience "made him 'perfect' for a job with a policy think tank" but that he was too old to continue with the practice group.

Then, despite positive evaluations of his work, Gross also says, Kim came up with a "60-day exit strategy" for Gross.

Reached by phone, Kim declined to go into details but said, "I can just tell you that that is totally and actually false." Gross, who is represented by Bruce Fredrickson and Jonathan Puth at Webster, Fredrickson & Brackshaw, is asking for his job back and unspecified compensation for back pay and damages.

Two Officers Speak To Grand Jury On Killing Of Unarmed Black Man (NYT)

By Al Baker And Colin Moynihan

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Two of the five police officers involved in the killing of Sean Bell, an unarmed black man who died in a hail of 50 police bullets, testified yesterday before a grand jury in Queens that is weighing evidence in the case.

The two officers, Detective Paul Headley and Officer Michael Carey, testified voluntarily without immunity from prosecution in the case, officials said. Union officials and lawyers for the men said they had been eager to talk about what occurred on Nov. 25, when they and their colleagues opened fire on Mr. Bell's car outside the Club Kalua strip club in Jamaica, Queens.

Yesterday's events were noteworthy because city police officers who are the focus of grand juries sometimes stay silent about their roles in such shootings. And the first public appearances by the officers — more than three months after the shooting of Mr. Bell — made for a day filled with emotions.

In the morning, Detective Headley, 35, was surrounded by about a dozen people, including his lawyer and union officials, when he strode toward the office building in Queens where the grand jury is seated. He wore a blue suit, stepped confidently and appeared to be at ease. He testified for about two hours and then left the building about 2:30 p.m., again surrounded by supporters.

Officer Carey, 26, arrived later, about 3:30 p.m., also wearing a business suit but appearing tenser as he kept his expression fixed, his eyes set straight ahead. He testified, then left the building about 5:20 p.m. with supporters, including Patrick J. Lynch, the president of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, by his side.

Separately, each officer declined to discuss his testimony. But union officials and their lawyers spoke for them. "My client is relieved that he had the opportunity to answer the questions the grand jury posed to him," said John Arlia, the lawyer for Detective Headley. "He is relieved he had the opportunity to speak to them and tell his version of the events."

Stephen C. Worth, the lawyer for Officer Carey, said, "This officer stood there and answered all of their questions." He said his client testified for about an hour and a half.

Each lawyer declined to discuss whether he had asked the grand jurors to hear additional witnesses, an option in such matters.

Mr. Bell, 23, and his friends were celebrating his bachelor party just hours before his scheduled wedding when the shooting occurred. Two of his friends, Trent Benefield and Joseph Guzman, were wounded. Mr. Benefield, who is black, and Mr. Guzman, who is Hispanic, testified before the grand jury last week.

Of the five officers who fired the 50 shots, three are black and two are white. Detective Headley, who is black, fired one bullet and Officer Carey, who is white, fired three, officials said. On Wednesday, Detective Marc Cooper is expected to testify, as is the 28-year-old detective who fired the first of the 50 shots and who has not been officially identified by the authorities because of his undercover status.

It remains uncertain whether Detective Michael Oliver, who fired 31 of the shots, will testify before the grand jury. Michael J. Palladino, president of the Detectives' Endowment Association, said he expected Detective Oliver to testify on Friday.

When the grand jury will finish its work — to determine whether any of the five officers who opened fire on Mr. Bell's car will face criminal charges — is unclear, but officials said it could be as early as the end of this week or sometime next week.

Yesterday, Mr. Palladino said that the actions of the officers did not rise to the level of criminality.

"I hope the grand jurors see these officers for who and what they are," Mr. Palladino said. "All of the officers involved are sincere, humble individuals and the actions that they took that night were during the performance of their duty and they were acting in good faith."

He added: "There was no criminality in their hearts, nor in their minds, when they took the actions they took."

Mr. Lynch said he was happy that Officer Carey could finally speak about the shooting, to "put some facts to some of the fiction that ran in the street."

"We're pleased that today has come where we have the opportunity for this police officer to go out and tell his side of the story: the thoughts he had at the time, the facts that he dealt with out in the street that night," Mr. Lynch said.

Officer Charged In Teen Beating (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

A 41-year-old LAPD officer was charged today with unlawful use of force and filing a false police report for allegedly choking and punching a 16-year-old boy in the Central Division station in December.

Officer Sean Meade's actions were recorded by a hidden camera that had been installed after some chairs at the station had been vandalized. Police Chief William Bratton and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa both expressed outrage at the incident. Bratton immediately called for the arrest of Meade.

Department sources who viewed the video said it appears to show Meade choking the boy, then removing his handcuffs and challenging him to a fight.

The teenager was arrested on suspicion of a curfew violation in Chinatown, and Bratton said the attack was without provocation. The boy was picked up about 1:30 a.m. while walking with a teenage girl. Police called the girl's parents, who picked her up, then took the boy to Central Division.

Officers were not informed cameras had been installed in the detective room, where the beating allegedly occurred. Technicians enhanced the original video, which was grainy.

Meade was to be arraigned today.

Court Reaffirms Colo. Redistricting Plan (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, March 6, 2007

The Supreme Court on Monday ruled against Colorado voters challenging a congressional redistricting plan favorable to Democrats.

In a unanimous decision, the justices said that three Republican voters were not entitled to sue in an effort to replace a redistricting plan ordered by a court with one passed by a Republican-controlled state legislature. The three voters were joined by a former Democratic state legislator who often voted with Republicans.

A Democratic state judge drew up the first redistricting plan in 2002, while the Republican Legislature drew one up in 2003.

The court plan had been put in place when a divided Colorado General Assembly was unable to agree on one in time for the 2002 election.

In their lawsuit, the challengers said the court-imposed map violates a right of citizens under the U.S. Constitution to vote for congressional candidates in districts created by state legislatures.

DOJ_NMG_0140847

In an unsigned opinion, the justices said that the only injury the voters allege is that the Elections Clause had not been followed.

"This injury is precisely the kind of undifferentiated, generalized grievance about the conduct of government that we have refused to countenance in the past," the court stated.

The Colorado case is the Supreme Court's latest foray into congressional redistricting battles. Last year, the justices addressed a messy redistricting fight in Texas, ruling that the Constitution does not bar states from redrawing political lines in mid-decade when one party or the other senses an advantage.

The decision grew out of a court review of a Texas redistricting plan orchestrated in 2003 by Tom DeLay, who was a Republican congressional leader at the time.

In the Colorado case, a panel of federal judges last August dismissed the Republicans' lawsuit, saying the same issue had already been decided in an earlier lawsuit brought by the Colorado attorney general.

In that case, the Colorado Supreme Court ruled against the Republican legislative plan in 2003, saying the state constitution restricted congressional redistricting to once per decade and that the legislature's plan was the second plan.

New Scrutiny Of 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' (CSM)

By Gordon Lubold

The Christian Science Monitor, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

"Don't ask, don't tell" – the 14-year-old policy that keeps openly declared gays from serving in the military – is coming under new scrutiny.

Overturning it remains an unlikely prospect in the near term, given the political explosiveness of the issue. But the needs of war – and a fresh push by gay advocates in the courts and Congress – is pushing the policy back into the limelight. For example:

·In a January op-ed, a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said the policy no longer made sense in a time of war, when young men and women were needed no matter what their sexual orientation. "I now believe that if gay men and lesbians served openly in the United States military, they would not undermine the efficacy of the armed forces," retired Army Gen. John Shalikashvili wrote in The New York Times.

·In Congress, Rep. Martin Meehan (D) of Massachusetts is reintroducing legislation with more than 100 cosponsors to lift the ban. With a new Democratic Congress, there is a growing sense that the issue can be seriously debated once again.

·On Wednesday, 12 former service members released from service under "don't ask, don't tell" will argue their case before the federal First Circuit Court of Appeals in Boston. They want the court to overturn a lower-court ruling that didn't allow them to make a case as to why the ban on gays is unconstitutional.

"I think we are finally making progress," says Representative Meehan. "It will be an uphill climb, but the November election can only mean good things for my bill."

Nearly 11,000 military personnel have been discharged under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy, according to a Government Accountability Office report in 2005, including about 750 personnel in jobs critical to the war on terrorism, like translators. Thousands more are thought to have voluntarily left the military – or never joined – because of the policy, gay and lesbian advocates said.

Policy created in '93

The policy was created in 1993 to calm the waters after President Clinton's initial attempt to force the military to accept homosexuals serving openly. General Shalikashvili, who then headed the Joint Chiefs, supported the policy at the time. But after discussions last year with several gay and lesbian service members, he says he's changed his mind.

Recent opinion sampling reflect a similar shift in attitudes.

A Zogby poll of more than 500 service members released late last year found that 73 percent of military members are "comfortable" with lesbians and gays and 23 percent "know for sure" that someone in their unit is homosexual.

Supporters grow but still a minority

An annual poll begun in 2003 by the independent Military Times newspapers has shown a yearly increase in support for homosexuals serving openly in the military. Nevertheless, in its latest poll, only 30 percent of a sampling of 6,000 of subscribers approved of the idea.

Advocates say the current generation of recruits are from the "Will and Grace" generation, people who have been exposed to homosexuality in pop culture and for whom sexual orientation is not considered as important as it is to other generations.

"Within the last two years, it has been truly remarkable how many service members who are openly gay or lesbian are ... serving without incident," says Steve Ralls, a spokesman for the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, an advocacy group based in Washington, D.C., for gay service members.

But supporters of "don't ask, don't tell" doubt that it will be changed. The apparent momentum for the legislation Meehan introduced is "manufactured," says Elaine Donnelly, president of the Center for Military Readiness, based in Washington.

Think tanks and advocacy agencies aren't the ones who will sway Congress one way or another. Ultimately, it's the rank and file who will have to be convinced and, in some quarters, that will not come anytime soon.

One soldier who likes to say he joined the military "back when the Army used to be an Army," 31 years ago, said he doesn't understand where these polls saying there is increasing acceptance of homosexuals in the military are coming from.

"Who are they asking? I'm not seeing anything near what the supposed poll data was proclaiming," said the soldier, who asked not to be identified because he had not been cleared to discuss the policy by his senior commander. He said he believes gays are "morally wrong," and has conducted some informal polling in his unit in Georgia to determine its views. No one he has talked to believes homosexuals should serve, he said.

"I'm from a Christian background and I believe what the Bible says," he said. "Automatically, you have to love the sinner, but you don't have to love the sin."

Who's Wrong When Rights Collide? (WSJ)

By Suzanne Sataline

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

For 15 years, John Nemecek was a respected business professor and associate dean at Spring Arbor University, an evangelical college in Michigan. But after he started wearing makeup and earrings and asked friends to call him Julie, he was demoted, then fired, and told that his womanly appearance violated "Christian behavior."

Prof. Nemecek is contesting the dismissal under federal discrimination laws, presenting a test in a growing clash between religious and employee rights. The case is the latest of a number of conflicts pitting two constitutional principles against each other: the freedom of religious organizations to operate without government intrusion versus the rights of workers to be free of discrimination based on race, religion, sex or nationality.

Prof. Nemecek's complaint to the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, scheduled to be heard today, charges that the university, which is affiliated with the Free Methodist Church of North America, violated federal and state civil-rights laws by ordering the professor to groom and dress like a typical male. The school also violated Michigan's law protecting the disabled, the complaint says, because it allegedly treated Prof. Nemecek as if he had a disability that prevented him from doing his job. Spring Arbor declined to comment on the specific allegations in the EEOC complaint.

Since Congress passed the Civil Rights Act in 1964, courts have recognized that churches enjoy a "ministerial exception" allowing them to discriminate to uphold their beliefs. This right is recognized when it comes to selecting clergy, such as allowing Catholics to exclude women priests, but courts have not settled on the sweep of this exception -- and whether it would cover teachers of secular subjects at religious institutions, says Eugene Volokh, a professor at the University of California Los Angeles School of Law.

Civil-rights groups said they have received a growing number of complaints from gay and transgender employees dismissed for religious and other reasons. St. Anselm College in Manchester, N.H., settled last year with a former computer worker who sued the Catholic school alleging discrimination when he was fired him after announcing he would become a woman. A youth counselor is suing the Kentucky Baptist Homes for Children Inc. in U.S. District Court in Louisville, saying the home, which received state funding, illegally let her go because she's a lesbian.

Federal courts have also issued mixed decisions on whether people changing their sex are protected by civil-rights laws, disagreeing over what constitutes discrimination based on sex. Prof. Nemecek's lawyer is basing her argument on a 1989 U.S. Supreme Court opinion. The justices found that Price Waterhouse engaged in gender stereotyping by illegally denying Ann Hopkins a partnership because of her "macho" behavior.

That ruling formed the backbone of a 2004 decision in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati. The judge ruled that Salem, Ohio, illegally fired a transsexual firefighter because the U.S. Civil Rights Act protects someone who does not "act and/or identify with his or her gender."

Michigan is in the same federal circuit as that case. Some experts say Prof. Nemecek faces a higher hurdle than the firefighter because of the special federal treatment for religious employers. "This will be a major case because of that religious wrinkle," says Julie Greenberg, a professor at Thomas Jefferson School of Law School in San Diego, who has written on transsexuals' rights.

Ms. Greenberg says the court will be forced to determine the difference between religious belief and prejudice. "Are we going to make religions codify everything in order to make them prove it's part of their religious practices?" she asks. "Does it mean they can never validly claim this is their right? It's very complex."

DOJ_NMG_0140849

Spring Arbor faculty must agree to a community covenant affirming biblical principles and "model Christian character to our students," though they are not required to be Free Methodists, says Gayle D. Beebe, university president. "It's an expectation they will be acting out the Christian faith both in the way they teach and in the way they live." The school's 1,400 students are not required to be Christian.

An ordained minister with the conservative Baptist General Conference, Prof. Nemecek started as an adjunct teacher in 1990 and rose to assistant dean for adult education. Prof. Nemecek taught religion and business.

Prof. Nemecek, married for 35 years and the father of three, says he suffered from uncertainty about his sexuality since childhood. In 2004, a doctor diagnosed "gender-identity disorder," in which sexual identity differs from one's body. Prof Nemecek, now 55 years old, began wearing looser clothing, manicured his nails and started hormone therapy, in time developing breasts. The professor has not had gender-altering surgery.

The professor and wife, Joanne, a nurse, decided to stay together. "I feel like Julie's condition doesn't negate my marriage vows," Ms. Nemecek says. They told Prof. Nemecek's superiors about the diagnosis in fall 2005. Soon after that, Prof. Nemecek says, the school took away responsibilities -- including running orientations for new students and helping at graduation.

In a new contract signed last April, the university revoked the dean's post and reassigned Prof. Nemecek to a non-tenure-track role, working from home, teaching online, and taking an $11,000 pay cut to about $45,000. Under the agreement, when visiting campus, Prof. Nemecek would be barred from wearing makeup and female clothing or exhibiting any outward signs of femininity. "We felt through a job reassignment we could give him the space to work on this issue," says Mr. Beebe, who declined to answer other questions, citing a "legal proceeding."

Prof. Nemecek signed the contract. "Because it was so late in the academic year, it was almost impossible to move," the professor says. A school official sent a written warning in October listing four violations of the contract, two that concerned the professor's visits to campus in makeup and earrings, which the professor acknowledges. Another violation concerned the professor wearing a university T-shirt while in makeup, which Prof. Nemecek also admits.

The professor filed his EEOC complaint in October. University officials said in December they would not renew the contract and barred Prof. Nemecek from teaching in February.

"Essentially they're saying they can define who is a Christian," says Prof. Nemecek, whose Baptist church also asked him to leave the congregation. "I don't agree our biology determines our gender."

College Conservative Settles Over Firing (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

DENVER -- Anson Rohr is known as an outspoken critic of global terrorism. Ordinarily, that wouldn't be enough to get a person fired.

But Mr. Rohr says that's what happened after he hung an anti-terrorism poster at his work space, urged a religion professor to present a balanced view of Islam and generally made no secret of his conservative views at Front Range Community College.

After he was fired last year from his job as an administrative assistant, Mr. Rohr sued college officials for violating his free-speech rights. Last week, he agreed to accept an undisclosed financial settlement.

In return, Mr. Rohr, 50, is prohibited from working again at the Westminster, Colo., college. Although he misses the flexible schedule and paycheck, he said, saying goodbye won't be a problem.

"It was pretty awful to work there because of the radical-left bent," said Mr. Rohr. "I was the token conservative."

Front Range Vice President Andrew Dorsey declined to respond, saying he was unable to comment on personnel matters.

Mr. Rohr, who was employed at the college for five years, has a long history of conservative dissent.

He wrote letters to the campus newsletters responding to left-wing articles. He criticized an anti-war presentation at the college. He sent an e-mail to a religion professor asking for information about a course on Islam after hearing that the course presented an unbalanced view.

The last straw, however, was his decision to hang a poster at his desk depicting a scene from the school massacre at Beslan, Russia, where Muslim terrorists killed 334 students and adults in 2004. The print showed a man carrying a dead child.

A faculty member, Julie Voss, saw the poster and wrote an e-mail to administrators asking for its removal, saying she was "deeply offended," according to court documents.

Dean of Instruction Therese Brown called Mr. Rohr and ordered him to remove the picture, but he refused, citing his First Amendment rights. He also argued that other college employees were permitted to display signs with political messages.

Mr. Rohr cited a bumper sticker with the slogan "Bush Lied, People Died" on one administrator's office door. One hallway near Ms. Voss' office had graphic pictures of Vietnam War victims, Holocaust survivors and Civil War carnage, he said.

Mr. Rohr, who had regularly received positive job reviews, said he hung up on the dean after she continued to berate him. She denied the accusation in court documents.

He was placed on administrative leave later that day and fired upon his return the next month. In his letter of termination, administrators said he was guilty of insubordination for hanging up on Ms. Brown.

Mr. Rohr has called the whole incident "a big setup." He said he was prohibited from revealing the amount of the financial settlement, but said he was "satisfied" with the outcome.

"I was happy with the results," he said. "As soon as I get my check, I'm going to e-mail them and say, 'Maybe next time, you'll think about the First Amendment first.' "

Editorial: Justice Served (RTD)

Richmond Times-Dispatch, March 6, 2007

An adage teaches that justice delayed is justice denied. In the case of those killed during the fight for civil rights in the mid-20th century, the tardy justice promised by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller is important nonetheless.

Spurred by a string of successful prosecutions of murders dating to the civil-rights era, the Department of Justice and FBI announced they will open investigations into 12 additional unsolved cases. In all, Gonzales and Mueller expressed an interest in 40. To individuals who up to this point "have quite literally gotten away with murder," the FBI director spoke with clarity: "You've not gotten away with anything. We're still on your trail."

Every murder is heinous, and all perpetrators should answer for their crimes. Yet those killed in the cases the DOJ and FBI have reopened often died only because they had dark brown skin. These victims deserve the special attention Washington will now focus on them. Society deserves the attention, too. The prosecutions serve a penitential function.

If the individuals who committed these crimes are still alive, they should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law, no matter how elderly the assailants or their conspirators. This rights a specific wrong, and it sends a proper message about the rule of law to the communities these crimes were calculated to intimidate. In these instances justice delayed is justice served.

Free To Vote In Florida (NYT)

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Florida is notorious for running elections badly, but its new governor is trying to fix one of the state's most unjust and undemocratic practices. He has called for tearing down the barriers that prevent as many as 950,000 ex-offenders from voting.

The United States stands alone in the free world when it comes to laws that strip convicted felons of the right to vote — sometimes for life — even after they complete their sentences and go on to crime-free lives. Of the more than five million citizens who were barred from the polls in the last presidential election, virtually all would have been free to vote in nations like Canada, France or Britain.

Northern and Midwestern states are gradually backing away from voting bans for ex-offenders. But these antidemocratic laws remain entrenched in the Deep South, where they were enacted in the late 19th and early 20th centuries as part of a broad effort to restrict the political influence of African-Americans. And Florida has the most restrictive laws and the highest number of disenfranchised ex-offenders of any state in the country.

As it stands now, Floridians who want their voting and civil rights restored must apply to a slow-moving state clemency board that meets only four times a year and has an enormous backlog of cases. The state attorney general recently suggested enlarging the overall staff and having the clemency board meet more frequently, but more substantial action is needed.

Gov. Charlie Crist has a better idea: automatically restoring voting rights to felons who complete their sentences. In a recent speech, Mr. Crist pledged to lead the movement for the restoration of voting and civil rights for ex-offenders in Florida and hinted that he might do so by issuing an executive order.

That's an excellent proposal. It would take the restoration issue out of the hands of a sluggish bureaucracy that has clearly failed to do its job and vault Florida to the forefront of a national movement that aims to extend democracy to ex-offenders. It would also help put an end to one of the most shameful episodes in American electoral history.

ANTITRUST:

Intel May Have Lost Emails (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140851

AMD Suit Suffers Possible Fresh Blow; Sales Outlook Dims

Intel Corp. said it may have lost many internal emails that it is obliged to produce for rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and other plaintiffs in high-profile antitrust litigation.

The disclosure -- which could further complicate AMD's antitrust suit against Intel -- comes as AMD warned that it expects to miss its first-quarter revenue target amid an intensifying battle with Intel, its far larger competitor.

An Intel spokesman said it couldn't yet estimate the number of missing emails, expressing optimism that it will be able to recover most of them. Richard Horwitz, a lawyer representing Intel, wrote the judge overseeing the litigation that the company "very much regrets this happened."

AMD sued Intel in June 2005, accusing the company of using a variety of improper tactics to maintain a monopoly in sales of microprocessors that provide the calculating power for most personal computers and server systems. Private antitrust suits on behalf of Intel shareholders followed. Intel has insisted that its tactics are fair and legal. The AMD suit against Intel was filed in U.S. District Court in Delaware.

The wide-ranging cases touch on Intel's dealings with many computer makers, retailers and other companies. Chuck Mulloy, the Intel spokesman, said the company has already produced 17 million pages of documents to plaintiffs as of last week.

Mr. Horwitz's letter, and a court filing by AMD, point to a series of foul-ups in saving documents. Among other things, Intel continued to operate a system that automatically deleted employees' emails every 35 days. Employees designated as likely to have relevant documents were asked to identify and move them to avoid the automatic document purge. The company in October 2005 also began creating backup tapes of emails once a week from those employees as a last resort if there were lapses in individuals' data-retention efforts.

A number of problems arose, Intel said. For example, some employees failed to move emails that they created from their "sent" folders, so those documents were automatically deleted. The company said it also failed to notify all of slightly more than 1,000 employees on a timely basis about their duty to retain documents.

AMD, in its filing, attacked the underlying "honor system" of allowing employees to police what could be potentially incriminating communications, adding that "Intel executives at the highest level failed to receive or to heed instructions essential for the preservation of their records." The filing adds: "Everything that could have gone wrong did go wrong."

AMD's filing stops short of accusing Intel of deliberately destroying evidence. But Ned Fryer, an attorney for Bryan Cave LLP who specializes in document-retention issues, notes that the U.S. Supreme Court in December issued strict new rules that could severely penalize litigants who aren't able to show they took "reasonable diligence" in preserving documents.

Fines can range up to tens of millions of dollars, Mr. Fryer said, and juries may be instructed to assume that missing files constitute negative evidence, hurting a company's chances of winning a favorable verdict. He declined to comment on the facts of the Intel-AMD flap, but suggested that courts may consider it "unreasonable to continue any policy of automatically deleting or purging emails."

The letter from Mr. Horwitz says Intel is adopting new software that will preserve emails received and sent by the employees who were previously asked to retain their documents.

Separately, AMD said it won't achieve sales of $1.6 billion to $1.7 billion in the period ending March 31, as projected. On average, analysts polled by Thomson Financial had forecast first-quarter revenue of $1.66 billion.

The Sunnyvale, Calif., company, which had grabbed about a quarter of the microprocessor market by the fourth quarter, has faced much stiffer competition from Intel since summer. Hector Ruiz, AMD's chief executive, said at a Morgan Stanley conference that AMD overestimated demand from big computer makers.

Intel Admits Lapse In Document Preservation (CNET)

By Tom Krazit, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, March 6, 2007

E-mails related to Advanced Micro Devices' antitrust case against its chipmaking rival might be lost forever because of human error.

Intel disclosed Monday that it has failed to preserve some documents related to Advanced Micro Devices' antitrust suit against it--and AMD pounced on the admission.

Santa Clara, Calif.-based Intel said human error allowed documents--mainly e-mails--to slip through the cracks of a document-retention system put in place after AMD sued Intel in June 2005. AMD alleged that the larger chipmaker used the selective distribution of rebates to prevent certain customers from using AMD's chips.

"Intel is taking this matter very seriously. It very much regrets this happened," the company said in a letter to U.S. District Court Judge Joseph Farnan, who is overseeing the case. Intel and AMD are scheduled to attend a status conference on the case later this week, and will discuss the issue.

"The paradoxical result in a lot of these situations is that the company is worse off than what the document would have shown, because people assume the worst."

--Marc Ostrau, antitrust attorney

AMD was quick to respond to Intel's disclosure. "Through what appears to be a combination of gross communication failures, an ill-conceived plan of document retention and lackluster oversight by outside counsel, Intel has apparently allowed evidence to be destroyed," AMD said in a filing Monday with the U.S. District Court in Delaware.

The day after AMD filed suit, Intel preserved the data on its network, and later sent notices asking about 600 employees to retain specific information, the company said in its letter to Farnan. However, it did not instruct those employees to preserve e-mails from their "sent" folders, and since Intel automatically erases e-mails older than a few weeks or months--depending on the employee--those messages could be gone.

The company also failed to send document-retention notices to employees identified in 2006 as additional targets for the document-retention policy, despite having put them on such a list. And despite having preserved data on its network after the complaint was filed, the company has identified "a small number of backup tapes" in its Munich offices that were erased.

Intel thinks it can assemble some of the missing documents by combing through other documents it has already preserved, said Chuck Mulloy, an Intel spokesman. For example, sent e-mails likely received a reply that was preserved in the sender's inbox, or other Intel employees on the list might have been copied on the sent e-mail and it would have appeared in their inbox.

Also, many of the e-mails in question might have been preserved on weekly backup tapes set up in October 2005 to capture documents from several hundred employees. However, not all the employees on the list were migrated to a special e-mail server set up for that purpose, and some of the tapes have been "recycled," Intel said in its letter.

AMD called on the judge to require Intel to produce a full accounting of its document retention policy and errors, and to investigate possible remedial action.

"Although Intel has agreed to restore all data captured in the thousands of backup tapes it made and preserved, no one can say with any degree of confidence that this will put Humpty-Dumpty back together again, particularly as to the documents of the one-third of custodians who were never placed on any type of retention until last month," AMD said in its court filing.

Because most antitrust cases are about the effects of certain behavior, and not necessarily the behavior itself, it's unlikely that AMD's case would hinge on a single document or e-mail that might be missing, said Marc Ostrau, co-chair of the antitrust practice at the Mountain View, Calif., law firm Fenwick & West. But it sure does look bad, he added.

"The paradoxical result in a lot of these situations is that the company is worse off than what the document would have shown, because people assume the worst," Ostrau said. "When in fact it may be that the documents are completely innocuous, no one can completely be sure."

Problems such as lost documents are generally rare, but occur more and more in the electronic record-keeping era, Ostrau said. "The fact is that complying with your document retention policies is really hard in this day and age," he said. In fact, Fenwick & West has a group of lawyers and technology professionals dedicated solely to managing electronic records.

Wireless Carrier Alltel Reportedly Wooing AT&T, Others (SAEN)

By Sanford Nowlin, Express-News Business Writer

San Antonio Express-News, March 6, 2007

Wireless communications provider Alltel Corp. reportedly is shopping itself to AT&T Inc. and other potential buyers, but it's unclear how likely it is to reach a deal, analysts said.

Alltel, based in Little Rock, Ark., has talked with AT&T, Verizon Communications Inc. and private equity firms about a buyout, the Wall Street Journal reported Monday. Talks for a sale of the nation's fifth-largest wireless carrier still are in early stages, the paper said, citing people familiar with the negotiations.

However, Alltel's $22 billion market value could be a significant obstacle to the deal, analysts said. Based on the company's current stock price, a bidder would need to spend $30 billion or more to close a transaction.

"It's an expensive piece of property," Frost Bank telecom analyst Le Keough said. "A company like AT&T could take that same amount of money and buy spectrum and start offering their own service in those markets. There are always going to be spectrum auctions."

An official with San Antonio-based AT&T declined comment on the Journal report.

AT&T also could have other reservations about buying Alltel, experts said.

DOJ_NMG_0140853

The nation's largest phone company has expanded aggressively with a string of big buyouts. However, AT&T closed its $86 billion takeover of BellSouth Corp. late last year amid intense regulatory scrutiny and may not think another big deal would pass antitrust review.

What's more, Alltel uses a different wireless technology than AT&T, meaning the acquiring company would need to replace equipment and handsets to convert customers to its system.

Even so, analysts said, a takeover of Alltel isn't without appeal for AT&T and its largest wireless rival, Verizon. Many expected Alltel to seek a buyer once it spun off its landline phone business last year.

Alltel serves 12 million customers, mainly in small cities and rural areas, meaning one of the larger wireless companies could use it to fill in its networks. Verizon already has a deal with Alltel that allows its customers to call from its service territory without paying large roaming fees.

AT&T and Verizon also might pursue Alltel to prevent an easy purchase for a competitor, Stifel Nicolaus analyst Christopher C. King said.

"We believe neither party would want the other one to walk away with Alltel without a strong fight, thus leading to the potential for a bidding war for the asset," he said.

Memo: Microsoft Threatened To Shut Down Mac Office (COMPWRLD)

Computerworld, March 6, 2007

The threat came in 1997, as Apple struggled to regain its footing

March 05, 2007 (Computerworld) -- Microsoft Corp. threatened to dump the Macintosh version of Office 10 years ago during talks with Apple Inc. because the move would "do a great deal of harm" to its rival, according to a memo made public in a recently-settled antitrust case.

The 1997 memo from Ben Waldman, at the time the head of Microsoft's Macintosh development group, to then-CEO Bill Gates, urged Mac Office 97's release. The suite, which in June 1997 had not yet reached beta, was eventually released as Office 98 in March 1998.

But Waldman understood that the next Mac Office was a stick that could be used against Apple. "The threat to cancel Mac Office 97 is certainly the strongest bargaining point we have, as doing so will do a great deal of harm to Apple immediately. I also think that Apple is taking this threat pretty seriously," Waldman said in his e-mail to Gates.

Less than six weeks after Waldman's e-mail, Microsoft and Apple announced a deal under which the former bought $150 million of Apple stock. As part of the pact, Microsoft promised to release the next version of Office and was allowed to bundle Internet Explorer with the Mac OS. The two companies also agreed to a patent cross-licensing deal.

At the time, Apple was struggling. Steve Jobs had returned to the company only months before, and share prices were at all-time lows. The Microsoft-Apple agreement was seen by many as a bail-out of Apple by its long-time rival.

Later, the U.S. Department of Justice included the bundling of Internet Explorer among the charges it brought against Microsoft in its antitrust case. "Microsoft, by threatening to cease development of its Office for Macintosh productivity suite, coerced Apple into making Internet Explorer the default browser on all Macintosh operating systems and to disadvantage competing browsers," the federal agency charged in 1998.

Waldman also wrote in the memo -- which was revealed in the recently-settled Iowa antitrust case against Microsoft -- that keeping Mac Office alive was a good idea because the suite's users could be used as guinea pigs to test new features.

"Because Mac Office is so much less critical to our business than Windows, we have the flexibility to test out new things in the product before we try them on Windows," wrote Waldman. "I've personally also found the Mac market interesting because I've seen so many trends appear there first and eventually become important on Windows."

Waldman cited examples ranging from hard disk and memory use to user concerns over bloat in the suite.

CME And CBOT Up On CreditSuisse Upgrade (AP)

AP, March 6, 2007

Chicago Mercantile Exchange and CBOT Shares Rise After Upgrades to "Outperform"

NEW YORK (AP) -- Shares of Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. jumped Monday, as a CreditSuisse analyst upgraded the two commodities exchanges.

Analyst Howard Chen upgraded both stocks to "Outperform" from "Neutral." CBOT, which operates the Chicago Board of Trade, accepted an $8 billion buyout offer from CME in October. Shareholders will vote on the deal April 4. Chen said the future CME Group Inc. will benefit from recent market volatility due to its diverse products.

CME is the world's largest exchange trade, while CBOT is the main U.S. bond market. The Department of Justice is reviewing the deal.

"We expect continued market uncertainty surrounding the health of the emerging markets, sub-prime consumer credit worries and domestic inflation to drive near-term upside in U.S. futures volumes," Chen said.

Chen added that CBOT has improved its earning power since the deal was announced, but that the improvement has not been priced in. He raised his price target for CBOT shares to $190 from $169, and for CME shares to $650 per share from $580.

CME shares rose $19.71, or 3.7 percent, to $560 in afternoon trading, and CBOT shares gained $5.30, or 3.3 percent, to $165.80. Both exchanges trade on the New York Stock Exchange.

Areva Gets European Antitrust Approval On Repower Bid (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Brian Mcgee

Bloomberg, March 6, 2007

March 5 (Bloomberg) -- Areva SA, the world's biggest maker of nuclear power plants, won European Union antitrust approval for its 600 million-euro ($786 million) bid for German wind turbine-maker Repower Systems AG.

The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, announced the approval today after reviewing the transaction under a simplified procedure.

Suzlon Energy Ltd., India's biggest builder of wind turbines, on Feb. 9 offered 1.02 billion euros ($1.34 billion) for the German company, or 20 percent more than Areva's earlier bid. Repower's management is ``interested'' in the offer, Suzlon said March 2. Alstom hasn't raised its price.

Tulsi Tanti, Suzlon's chairman, is ``quite confident'' that the bid will be successful, he said on a conference call last week. The offer is being made together with Martifer, a unit of Portuguese builder Mota-Engil SGPS SA that already owns a quarter of Repower. Areva would be a ``fitting strategic partner,'' the German company said on Feb. 19 without endorsing either offer.

Shares of Areva closed down 34.4 euros, or 5 percent, at 648.5 euros today in Paris, while Repower fell 2.28 euros, or 1.7 percent, to 134 euros in Frankfurt. Stock markets across Europe extended last week's declines today amid concern a four-year rally in equity markets is endangered by slowing U.S. economic growth.

Suzlon stock closed down 63.5 rupees, or 6 percent, at 988.25 rupees today on the Bombay Stock Exchange.

One Careful Owner: Why Daimler Is Keeping Its Options Open As Rivals Eye The Troubled Chrysler (FT)

By John Reed And Bernard Simon

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

For the three weeks since DaimlerChrysler raised the prospect of decoupling the Detroit end of the US-German carmaker, merger talk, fevered rumours and even conspiracy theories have proliferated in an industry that has seen no large-scale tie-ups or dramatic partings since General Motors and Fiat severed their alliances in 2005.

The Stuttgart group's revelation that, after nine years, "all options are on the table" for Chrysler was accompanied by the disclosure of a $1.4bn (€1.07bn, £728m) loss at the US unit last year - and the decision was not sudden. People familiar with the situation have told the Financial Times that DaimlerChrysler made the announcement on its lawyers' recommendation, be-cause of advanced talks on Chrysler's future.

JPMorgan Chase had already been advising on options that are said to include a sale in full or part, or a flotation. It also emerged that the bank had contacted several private equity houses, which are in discussion with others including Wolfgang Bernhard, former Chrysler chief operating officer, about a possible consortium bid.

Perhaps most intriguingly, Fritz Henderson, GM's chief financial officer, has assembled a task team to explore a possible alliance between the world's largest carmaker and its crosstown rival. According to people close to the process, DaimlerChrysler has considered the idea of accepting a stakeholding in GM as payment for part or all of Chrysler.

If implemented, the solution would be financially expedient for the cash-strapped GM. It would also be politically smart for DaimlerChrysler, which would not want to be seen as having dumped its US unit unceremoniously.

Details of the links between Chrysler and GM or the topics discussed remain sketchy, as neither company will even confirm publicly that they are in contact. Dieter Zetsche, DaimlerChrysler's chief executive, told investors in London last week he hoped the strategic exercise at Chrysler, on which he did not elaborate, would be concluded quickly.

However, there are reasons for scepticism that any investor - whether GM, another industry player, the public markets or even deal-hungry private equity - would want to take on Chrysler's sprawling North American business and related baggage, including unfunded healthcare liabilities of around $18bn.

GM is immersed in its own restructuring programme and some Wall Street analysts think it has too many brands of its own to concentrate on already. Rod Lache, analyst at Deutsche Bank, notes that GM has recently sold off stakes in its GMAC finance arm, Fiat, Suzuki, Isuzu and Subaru and is focusing its business. Acquiring more brands and unionised workers "would appear counter-productive", he says.

A writer on GM's FastLane blog was more emotional last week, begging: "Please don't waste more precious product development money and timeon acquiring another failingcompany."

After Daimler's own vexed efforts to extract value from its relationship with Chrysler, many industry insiders are baffled or amused by the notion of another big-time car alliance. Several companies, including Fiat, Volks-wagen and Hyundai, have publicly disavowed any interest in Chrysler. Still, the reports are causing excitement in an industry where executives yearn for a quick fix for rising costs and intensifying competition. The topic is likely to dominate this week's Geneva International Motor Show, one of the automotive industry's biggest events.

Nor has the lack of concrete information on what is being discussed stopped analysts from running the numbers. A potential full-blown combination of GM and Chrysler would enjoy about a 36 per cent US market share for light vehicles - comparable to what GM enjoyed in the late 1990s and probably enough to permit it to defend its position against the expansive Toyota as the world's biggest carmaker.

It would create obvious cost savings in the white-collar jobs that could be cut by merging the two nearby head offices. It would be palatable for US public opinion and would probably pass muster with antitrust regulators, given Chrysler's and GM's diminishing US market share. "There are significant synergies, particularly over three to five years, that could make this company stronger," says John Hoffecker of AlixPartners, a Detroit-based consultancy.

Together, the two companies would enjoy greater leverage with the United Auto Workers union, allowing them to bargain for cuts in the labour costs that impair their ability to compete with foreign "transplants" - the American factories operated by groups such as Toyota. With closely watched talks on labour contracts expected to start this summer, the prospect of Chrysler being taken over by GM or others has turned up the heat on the UAW to give ground. Chrysler has estimated that its healthcare bill alone adds $1,400 to the cost of producing each US vehicle.

If a potential buyer can be shielded from Chrysler's un-funded healthcare liabilities, Chrysler could be "the cheapest car company in the world", concludes Adam Jonas, a Morgan Stanley analyst. He cites Chrysler's flexible assembly plants, lean workforce and iconic Jeep brand among its attractions; Chrysler also has a valuable financing arm. At Citigroup, John Lawson calls GM "a natural Chrysler acquirer" and estimates GM could create $9bn in value by extending its current turnround plan to include Chrysler assets should it take over the unit for free and stripped of its liabilities. "Chrysler commands a significant part of the US vehicle market," says Mr Lawson. "The question for new owners is whether they can turn around the business faster than incumbent management, or extract better concessions from the workforce."

There are many reasons to doubt that GM, at least, could. It is hard to see what Chrysler, with more than 90 per cent of its sales in North America, would offer the bigger company at a time when it is seeking to lower its dependence on the domestic market. Perhaps the biggest task would be rationalising their dealerships - 10,000 in all, selling 11 different brands. Toyota has roughly the same market share as Chrysler but fewer than half the number of dealers.

GM and Chrysler, like the rival Ford Motor, are trying to pare their dealer networks. But rationalisation is costly, as GM learnt five years ago when it discontinued the Oldsmobile brand and many states restrict the closing or merging of dealerships. Many dealers are wealthy and well-connected entrepreneurs and they are known for their political clout.

Uniting the two companies would also require some painful and costly choices about vehicles: with a handful of exceptions, Chrysler's model line-up offers little that GM does not already have. Chrysler's biggest drawcard for GM would be its minivans, which are leaders in a segment that GM itself is discontinuing. However, GM's Chevrolet Silverado and Chrysler's Dodge Ram pick-up trucks are each company's top-selling model and compete directly in this crucial segment: a combined company would find it hard to rationalise production of these without jeopardising the brand or upsetting dealers.

Both companies are also in the throes of updating an iconic muscle car, the Chevrolet Camaro for GM and the Dodge Challenger for Chrysler. "Overlap is good for the back office, but it's not good for products," notes Chris Hibbs, head of the UK automotive practice for PwC, the consultants.

For all these reasons, a GM-Chrysler deal - if it comes off at all - may be a co-operation agreement on one or more products rather than a full-fledged merger or group-wide alliance. Indeed, the industry norm these days is for ad hoc partnerships based on individual cars, components, or technologies (see below left).

DaimlerChrysler might prefer to cut a deal with private equity, which is already transforming the automotive parts industry. A group led by Appaloosa Management and Cerberus Capital Management is, for example, likely to emerge as the biggest shareholder at Delphi, America's leading motor components maker.

Cerberus, which was among those contacted by JPMorgan about Chrysler, has been taking an active role in talks with the UAW and other unions to whittle down Delphi's employee costs. The funds' interest in the automotive sector is clear, as they have recruited several prominent former car industry executives to their ranks.

In an industry where national pride or pressure from unions or political interests can constrain management, private equity investors would be more unsentimental and could thus, in theory at least, generate better returns. "Having a private equity infusion would probably cause better discipline and waste to be eliminated in order to make the company profitable, says Neil De Koker, president of the US Original Equipment Suppliers Association. "We need healthy customers to survive."

Few doubt that private equity firms could raise the money to buy Chrysler, whose value stripped of its employee-benefit deficits is estimated by analysts at between $3bn and $7bn. The bigger question is whether they or anyone else want a US-focused carmaker with all its problems, led by a heavily unionised workforce and a product line-up skewed heavily towards large gas-guzzling vehicles.

Some in the industry speculate that Daimler's February 14 announcement was intended primarily to pressure the UAW (and possibly Chrysler's own management) into making the unit a leaner operation. On the other side of the Atlantic, they add, Mr Zetsche may also have been seeking to placate shareholders and German unions frustrated with the group's losses in America.

Daimler does indeed appear to be keeping all options open, including that of continued life as a merged company. It is taking charges of €1bn on its 2007 earnings for the "recovery and transformation plan" that will see Chrysler reduce its staff by 13,000, or about 16 per cent, over the next three years, and benefit from an investment of $3bn in new engines, transmission and axles.

A leaner and better-run Chrysler will, by its own account, be ready for a "product offensive" of more than 20 new and 13 re-freshed vehicles by 2009.

This would leave Chrysler looking good, even if it stays under the Daimler wing, says Cit-i-group's Mr Lawson. "By the end of 2008, Chrysler could have the most youthful line-up of all the volume players in the US market, the transplants included."

Microsoft Attacks Google On Copyright (FT)

By John Gapper In New York

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Microsoft on Tuesday launches a fierce attack on Google over its “cavalier” approach to copyright, accusing the internet company of exploiting books, music, films and television programmes without permission.

Tom Rubin, associate general counsel for Microsoft, will say in a speech in New York that while authors and publishers find it hard to cover costs, “companies that create no content of their own, and make money solely on the back of other people’s content, are raking in billions through advertising and initial public offerings”.

Mr Rubin’s remarks, presaged in an article in Tuesday’s Financial Times, come as Google faces criticism and legal pressure from media companies over services allowing users to search online for books, films, television programmes and news. Viacom, the US media group, instructed YouTube, which Google owns, to remove 100,000 clips of copyright material.

The Authors Guild and a group of publishers backed by the Association of American Publishers have separately sued Google for making digital copies of copyrighted books from libraries without permission.

Mr Rubin will tell the AAP’s annual meeting that Google’s decision to take digital copies of all books in various library collections, unless publishers tell it not to, “systematically violates copyright, deprives authors and publishers of an important avenue for monetising their works and, in doing so, undermines incentives to create”.

He will say Google is breaching copyright law because it has “bestowed upon itself the unilateral right to make entire copies of copyrighted books”. Google thinks it is acting legally because it publishes only “snippets” of copyrighted works unless it has the publisher’s permission.

But Mr Rubin will say in Tuesday’s speech: “Google is saying to you and other copyright owners: ‘Trust us, you’re protected. We’ll keep the digital copies secure. We’ll only show snippets. We won’t harm you, we’ll promote you’.

“But . . . anyone who visits YouTube . . . will immediately recognise that it follows a similar cavalier approach to copyright.”

Microsoft is trying to differentiate itself from Google by portraying itself as more sympathetic to copyright holders than Google, and has sent a letter to executives of big media conglomerates, offering to work with them to eliminate piracy from Soapbox, a new video service on MSN.

Patricia Schroeder, AAP president, said it had agreed to work with Microsoft and others to develop principles on responsible book search.

Google said it believed it was acting legally and ethically in providing snippets of in-copyright books and added that it removed books promptly when contacted by publishers. It said it generated more than $3.3bn of advertising revenues for other internet sites last year, which showed that it did not simply exploit the content of others.

Citigroup Pursues Control Of Nikko Cordial (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0140857

By Andrew Morse

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

TOKYO -- Citigroup Inc. was poised to announce a tender offer to acquire more than 50% of Nikko Cordial Corp., a person familiar with the situation said. The prospective deal, which could be valued at as much as $5 billion, would be the biggest acquisition of a Japanese brokerage company by a foreign company.

Though the sides were close to an agreement, terms of a deal hadn't been finalized, the person said.

Such a move would come as Tokyo-based Nikko Cordial looks to shore up its business, which has been hurt by an accounting scandal that erupted last December. An internal investigation by the brokerage firm, Japan's third-largest by revenue, revealed that it had inflated its earnings for two years, prompting an exodus of clients.

The Tokyo Stock Exchange is considering whether to delist the company.

In a statement, Nikko Cordial said "negotiations [with Citigroup] are being carried out from various perspectives."

New York-based Citigroup and Nikko Cordial have long-standing ties. Citigroup recapitalized Nikko Cordial in 1998 and the two companies formed a joint venture investment bank, Nikko Cititgroup Ltd., which handles mergers-and-acquisitions advice and equity and debt underwritings. Citigroup still owns a little less than 5% of Nikko Cordial.

Taking control of Nikko Cordial would give Citigroup a huge presence in Japan, the world's second-largest economy. Nikko Cordial has a network of 109 branches across the country.

Owning the brokerage might also help polish Citigroup's reputation with individual Japanese. While Citigroup retail banking operations are flourishing here, it stumbled in 2004 when regulators pulled its private banking license amid a host of compliance problems.

Nikko Cordial shares jumped 14.3% to 1,347 yen ($11.52) amid speculation a bid was imminent.

Blackstone Buys Madame Tussauds Chain (WP)

By David Cho

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Private-equity giant Blackstone Group said yesterday that it had created the world's second-largest theme park group, behind Walt Disney Co., with its $1.9 billion buyout of Madame Tussauds waxworks museums.

Madame Tussauds will be managed by Merlin Entertainments Group, which is controlled by Blackstone. The combined company said it will operate 50 theme parks throughout the world, including Legoland, Sea Life and the London Eye. They drew more than 30 million visitors in 2006, second only to Disney's parks.

The move by Blackstone is part of an aggressive push into the theme park business that began two years ago with its acquisition of Merlin, an international theme park company, for $187 million. It then backed Merlin's purchase of the Legoland chain later in 2005 and Gardaland, Italy's biggest theme park, last fall.

Blackstone, one of the largest private-equity firms in the world, also was a member of the group that bought Universal Studios in Orlando and is an investor in Six Flags theme parks. Last month Blackstone made a huge splash by closing the biggest buyout deal ever when it purchased Equity Office Properties Trust for $39 billion.

Merlin executives said they planned to focus on expanding the wax museum company, which has 14 million visitors a year and operates six museums around the world, as well as other theme parks, hotels and a castle in Europe. It recently bought the London Eye, a giant observatory in that city and one of England's most popular attractions.

"The combined group . . . has the resources and expertise to focus on accelerating current expansion plans for all the brands, particularly in North America," Merlin's chief executive, Nick Varney, said.

A new Madame Tussauds wax museum is scheduled to open this October in the old Woodward & Lothrop department store building on the corner of 10th and F streets NW. The $16 million project will include replicas of the Constitution and Declaration of Independence as well as likenesses of presidents and other newsmakers. Visitors also will be able to visit a replica of the Oval Office and be greeted by a wax version of Abraham Lincoln.

Another new museum is slated to open in Hollywood in 2008.

Tussauds, a private company, was purchased for $1.5 billion in May 2005 by Dubai International Capital. Dubai International will receive just shy of $2 billion in cash in the deal and retain a 20 percent stake in the company.

A&P Reaches Pathmark Deal (PHI)

By Harold Brubaker

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0140858

The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. Inc., the owner of Super Fresh, said yesterday that it had agreed to buy rival Pathmark Stores Inc. in a deal worth up to $1.3 billion, including the assumption of debt. The cash and stock portion of the deal was $689.7 million.

The combined company would have 54 stores in the eight-county Philadelphia region with more than $1 billion in annual sales, making it the third-largest supermarket chain here behind Acme Markets Inc. and ShopRite Group P.L.C.

The Pathmark banner - which has a strong presence in urban neighborhoods - will remain, said executives at Great Atlantic, which is best known for its A&P stores.

"We don't plan to eliminate any stores. Their stores are highly productive," Christian Haub, executive chairman of A&P, of Montvale, N.J., said during a conference call with analysts. Pathmark is based in Carteret, N.J.

The deal is subject to review by the Federal Trade Commission and shareholder approval.

A&P said it expected the merged companies to cut $150 million in annual expenses within two years, but industry observers were skeptical about the combination of the two struggling chains.

"It will be a challenge, given that neither one has a leadership position," said Richard George, a professor of food marketing at St. Joseph's University, whose Haub School of Business is named after Erivan K. Haub, Christian Haub's father.

Christian Haub was optimistic that the proposed deal would pass a review by the FTC, which examines mergers from an antitrust perspective.

Dutch company Royal Ahold N.V. tried to buy Pathmark in 1999, but backed out after the FTC demanded the sale of a large number of stores to maintain competitive markets.

"The market has changed so dramatically in the past eight years," Haub said. "Food is not predominantly bought in just supermarkets anymore," he said.

Haub cited the emergence of Trader Joe's Co. Inc. and Whole Foods Market Inc., the proliferation of dollar stores, and the merger of drugstore chains as factors that have changed the market. Furthermore, he said, the region served by A&P and Pathmark is one of the few where all three major warehouse clubs - Sam's Club, Costco Wholesale Corp., and BJ's Wholesale Club Inc. - compete.

An antitrust expert said he was confident that the FTC would look at the proposed acquisition carefully. "The FTC will want to know what new chains or additional food retailers have come into Long Island and North Jersey," said James Fishkin, a partner in Dechert L.L.P.'s Washington office who worked at the FTC for 15 years before entering private practice in 2002. He worked on the FTC review of Ahold's proposed purchase of Pathmark.

Karen Short, an equity analyst with Friedman Billings Ramsey Group Inc., estimated that A&P might have to sell 25 to 35 stores to gain antitrust approval. She said the focus would be on North Jersey and Long Island.

The merged company would become the largest operator of supermarkets in Philadelphia, with 14. That would surpass ShopRite, which has 11, and Acme, which has 10.

Overall, the deal forms a chain with $11 billion in sales and 550 stores, mostly from Connecticut to Washington. Pathmark shareholders will receive $9 a share in cash and 0.12963 shares of A&P for each Pathmark share. A&P is also assuming or retiring Pathmark debt, bringing the total value of the acquisition to $1.3 billion, the company said.

Shares in both companies rose yesterday. Pathmark's shares gained $1.21, or 10.8 percent, to $12.46, while A&P's shares were up $1.64, or 5.3 percent, at $32.50.

Last year, A&P bought six Clemens Family Markets Inc. and converted them into Super Fresh stores, marking the chain's first growth in the region in about a decade. "They've slowly been picking up," said Eric Claus, A&P's president and chief executive officer.

Alaskan Bridge Projects Resist Earmarks Purge (NYT)

By William Yardley
The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Long after Congress removed about $450 million in budget earmarks for two bridges in the Alaskan exurbs, the fight over whether to build them is not dead.

Mocked as "bridges to nowhere" by critics who saw them as the epitome of Congressional excess, preparations for the projects have been slowly moving forward even as big questions remain over whether the bridges will be built.

When Congress removed the earmarks for the bridges in 2005, it still gave the state the money, but it allowed Alaskan officials to decide how to spend it. The state reserved about $200 million for the proposed bridges, far less than the construction costs but enough to show that there was serious intent to complete the projects. Some environmental and planning work has already been done.

Supporters of one of the bridges, the Knik Arm Crossing, are expected to get the proposal included in Anchorage's long-range city transportation plan in April.

The agency charged with building the bridge, a private-public partnership, is courting private investors for a toll-driven, for-profit venture. If built, the Knik bridge — which has been discussed since before statehood in 1959 — could cost about $1 billion beyond the approximately $110 million the project has received from Congress.

"If we can't sell this to Wall Street, then we're just going to pack up and go home," said Gordon Keith, director of the central region for the Alaska Department of Transportation and Public Facilities and a board member of the agency trying to build the Knik Arm Crossing.

Five hundred miles away, on the remote, spruce-spiked island of Gravina in southeast Alaska, construction is set to begin this summer on three and a half miles of roads that are intended to connect the island's airport and its 50 residents to the other proposed bridge, a 200-foot-high arc over the Tongass Narrows to the city of Ketchikan.

That bridge could make the current route to the airport, a five-minute ferry ride, obsolete. For now, the road and causeway construction are continuing, at a cost of $26 million, even as the bridge budget has ballooned to nearly $400 million and its prospects remain uncertain. The money for the road construction was included in an earmark that was not cut.

Representative Mark Steven Kirk, a Republican from Illinois who last year sponsored a measure to strip all federal financing for the bridges, said "Whoa!" when told of the money being spent on the Gravina road work. "Our work to end taxpayer support for this isn't finished yet," Mr. Kirk said. His bill passed the House but was not adopted by the Senate.

"The jury has decided that this is not an appropriate use of federal funds," he said. "In the end, I don't think there's a good way to spend the money in Alaska. In the long run, this is money that could go to other projects around the country, nearly all which would serve more than 50 people."

Regardless of the ridicule about the bridges as a pork-barrel binge, there are political facts that have kept hope alive for those who believe the projects are necessary for Alaska to grow economically.

To direct the federal financing to other projects, for example, would require action by Gov. Sarah Palin, a Republican, and the State Legislature. It would also mean undoing the work of the powerful Congressional delegation, led by Senator Ted Stevens and Representative Don Young, both Republicans, who secured the money for the bridges.

"No way in the world am I going to put myself in that position," said Mayor Joe Williams of Ketchikan Gateway Borough. "These guys were put through the wringer."

He added, referring to Mr. Young, "I may talk about it 10 years after he's dead and gone, but no way in the world am I going to do that now. I'm supporting that man because he supported us. That would be like going to Dad and talking about something Dad asked us to do and we didn't do it. That's not a good idea."

Mr. Williams said he believed the state overestimated the cost of the Gravina bridge because it would rather build other projects, including some closer to Juneau, the capital.

Mal Menzies, director for the southeast region of the state transportation department, noted that Ms. Palin had not included more money for Gravina in her proposed budget and that state planners were simply dealing in reality.

"I think the community is starting to see that the money for this project is not there," Mr. Menzies said. "They could be open to smaller bridges, but the problem is we don't even have the monies for the smaller bridges yet."

In Anchorage, some express a similar view about the Knik Arm Crossing.

"Originally it was a gift," said Jon R. Spring, a transportation planner with the Anchorage Traffic Department. "It was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity because we had these powerful congressmen. Well, that's no longer a rationale. Now it's a question of does it still make sense?"

The project has plenty of critics who worry it will add congestion to downtown Anchorage and encourage sprawl around Point MacKenzie, the largely empty area across the water to which the bridge would lead. Opponents also worry that the efforts to secure private financing will fail and that supporters will seek more government help, potentially undercutting financing for projects like a downtown highway link.

In Ketchikan, many people could not care less whether they get a new bridge. Yet the preliminary work planned for Gravina, part of an earlier earmark that was not removed, stirs hope for those who say they worry about the future in a region where people have been departing ever since the timber industry began to fade. In 2005, the borough population was 13,262, down from 14,070 in 2000.

"The bridge to nowhere is the bridge to the future for our kids," Mr. Williams said, "because it is developable property and it is available to the borough for families to buy property and build their own home."

But even without a bridge right away, the new roads on the island could help lure a large manufacturer or a residential developer, he said. "One day in the future," Mr. Williams said, "we'll have to have a bridge, to accommodate those folks."

Global Warming Labeled A 'Scam' (WT)

By Al Webb

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

LONDON -- With a packet of claims that are almost certain to defy conventional wisdom, a television documentary to be aired in Britain this week condemns man-made global warming as a myth that has become "the biggest scam of modern times."

The program titled "The Great Global Warming Scandal" and set for screening by TV Channel 4 on Thursday dismisses claims that high levels of greenhouse gases generated by human activity causes climate change. Instead, the program suggests that the sun itself is the real culprit.

The documentary, directed by filmmaker Martin Durkin, is at odds with scientific opinion as outlined in a United Nations report in February, which blames mankind for global warming.

In his program, Mr. Durkin rejects the concept of man-made climate change, calling it "a lie ... the biggest scam of modern times."

The truth, he says, is that global warming "is a multibillion-dollar worldwide industry, created by fanatically anti-industrial environmentalists, supported by scientists peddling scare stories to chase funding, and propped up by compliant politicians and the media."

Channel 4 says that the program features "an impressive roll-call of experts," including nine professors, who are experts in climatology, oceanography, meteorology, biogeography and paleoclimatology.

It also says the experts come from prestigious institutions such as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Pasteur Institute in Paris, the Danish National Space Center and universities and other schools in London, Ottawa, Jerusalem, Alabama, Virginia and Winnipeg, Canada.

"It's very rare that a film changes history," says Martin Durkin, "but I think this is a turning point, and in five years the idea that the greenhouse effect is the main reason behind global warming will be seen as total bunk," he says.

His program collides sharply with the premise outlined in former Vice President Al Gore's Oscar-winning documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," which presents a bleak picture of how a buildup in greenhouse gases such as carbon dioxide affects the global climate, with potentially disastrous consequences.

"Al Gore might have won an Oscar," says Mr. Durkin, in a preview of the documentary, "but the film is very misleading, and he has got the relationship between [carbon dioxide] and climate change the wrong way around."

One of the filmmaker's experts, paleontologist professor Ian Clark of the University of Ottawa, says that global warming could be caused by increased activity on the sun, such as massive eruptions, and that ice-core samples from Antarctica show that, in fact, warmer periods in Earth's history have come about 800 years before rises in carbon dioxide levels.

Mr. Clark's findings appear to contradict the work of other scientists, who have used similar ice-core samples to illustrate that raised levels of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere have accompanied the various global warming periods.

"The fact is that [carbon dioxide] has no proven link to global temperatures," says Mr. Durkin. "Solar activity is far more likely to be the culprit."

Scientists in the Channel 4 documentary cite what they claim is another discrepancy involving conventional research, saying that most of the recent global warming occurred before 1940, after which temperatures around the world fell for four decades.

Mr. Durkin's skeptical specialists view this as a flaw in the official view, because the worldwide economic boom that followed the end of World War II produced more carbon dioxide, and therefore should have meant a rise in global temperatures -- something he says did not happen.

"The Great Global Warming Swindle" also questions an assertion by the U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change's report, published last month, that it was backed by some 2,500 of the world's leading scientists.

Another of Mr. Durkin's professors, Paul Reiter of Paris' Pasteur Institute, an expert in malaria, calls the U.N. report a "sham" because, he says, it included the names of scientists -- including his own -- who disagreed with the report and who resigned from the panel.

"That is how they make it seem that all the top scientists are agreed," he says. "It's not true."

Mr. Reiter says his name was removed only after he threatened legal action against the panel. The report itself, he adds, was finalized by government appointees.

Yet another expert in the Durkin documentary, Philip Stott, professor emeritus of biogeography at the School of Oriental and African Studies in London, is more circumspect.

"The [climate] system is too complex to say exactly what the effect of cutting back on [carbon dioxide] production would be or, indeed, of continuing to produce [carbon dioxide]."

"The greenhouse effect theory worried me from the start," Mr. Stott says, "because you can't say that just one factor can have this effect."

"At the moment, there is almost a McCarthyism movement in science where the greenhouse effect is like a puritanical religion, and this is dangerous," he says.

Police: Major Heroin Ring Broken Up By Arrests. (AAS)

Austin American-Statesman, March 6, 2007

Fourteen People Face Federal Charges

Austin police say 14 members of a heroin-trafficking organization have been indicted after a nearly two-year investigation.

Police said in a written statement that in mid-2005, the department's Organized Crime Narcotic Conspiracy Unit began investigating three brothers — Henry Castro, 30, Rene Gaitan Castro, 35, and Randy Gaitan Castro, 24, for suspected heroin trafficking.

The Drug Enforcement Administration and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms later joined in the investigation, and Austin police said officers "made repeated seizures of heroin packaged within balloons for distribution, as well as seizures of 'black tar' heroin that had not been processed for distribution."

On Feb. 20, a federal grand jury indicted 14 members of the organization on a charge of conspiracy to distribute one kilogram or more of heroin, police said.

On Feb. 28, the three brothers were arrested along with five other people, police said. The other six people named in the indictments were already in custody, police said.

The investigation comes on the heels of another major heroin trafficking case, police said. In November, a federal judge sentenced 17 members of the so-called "Celedon" heroin trafficking organization. Fifteen received prison terms, while two received probation. Louis Celedon Jr., 31, received a 20-year prison sentence.

"These two long-term, time-intensive investigations provided information that the Castro and Celedon organizations were responsible for a significant amount of the heroin that is distributed within Austin and the surrounding areas," police said.

KVUE-TV, March 6, 2007

Fourteen people face charges of trying to sell heroin. Austin police say the group was an organized crime ring.

Some of the seized heroin was found in balloons.

DOJ_NMG_0140862

In late 2005, a drug operation based in Southeast Austin was shut down. Investigators say that success opened the door for the Castro brothers. At that time undercover agents were wrapping up a crackdown on the Celedon drug family. That is when, according to investigators, three young brothers decided to move in and take over what the Celedon family lost. The group, police say, was lead by Henry, Rene and Randy Castro.

"They may have been low level distributors, prior to the arrest of the first family, and when that first family got tagged, they just moved up and take over their territory." Said APD Commander Harold Piatt.

According to Piatt, who runs APD's Organized Crime Division, a local and federal operation was launched targeting the Castro family. As part of several undercover operations, officers obtained a large amount of heroin.

According to a federal indictment, the Castro drug business from Mexico to North Texas. According to Cmdr. Piatt. "They dealt in marijuana, heroin, cocaine, you pretty much name it, they were doing it."

According to investigators, the Castro operation did not last very long. Along with the brothers, 11, others were taken into custody.

Austin's Biggest Heroin Dealers Busted (KTCB)

KTCB-TV, March 5, 2007

AUSTIN -- Austin Police say the city's biggest heroin dealers are out of business and behind bars. The bust is a result of a long term joint operation with the federal government.

Police say 14 people were involved with selling and distributing black-tar heroin or heroin from Mexico. APD's Organized Crime Narcotic Conspiracy Unit started investigating 30-year-old Henry Castro and his two brothers for heroin trafficking activities back in 2005.

The Drug Enforcement Administration and the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, and Firearms were also part of the investigation. As a result, a federal grand jury indicted James Lara and 13 other members of the Castro organization last month. Police say the Castro members came into power after another lengthy joint operation busted

the Celedon Group for heroin trafficking last year.

"Once we knock down a major supplier, then somebody else pops up into the picture and just picks up where they left off. They already got a ready made base of clientele," said Cmdr. Harold Piatt with APD's Organized Crime Unit.

11 Are Arraigned In Albany In Widening Investigation Of Illegal Sales Of Steroids (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore And Serge F. Kovaleski

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

ALBANY, March 5 — Eleven people accused of playing a role in a nationwide illegal prescription drug ring were arraigned here on Monday, part of what prosecutors said was a broadening investigation into the recreational use of steroids and human growth hormone.

Four of the 11 were owners or executives of Signature Pharmacy of Orlando, Fla., who were arrested in a raid last Tuesday. P. David Soares, the Albany County district attorney, described them as the "drug dealers" of the network and said it is now believed that Signature earned more than $40 million selling prescription drugs over the Internet.

The other suspects worked at three Florida companies that Mr. Soares said served as distributors, connecting Signature with customers in Albany County and across the country, and were arrested in recent days.

All 11 suspects have pleaded not guilty.

"We were able to take down one of the country's largest pharmaceutical, steroid and human growth hormone distribution centers," Mr. Soares said on at a news conference on Monday.

Mr. Soares named two other men as unindicted co-conspirators in the case. One of them, Victor Martinez, 33, won the Arnold Classic bodybuilding competition on Saturday. His prizes included a check for $130,000 and a $20,000 Audemars Piguet watch. Mr. Soares said he was linked to the Anti-Aging Centers, a clinic in Nanuet, N.Y., an alleged distributor for Signature's drugs.

"We are now living in a very competitive environment when you're talking about the world of sports — a competitive environment that is fostered by incredible economic reward," Mr. Soares said. "This is what is fueling this industry."

He added, "If you see Victor Martinez, please let him know that the Albany County district attorney would like to talk to him."

Reached Monday night by telephone, Mr. Martinez said that he had bought testosterone from the Anti-Aging Centers after the clinic told him he had low testosterone levels, and that the company had later tried to "to lure me into becoming a partner."

DOJ_NMG_0140863

“Nothing was ever signed; nothing was ever agreed upon," said Mr. Martinez, who said he had already met with investigators. “I didn’t trust them, and other people were warning me not to do business with them.”

Mr. Soares confirmed that professional athletes were among the drug ring’s customers and that he had agreed to meet with representatives from Major League Baseball and the National Football League.

According to a law enforcement official familiar with the investigation, two people affiliated with Anti-Aging Centers are expected to surrender to the authorities on Tuesday.

Meanwhile, two of the principals of Applied Pharmacy Services Inc. in Mobile, Ala., were in Albany late last week to make themselves available to investigators. Law enforcement officials have said that the two men had been named in sealed indictments handed up by an Albany County grand jury.

But according to a person familiar with the situation, Mr. Soares’s office told a lawyer for the two company officers last week that it would contact them when it was prepared to do so.

Michael L. Koenig, an Albany lawyer representing the men, would say only, “My clients are fully prepared to voluntarily turn themselves in if and when they are asked to do so.”

Mr. Soares said that the investigation had unearthed dozens of other potential suspects, but whether they would be prosecuted “will depend entirely on those people and their desire to come forward and assist the people in eradicating this problem from our state and from the rest of the United States.”

Eleven Plead Not Guilty In Online Steroids Ring (AP)

AP, March 6, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. — Eleven people connected to a Florida pharmacy at the center of a nationwide investigation into the illegal sale of steroids pleaded not guilty Monday, a growing case that has linked the online drug network to doctors and health care centers in at least three states.

Robert Stanley Loomis and wife Naomi, the owners of Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, were arrested last Tuesday during a raid in which police confiscated truck loads of drugs and other evidence. Both are registered pharmacists in Florida. Robert Loomis' brother, pharmacist Kenneth Michael Loomis, and Kirk Calvert, Signature's marketing director, also were charged.

The four are charged with 20 counts each of criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud.

Each posted bail of $30,000. All four shuffled into court, dressed in jail jumpsuits, handcuffed and shackled.

"We hope to have them home as soon as we can so they can be with their kids," said Dawn Tingley, the Florida lawyer representing the Loomises and Calvert.

Claire Denise Godfrey, a doctor at an anti-aging clinic in Orlando, pleaded not guilty to 10 counts related to the criminal sale of a controlled substance. She posted $20,000 bail.

Godfrey's name was mentioned in an indictment filed two weeks ago in a federal case charging the owner of a New Jersey pharmaceutical company with health care fraud, conspiracy and illegal drug distribution. The documents say Godfrey received a $2,350 payment in August from the pharmacy owner.

Godfrey declined comment Monday.

Later Monday, Gary Brandwein of Boca Raton, Fla., a 44-year-old osteopath and principal in the Florida company MedXLife was arraigned on six counts related to the criminal sale of a controlled substance. He pleaded not guilty and posted $10,000 bail.

Brandwein's lawyer, Terence Kindlon, acknowledged the doctor had a business relationship with Signature.

"He's always been a very dedicated and self-sacrificing healer," Kindlon said.

MedXLife owner Gregory Trotta and an employee, Brian Schafler, later pleaded innocent to six counts related to criminal sale of a controlled substance and were released after posting $10,000 bond.

After Brandwein was arraigned, Palm Beach Rejuvenation co-owner Glen Stephanos and his brother, George Stephanos, both of Palm Beach, Fla., entered innocent pleas to a seven-count indictment charging them with illegally selling steroids and hormones. A doctor employed by the company, Dr. Robert Carlson of Sarasota, Fla., also was arraigned and pleaded not guilty. All three men posted $1,000 bail.

Carlson's lawyer, Charles Holloman, said he first saw the indictment Monday.

"We're not at war with the district attorney's office," Holloman said. "We're trying to understand what happened ... and trying to restore my client's good name."

Prosecutors allege the Loomises sold steroids and hormones through "their affiliate" MedXLife and through their "criminal associate" Palm Beach Rejuvenation.

DOJ_NMG_0140864

Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares, who ran the investigation, said Signature filled prescriptions, in some cases from unlicensed doctors, knowing they had not examined patients. His office said at least $250,000 in illegal and controlled substances were sold directly into Albany County, and New York State sales exceeded $10 million.

People in three states have been arrested so far and as many as 24 could face felony charges.

Soares has said his focus is on shutting down drug distributors and physicians writing illicit prescriptions instead of buyers.

Major league baseball players Gary Matthews Jr. and Jerry Hairston Jr., former slugger Jose Canseco and former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield reportedly were on a customer list at Applied Pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., one of the two pharmacies raided.

The NFL is looking into reports that a Pittsburgh Steelers doctor, Richard Rydze, was on the customer list of Signature Pharmacy in Florida, whose owners have been indicted by a grand jury in Albany. Records showed Rydze used his personal credit card to buy about $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone.

B'KLYN KINGPIN'S REIGN OF CARNAGE (NYPOST)

The New York Post, March 5, 2007

John "Bloody Hatchet" Hatcher, the brother of a minister, has admitted to involvement in more than 80 shootings - including 30 homicides - while operating a notorious gang that made tens of millions of dollars selling crack, cocaine and marijuana.

During a two-decade reign of terror, Hatcher and his gang, The Rugby Boys, littered the streets in the heart of Brooklyn with victims and bodies, authorities said.

"He was the crack epidemic," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York Office, comparing him to murderers Lorenzo "Fat Cat" Nichols and Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff and infamous Harlem druglord Nicky Barnes.

But unlike the others' brief reigns as crack and heroin kingpins, Hatcher's ring flourished like no other, before the DEA finally mounted a six-year operation buying $10 bags of crack that snared him.

Rather than face a possible death-sentence prosecution, Hatcher, 43, spilled his guts.

Veteran federal agents and hardened homicide detectives were left slack-jawed with disbelief as Hatcher methodically detailed a litany of murder and mayhem that took him an astonishing four months to tell.

"There were times when we actually had to stop him and say, 'That's enough for today,' " DEA Special Agent John Profetti said, recalling a particularly grim session when Hatcher described an assault in which one of his henchmen was stabbed, shot, choked, set on fire and then doused with a pail of urine.

The victim survived, after pretending he was dead, and gave an interview to detectives and Star Jones, the former co-host of ABC's "The View" who was then a Brooklyn assistant district attorney.

When the man was released from the hospital, Hatcher paid two hit men $5,000 to finish him off.

Hatcher's brutality and sophisticated criminality belied his upbringing by loving parents who owned a record store in Canarsie and raised three other children, including a minister and a U.S. Naval Academy officer.

But by age 12, Hatcher was showing his propensity for crime, running with a crowd that committed robberies and burglaries and were tied to fearsome Jamaican drug dealers.

His fledgling talents were noticed by a local "Fagin-like" hood, who recruited him.

"It was like Oliver Twist with a gun," said Daniel Anderson, DEA associate special agent in charge in New York.

Added Profetti, "He was a natural, starting with pick-pocketing and escalating into robberies and burglaries."

By the end of high school, Hatcher was forming a gang of his own. He recruited kids, dubbed Rugby Boys, who played football and basketball when they were not selling drugs. One fearsome teen, Tyrone Hunter, was made Hatcher's deputy.

Coupling a businessman's acumen with an iron fist, Hatcher established control over several key crack dens in Bedford-Stuyvesant and East New York and skillfully built an empire with scores of workers in the heart of the city's most populated borough.

If a rival tried to poach his territory, someone would be pay. "He shot people just to make a point, leaving them wounded in the stomach and legs," Profetti said.

Hatcher lived large. He had a spacious apartment in Park Slope, hoards of women, "Superfly" clothes and flashy luxury cars and treated himself and his crew to lavish Caribbean trips.

But in 1991, he was with a couple of his henchmen and mistook undercover cops for rival dealers. One of his crew opened fire, grazing an officer.

Hatcher was the only one caught. He did not rat and spent eight years in prison.

When he was released, he quickly reclaimed his throne.

DOJ_NMG_0140865

But two seemingly unrelated criminal matters - a murder in East New York and a credit-card scam in Alabama - ultimately toppled his empire.

On Jan. 27, 2000, a city bus driver made the mistake of being a go-between in a Colombian heroin deal with Hatcher, who shot and killed him and stole his drugs.

Rugby Boy Charles Thomas was identified as a suspect.

Seven months later, in Alabama, Thomas' nickname, "Boo," and his Brooklyn phone number showed up on a piece of paper linked to a ring ordering hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of merchandise from Home Depot.

The DEA joined U.S. Postal Inspector James Buthorn and NYPD detectives in early 2001 and starting with $10-bag buys, launched their probe that snared a "weak-link" lieutenant in Hatcher's operation. Fearing "Bloody Hatchet," the lieutenant cooperated, and Hatcher finally was scooped up in a massive roundup May 13, 2002.

Hatcher started spilling the beans, saying, "I am not going to do any one else's time. They will do their own," referring to his eight-year stint in prison over the cop-wounding case.

With a treasure-trove of cases to cherry-pick from involving Hatcher - some which had already been attributed to others by the NYPD - Assistant Brooklyn U.S. Attorneys Christina Dugger and Scott Morvillo and the federal agents zeroed in on five killings.

"It took six years to peel back layer after layer to unveil these horrific crimes," Gilbride said.

Investigators dug up old witnesses and other evidence they used during a three-week trial that ended last month with the racketeering and murder conviction of the final bosses of Hatcher's gang: Hunter and Adrian Payne.

Hatcher, who testified for two days, is being held in federal prison and, along with Hunter and Payne, is awaiting sentencing in May. He is expected to receive what amounts to a life sentence.

U.N.: Afghan Poppy Cultivation Could Rise (AP)

AP, March 6, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — Afghanistan's 2007 opium poppy cultivation could expand again after last year's record crop, the U.N. drug agency said Monday, underlining the weakness of an internationally backed drive against the country's booming narcotics trade.

The Office on Drugs and Crime predicted an increase in a string of provinces, including southern Helmand — Afghanistan's largest poppy-growing region and an area wracked by a growing number of Taliban attacks.

The office said in a report that a recent U.N. survey found increasing evidence that the drug trade flourished in regions with poor security.

"This winter survey suggests that opium cultivation in Afghanistan in 2007 may not be lower than the record harvest," last year, UNODC Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa wrote in the report's preface.

Last year, opium cultivation rose an alarming 59%, deepening fears that Afghanistan is rapidly becoming a narco-state. Officials say Taliban militants protect southern farmers and tap drug profits to fuel their insurgency.

The U.N. said poppy cultivation occurred in 100% of villages it visited in Helmand province; 93% of villages were growing opium poppies in neighboring Kandahar, the Taliban's former stronghold. The U.N. report did not detail how many villages were visited.

It also predicted a sharp increase in cultivation in Nangarhar — touted in recent years as an example of the success of efforts to persuade farmers to grow licit crops — as well as in Kunar and Uruzgan provinces.

On the other hand, the U.N. saw a decrease in cultivation in seven mostly northern provinces, and said there was an indication of a split in attitudes between the north and south.

"There is evidence that Afghanistan's opium economy is becoming segmented, with farmers' attitudes, supply conditions and price trends moving in opposite directions in the north and the south," Maria Costa said.

President Hamid Karzai has vowed to rid Afghanistan of opium. International donors are directing hundreds of millions of dollars in development aid to rural areas to make it profitable for farmers to grow wheat, or plant orchards. Eradication teams are supposed to destroy opium in the fields before harvest.

However, critics say corrupt Afghan authorities and security forces are themselves heavily involved in the trade and are unlikely to mount a serious crackdown, while Karzai is wary of a rural backlash against his already weak government.

The U.N. report also found what it called a "new and disturbing trend" in Afghanistan's drug business — an increase in marijuana cultivation.

"The last thing we need is for Afghanistan to switch from one drug to another or — worse — to become a world leader in cannabis as well as opium production," Maria Costa said.

Afghan drug production already accounts for more than 90% of global supply of opium, the raw material for heroin.

UN Fears Afghan Opium 'explosion' (BBC)

BBC News, March 6, 2007

Poppy production was up 25% in 2006, the US has said The United Nations says it fears that Afghanistan may grow even more poppies in 2007 - at a time when current levels are already running at record output.

Poppy production rose 25% in 2006, according to the US State Department.

The UN says although production of poppies, used to make heroin, has fallen in the north and centre, a sharp rise is likely in the lawless south.

It also cites a dramatic increase in cannabis growing, which it describes as a new and disturbing trend.

In a report published on Monday, the UN office on drugs and crime said it was clear that the increased production in the south was a security issue.

'Cancer of insurgency'

Many southern regions have no government presence, while opium farmers were protected by the Taleban which uses drugs money to fund its insurgency, it said.

"It is clear that the insurgents are deriving an income, which they use to pay salaries for their foot soldiers (and) to buy weapons," said Antonio Maria Costa, the UN department's executive director.

"All of this has created quite a cancer of insurgency and illicit drug cultivation that has to be cut through in the years to come," he said.

He said the eradication effort needed to be increased to be effective. Last year, about 10% of the crop was eradicated, but Mr Costa said the figure should rise to 30%.

Four years after the US and its British allies began combating poppy production, Afghanistan still accounts for 90% of the world's opium trade.

IMMIGRATION:

Despite Push, Immigration Deal Not On Horizon (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, March 6, 2007

With Republicans looking to regain control of the Senate and Democrats hoping to pad their majority in 2008, neither party appears inclined to make the political sacrifices necessary to pass a broad immigration bill this year and may be content to simply duel to a rhetorical draw this summer, lawmakers and strategists in both parties said.

Leaders from both parties, Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) have all vowed to pass reform legislation this year, and Kennedy has been meeting with the White House and presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in recent weeks to work out a new compromise bill.

But despite these efforts, it still appears unlikely that comprehensive reforms will move out of the chamber before electoral concerns kill the bill.

In fact, GOP and Democratic aides contend that both parties may be best served by a political impasse over the issue, since such a scenario would allow Members to show they are standing firm on the hot-button issue while avoiding compromises that may upset base voters.

“Really, a filibuster is a win for us,” one Democratic aide said, arguing that it would fit into the broader message to voters that Republicans are blockading reforms.

Similarly, a GOP aide argued that “blocking a bill is good for us” since Republican incumbents would be able to avoid facing the ire of single-issue conservative base voters come Election Day.

Despite massive protests across the nation and the rise of conservative vigilante groups along the Mexican border, Congress was unable to pass broad immigration legislation last year, in large part because of deep divisions within the Republican Party over the scope of the reforms.

While President Bush and some rank-and-file Republicans sided with most Democrats and backed a broad reform bill that included allowances for some illegal immigrants to remain in the United States, the bulk of the GOP opposed such a broad measure. Instead, most Republicans in the House and Senate favored a much narrower approach that focused on border-control measures, more aggressive enforcement of current immigration laws and a new system for ensuring employers do not hire undocumented workers.

Those differences apparently have widened since the elections. Although the Senate successfully passed a comprehensive immigration bill last year with the backing of a number of Republicans, it is unlikely such a bill will garner as much support from the GOP this year. A number of lawmakers — including Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) — voted for last year's bill because they knew the GOP-controlled House would act as a last barrier against enactment of any form of amnesty for illegal workers.

But with Leahy and Kennedy both backing provisions that are significantly more pro-immigration than those that were included in last year's bill, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and the White House may find it difficult to muster as much support in the Senate now that the backstop of a GOP-controlled House no longer exists.

"Anything with even a hint of amnesty" will have to face stiff opposition, one Republican Senator said, adding that "the gulf is just so wide" between Republicans in Congress and the White House that Bush may find little traction in the chamber.

Indeed, a number of lawmakers already are chafing at the fact that the White House, Kennedy and McCain have been holding closed-door meetings on a bill.

GOP Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and Arlen Specter (Pa.) — the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and a supporter of the comprehensive plan last year — complained last week that they had been frozen out of the process of drafting this year's bill.

As a result, Brownback said he would team up with other Republicans, including Specter and Sens. Mel Martinez (Fla.) and Jon Kyl (Ariz.), to work on the issue and perhaps introduce their own bill.

Last year, Kyl led a team of Senators that opposed the comprehensive bill supported by Specter, Brownback and Martinez.

Brownback explained the strategy of partnering with Kyl, saying in an interview, "If we can get a bill that all of us can agree to and hold 40 votes together, then we can have a real debate on the issue. Like last year, you still need 60 votes." Sixty votes would be needed overcome a filibuster.

Democrats, meanwhile, face their own political difficulties. Given Reid's narrow majority in the Senate, Democrats will find it all but impossible to pass a bill that goes as far as many in the party's left wing will want. Additionally, one Democratic leadership aide pointed out that passing a wide-ranging reform package over the protests of Republicans could end up motivating the GOP's base to turn out in next year's election, making it difficult for Democrats to widen Reid's margin of control in the 111th Congress.

This aide also pointed out that many Democrats elected to the House in 2006 ran, in part, to the right of Republican incumbents on the immigration issue and that passing comprehensive reforms that allow millions of illegal immigrants to remain in the U.S. could make their re-election much more difficult.

An added pressure facing both parties will be the timing of any immigration fight. Like Social Security reform, immigration has become something of a "third-rail" political issue, making it all but impossible for Congress to address it during an election year.

Although supporters have indicated they would like to take up the issue this spring — possibly as soon as the week after the annual Easter recess — leadership aides in both parties predict that the debate won't begin until August at the earliest. That timeline would butt the debate up against the annual appropriations fight, meaning Congress will have a very narrow window in which to pass bills in both chambers, conference the legislation and get it to Bush before it becomes politically unviable.

Nevertheless, Kennedy, who is spearheading efforts to pass immigration reform this year, is pressing ahead. Kennedy is using this week to publicize his efforts, holding a series of public events with the Irish Lobby for Immigration Reform, religious leaders and other immigration reform advocates.

According to Kennedy's office, this year's version of the legislation will contain the main elements of last year's Senate legislation. "The basic concepts are intact," said Laura Capps, a Kennedy spokeswoman.

Those elements, she said, include a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants in the U.S. who meet several requirements, including working in the country for several years, paying a penalty, paying back taxes, and learning English and civics. They also would have to "get at the back of the line" behind immigrants already seeking citizenship, she added.

The bill also will call for enhanced border security, tighter requirements for employers to verify worker eligibility and a system to allow workers to enter legally into the U.S. to satisfy labor needs.

Chamber Takes On Law Aimed At Illegal Workers (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Chamber of Commerce Monday threw its considerable weight behind efforts to eliminate a groundbreaking Hazleton, Pa., law penalizing businesses that hire illegal workers and landlords who rent to them.

The Hazleton ordinance, which also makes English the official language of the small town, has not been implemented because a federal judge issued an order preventing it from going into effect. The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) has filed a lawsuit challenging it on behalf of a group local residents. A trial is set for next week.

DOJ_NMG_0140868

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce filed a legal document Monday in U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania backing the ACLU position and calling the law unconstitutional on two grounds.

First, the Chamber says, the Hazleton ordinance is pre-empted by federal law. Second, it says the law violates due process protections because it doesn't give a business accused of hiring an illegal worker the right to challenge an allegation before losing its right to operate.

"We need to bring some stability into the system until we come up with a federal answer," says Angelo Amador, Chamber director of immigration policy.

"If not, we're going to end up with 50 state laws and a thousand local ordinances," Amador adds. "A lot of people are copying what we think is a bad law."

Hazleton Mayor Louis Barletta, a former small-business owner, says he never expected to be on the opposite side from the Chamber.

"There's nowhere in our ordinance that we regulate immigration. We punish businesses that hire illegal workers," Barletta says. "I would rather stand on the side of the American workers than (with) businesses that break the law."

Hazleton has been raising money for its legal bills in part by seeking donations on a special website.

As immigration legislation has languished in Congress, dozens of states have passed measures aimed at an estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants. Barletta says more than 100 localities are considering imitating Hazleton's law.

The Hazleton ordinance lets individuals lodge complaints if they suspect a business has an illegal worker. Firms that can't verify an employee's status have three days to fix the situation. If they don't, the city can suspend the operating license. Workers who lose jobs at a business that had illegal immigrants on the payroll, under certain circumstances, can seek damages.

The Chamber argues that, unlike federal law, the Hazleton plan makes employers liable for penalties without proof they intentionally hired an illegal immigrant.

Mexico's Own Migra (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WHEN HOUSE Republicans last year sought to make the mere presence of illegal immigrants in the United States a felony punishable by one year in prison, the odious legislation sparked international condemnation. No country was more loudly indignant than Mexico. Then-President Vicente Fox called the legislation "shameful" and its targets "heroes" who make a crucial contribution to the U.S. economy.

Yet Mexico is hardly in a position to criticize. Since 1974, foreign immigrants in Mexico illegally have been subject to prison sentences of two years, plus a fine. Immigrants who are caught reentering Mexico after deportation face 10-year prison sentences, compared to two years here.

That is, until now. Mexican President Felipe Calderon has decided to tackle immigration reform of his own, and he is seeking the repeal of Article 123 of the General Population Law, which makes illegal immigrants the Mexican equivalent of felons.

The vast majority of the 185,000 illegal immigrants caught, detained and deported by Mexican officials each year come from Guatemala and Honduras, and many of them are in transit toward the Rio Grande. Human rights advocates have documented a lengthy list of abuses faced by these migrants — threats, extortion and even violence — stemming in part from their status as felons. In addition to amending Mexico's draconian and hypocritical law, Calderon's government is vowing to improve living conditions and medical services at the 48 detention centers where illegal immigrants are held pending deportation. Proposed upgrades include the addition of hot water and telephone service.

In a recent report, Mexico's National Commission on Human Rights accused immigration agents of numerous violations, citing one instance in which 78 migrants were crammed into four cells, each designed to hold only five people, and denied food and water for more than 24 hours.

These reforms would certainly improve the plight of detained migrants and also Mexico's relationship with its southern neighbors, as well as giving Mexico more moral standing to agitate against laws affecting its citizens in the United States. Those in this country who oppose guest-worker programs and a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants often cite Mexico's own harsher policies as the ones we should adopt, or at least complain about first.

Mexico can declaw that argument by closing the gap between its advocacy for Mexican nationals in the United States and how it treats illegal immigrants within its borders. Mexico is under pressure from the U.S. to block the flow of migrants heading north, and recent crackdowns, in part, have been to that end. Ensuring the human rights of its migrant population, however, is not only the right thing to do, it's good politics.

TAX:

HOUSE OF 'CARDS' Fling With Tax Shelters Haunts Silicon Valley (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

John Doerr is the dean of Silicon Valley venture capitalists, one who helped launch tech icons like Google and Sun Microsystems. A billionaire, he works with rock star Bono to fight poverty in Africa and with others to increase aid for education and medical research.

Mr. Doerr is less well known for one investment that didn't pan out. Called myCFO Inc., the firm set out to provide rich people a full menu of financial services, from wealth management to estate planning. It succeeded with only one: tax shelters that helped clients shield hundreds of millions of dollars from taxes. Less than two years after myCFO began selling them in 2000, the Internal Revenue Service said they were bogus.

MORE ON MYCFO

IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS

· Deposition of Kevin McAuliffe2, a former top accountant at myCFO, in which he testifies that he warned his bosses that myCFO was becoming too heavily involved in selling tax shelters. Plus, see emails3 shown as exhibits in the deposition.

· Emails from myCFO board member John Doerr4 to Frank DiFerdinando, the head of myCFO's tax-strategies group. Mr. Doerr was a leading proponent of the group.

· An admission of facts5 by one of the large banks that underwrote myCFO's main tax shelter. In it, the bank admits the deal's purported 30-year loan was a sham and only meant to help clients avoid taxes.

· A document myCFO prepared6 for an informal phone discussion after the IRS cracked down on one of its tax shelters in March 2002.

MyCFO ceased independent operations five years ago, but it still casts a shadow. A bank that underwrote some of its tax deals has admitted that they were shams. Former clients, hit with back-tax bills, are fighting the IRS. Two ex-clients have alleged that myCFO's tax deals were fraudulent.

Two lawyers who worked with myCFO are under tax-fraud indictment for their work on similar tax shelters. The Manhattan U.S. attorney's office, which has charged more than a dozen people in connection with tax shelters, said in a court filing last April that it had "an ongoing criminal investigation" involving "various former employees of myCFO."

The financial backers and board members of myCFO were Silicon Valley royalty. They included James H. Clark, co-founder of Netscape Communications and Silicon Graphics; John Chambers of Cisco Systems Inc.; Thomas Jermoluk, former chairman of Excite@Home; and former Netscape boss James Barksdale. The firm's outside legal counsel was Larry Sonsini, lawyer to Silicon Valley's stars.

The firm was Mr. Clark's idea. Mr. Doerr led its financing and took a leading role on the board. In typical Silicon Valley fashion, board members were closely involved with strategy and operations, according to company documents and legal papers reviewed by The Wall Street Journal. The documents show that directors pushed ahead with the tax-shelter business despite signs that all wasn't right with the product.

Mr. Doerr praised the head of the firm's tax-strategies group in a 2001 email for "not only delivering on your original [business] plan, but going beyond to make up the revenue shortfall from the recurring business." MyCFO "has my full support, and the full support of [my] partners" at Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, the venture-capital firm that financed myCFO, he added.

MyCFO's story shows how the sudden wealth spawned by the technology boom had hidden impacts that still echo in Silicon Valley. "There were 30-year-old clients making hundreds of millions of dollars -- it was intoxicating," says James Phillips, myCFO's former chief investment officer. "The accountants and CPAs wanted their share, too."

SILICON VOLLEY

· The Background: Prominent tech financiers set up myCFO in 1999 to provide financial services to the rich.

· What Went Wrong: Firm morphed into a purveyor of tax shelters, which the IRS in 2002 labeled invalid.

· The Hangover: A bank that worked on myCFO shelters admits they were a sham; prosecutor has said ex-myCFO employees are party to criminal probe.

DOJ_NMG_0140870

At the time, tax shelters were a lively business. Dozens of national law and accounting firms sold these strategies -- Byzantine transactions that often involved foreign currencies and offshore middlemen. MyCFO selected a few tax shelters and refined them for a clientele dripping in capital gains.

Some of California's leading industrialists were customers. Ray Irani, chief executive of Occidental Petroleum Corp., did a tax deal through myCFO, company records show. So did Ariba Inc. co-founder Boris Putanec and Val Vaden, co-founder of financier Benchmark Capital.

Mr. Jermoluk, the former Excite@Home chairman, was both a founding financier of myCFO and a shelter customer. For fees of about $2.4 million, he acquired ostensible losses to offset as much as $50 million of taxable income, according to company documents and a deposition by his former accountant, Kevin McAuliffe.

Mr. Jermoluk declined to be interviewed about myCFO, as did Messrs. Doerr and Chambers. Messrs. Clark and Barksdale didn't respond to email and phone requests for interviews. A lawyer for the former directors told a tax client last October that they "categorically denied...misconduct or malfeasance of any sort." The lawyer, David York, predicted myCFO's main tax package ultimately "will survive a substantive tax law analysis" in court.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Sonsini said his law firm did basic legal work for myCFO that didn't include reviewing its tax offerings. Messrs. Vaden and Putanec declined to comment, while Occidental said Dr. Irani wouldn't comment "on what is clearly a personal matter."

MyCFO's main tax shelter, sold to 17 clients, was called Cards, for Custom Adjustable Rate Debt Structure. Each involved an ostensible 30-year bank loan to a foreign party for $50 million to $100 million. MyCFO's client then assumed the loan and, after some complex swapping of collateral, claimed a loss for tax purposes of nearly the full amount of the loan. Others besides myCFO also marketed Cards.

The IRS in March 2002 ruled Cards invalid. Largely as a result, myCFO sold its name and client list and liquidated its tax business.

The IRS said Cards failed a basic test of legitimacy: It lacked any real economic purpose other than to lower taxes. The agency added that clients were never really at risk for the supposed $50 million or more in loans.

Most myCFO shelter clients are challenging the IRS's action, in federal court in San Jose. But two broke ranks and alleged the shelters were fraudulent, in civil racketeering suits they filed against big banks that underwrote their Cards deals. They claim they were misled to believe the shelter's loan structure was actually a viable credit facility. (See adjoining article7.)

From the start, there were internal warnings. Mr. McAuliffe, a former Ernst & Young tax partner who was one of myCFO's first hires, said that when the firm was just gearing up in 1999, some of its accountants wanted to shun tax "elimination" deals. He warned Mr. Jermoluk and Chief Executive Art Shaw that myCFO was relying too heavily on tax shelters for revenue, Mr. McAuliffe said in a 2005 deposition for a tax client's lawsuit in San Francisco Superior Court. But he said the founders were talking about an initial public offering, and his warnings went unheeded amid IPO "fever." Mr. Shaw, CEO of advertising firm Netblue Inc., didn't return calls seeking comment.

MyCFO had obtained the Cards strategy from a San Francisco investment boutique called Chenery Associates, which also provided it to others. Chenery had done a Cards deal for an aircraft-leasing company, which registered it with the IRS as a tax shelter. The IRS requires corporations to register such tax-driven deals. Its rules for when individuals must register a deal they're using as a shelter are less strict.

MyCFO officials said their clients would never accept a transaction they had to register as a tax shelter, Chenery Associates owner Roy Hahn later testified in a deposition for San Francisco Superior Court. A lawyer for Chenery removed the obstacle. He wrote an analysis saying that Cards wasn't a tax shelter under relevant IRS rules.

· An early, confidential myCFO business plan15

The lawyer, Graham Taylor, then at LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae, wore multiple hats. He also represented myCFO in refining the tax strategy, court documents show. And when myCFO signed up Cards clients, it arranged for them to hire Mr. Taylor as their lawyer. For fees of roughly $85,000 per client, he supplied many of them with letters saying that if the IRS found their deductions invalid, they shouldn't owe penalties because they had relied on "an opinion from reputable counsel."

That counsel, it turned out, was a co-inventor of Cards, Raymond J. Ruble, then at law firm Brown & Wood. The law firm got $250,000 each time a client used Cards. Chenery paid this out of its share of the tax client's fee.

Chenery also agreed to pay 20% of its own fee into a Ruble family trust, according to court records and Mr. Hahn's testimony.

MyCFO directors had several briefings about tax shelters, minutes of board meetings show. One in mid-2000 led to a marketing delay while the firm's general counsel reviewed the matter. Three months later, the IRS, in connection with a similar shelter, warned that "an artificial loss lacking economic substance is not allowable." Within weeks, myCFO decided to go ahead with marketing Cards.

It quickly signed up 10 clients for fees totaling $16 million. As those deals were closing in late 2000, Mr. Ruble from Brown & Wood emailed myCFO an article in which a prominent tax analyst called Cards a blatant tax dodge. Mr. Ruble said the analyst had "totally missed the boat on business purpose," which he said lay in financing opportunities.

As the tech bubble deflated, myCFO imposed layoffs and spending cuts, but not on the tax-strategies group. MyCFO's growing reliance on tax shelters for revenue was discussed at a board meeting in August 2001. At that meeting, the board's compensation committee, Messrs. Doerr and Clark, approved stock options for 94 employees -- giving a third of them to the firm's top two tax strategists.

One director asked if myCFO would have an obligation to refund clients' fees if the tax deals were unwound. "It was basically, 'Gosh, is this kosher?' " says someone who was there. "Then they read the attorneys' comfort letters and everyone shut up."

Mr. Doerr was a booster for the firm's tax strategists. In response to Mr. Doerr's 2001 email lauding the tax team for its performance -- which he sent on Sept. 11, 31 minutes before the first plane struck the World Trade Center -- the tax team's leader reported landing $4.5 million more in fees. Five days after 9/11, Mr. Doerr replied: "This is AWESOME news, particularly during a week marred by national tragedy.... Please keep me posted."

But some of myCFO's accountants and client-service people were in revolt, according to Mr. McAuliffe's deposition. In late 2001, he and several colleagues refused to sign shelter clients' tax returns until myCFO agreed to indemnify them for any personal liability. One client was claiming a tax loss greater than his net worth. "It was only a matter of time until the IRS came down pretty hard," Mr. McAuliffe testified.

In January 2002, the IRS offered a broad tax-shelter amnesty: It would waive penalties for any taxpayer who owned up to using a questionable shelter.

MyCFO staffers disagreed over what to tell clients about this and whether to discourage them from taking the amnesty. Ultimately, the firm sent out what General Counsel Steve Debenham, in an email about a draft to a colleague, called "a CYA letter," for "cover your a -- ." It said the IRS appeared to be focusing on the packages offered by major accounting firms, which "may be less credibly supported by a substantive economic justification...."

Mr. McAuliffe mocked that distinction in an email to colleagues. "Same law firms, similar or same promoters, same tax effect," he said, wondering if myCFO was "smoking our own dope again?"

He also dismissed the idea that myCFO's clients were penalty-proof for relying on reputable counsel. "You bought your opinion. You bought your comfort-level letter," he said later in his deposition. Mr. Debenham and Mr. McAuliffe both declined to be interviewed.

Two months later, the IRS ruled that Cards was an improper shelter. MyCFO's board discussed the ruling by phone. MyCFO by this time was little more than a tax-shelter brokerage, according to documents prepared for the meeting. If it closed its shelter business, it would forgo $10 million in revenue in the next three months and be in the red.

Instead of closing the tax business, myCFO tried to revive it by hiring a veteran of KPMG, an accounting firm that was especially active in selling tax shelters. The employee, Randall Bickham, brought a pipeline of tax deals worth a projected $7 million in fees.

The board also explored selling the company. MyCFO documents show Deutsche Bank AG, which had worked with myCFO on several Cards deals, expressed interest in acquiring the firm for $200 million to $300 million, but backed away, citing potential tax-shelter liability. Bank of Montreal agreed to buy myCFO for $90 million but it, too, backed out over the same concern, myCFO documents show. In October 2002 Bank of Montreal finally purchased just myCFO's name, client list and some other assets. It paid $30 million, about a third of the sums the Kleiner Perkins founders and others had put in. Bank of Montreal now has a private-banking unit called Harris myCFO Inc., which declined to comment.

Directors assigned the rest of myCFO to a liquidator. They gave Mr. Bickham, the former KPMG man, a $1.4 million contract, paid in advance, to maintain files and assist clients in "controversy issues" with the IRS.

In 2005, Mr. Bickham was among those charged by the Manhattan U.S. attorney with tax evasion and conspiracy to defraud the IRS. The charges relate to work he did while at KPMG. He has pleaded not guilty and declined to comment.

Also charged was Mr. Ruble, the Cards co-inventor. He was cited for tax-shelter work he did for others, mostly KPMG. Mr. Ruble's law firm had fired him, after discovering the deal he had with Chenery to funnel 20% of Chenery's fees into a Ruble family trust.

By that time, Mr. Ruble was at Sidley Austin, which had absorbed Brown & Wood. Sidley Austin and KPMG both faced civil litigation over tax shelters, which they settled last year for $179 million, including legal fees.

Mr. Taylor -- the lawyer who helped myCFO refine the shelters and assisted its shelter clients -- was indicted in a tax-shelter matter in Utah. Both he and Mr. Ruble have pleaded not guilty, and both declined to comment.

Federal prosecutors also investigated a German bank that helped arrange some of myCFO's tax shelters. In a deferred-prosecution deal reached last year, the bank, Bayerische Hypo-und Vereinsbank AG, or HVB, agreed to a $30 million penalty and admitted that the Cards deal contained "fraudulent and illegal elements."

The bank's confession didn't mention myCFO. But it said "all parties involved" knew the Cards credit facility wasn't a legitimate long-term loan and would be unwound in about a year to generate "the phony tax benefits sought." Said HVB, in a Statement of Admitted Facts: "The transactions were prearranged by the promoters... and had no purpose other than generating tax benefits for the clients involved."

Did You Pay All Your Taxes? (USAT)

By Sandra Block

USA Today, March 6, 2007

If not, you're part of the $300 billion gap that Congress wants to close

Don't tax you, don't tax me, tax that fellow behind the tree. — Russell B. Long, late senator from Louisiana

If you're self-employed, sell used items occasionally on eBay or own a home, now would be a good time to start keeping really good records. Your tax returns could receive more scrutiny, thanks to a growing push to narrow the "tax gap" — the billions of dollars in federal taxes that go uncollected every year.

Democrats and Republicans don't agree on much, but they do share a desire to narrow the tax gap. That's not surprising. The IRS estimates that the tax gap exceeds more than $300 billion a year. Collecting even half that amount would let Congress repeal the alternative minimum tax — a parallel tax system that increasingly threatens middle-income taxpayers — without raising taxes or cutting government programs.

Taxpayers like the idea of closing the tax gap, too. More than 86% of taxpayers believe that cheating on income taxes is unacceptable, according to a survey released last month by the IRS Oversight Board.

But closing the tax gap is a lot more complicated than chasing down the proverbial deadbeats who hide money under the mattress. Government proposals to narrow the gap would affect people who probably don't think of themselves as scofflaws. And tax experts say the IRS can't make a serious dent in the tax gap unless it conducts more audits.

"If you're going to do away with the entire tax gap, it's going to be real painful for everybody," says Mel Schwarz, a partner at Grant Thornton's national tax office in Washington.

The IRS estimates that unpaid taxes from individuals, as opposed to big corporations, account for more than 70% of the tax gap. And within that group, the self-employed are considered the biggest offenders. Sole proprietors who underreport their income and self-employment taxes account for roughly one-third of the tax gap, the IRS says.

The Treasury Department has proposed requiring credit card companies to report to the IRS payments made to small businesses and other self-employed workers. That would allow the IRS to compare the self-employed workers' tax returns with the payments and determine whether they're underreporting their income.

But groups representing small-business owners worry that the proposal could increase the costs that credit card companies charge small businesses. More fundamentally, they say, the IRS figures fail to distinguish between sole proprietors who deliberately hide income and those who make honest mistakes.

"They don't make it easy for you," says Dennis Waters, 55, of Exeter, N.H., who buys and sells antique photographs via his website, www.finedags.com. "Every year, they're changing the rules, changing the types of deductions. You can't plan ahead to try and do something."

Because of the complexity of their returns, many self-employed workers must pay someone to do their taxes, which reduces their profits, says Todd McCracken, president of the National Small Business Association. Those who can't afford to hire a professional must take time away from their businesses to meet complex reporting requirements, such as filing estimated taxes every quarter, he says.

They need to keep comprehensive records, too, because sole proprietors are up to three times more likely to be audited than are individual taxpayers who don't file a Schedule C, the form used by self-employed workers to report their business income.

"Chances are, you'll be audited if you're in business long enough," says Frederick Daily, a tax attorney and author of Stand Up to the IRS.

Chuck Smith Jr., co-owner of JR Services, a mortgage servicing company in Norton, Ohio, knows that all too well. Since he went into business for himself in the 1970s, he's been audited three times.

None of the audits resulted in a higher tax bill, but in one case, he had to track down a receipt for a used truck cap. In an e-mail message, Smith said he now saves receipts for everything, some for as little as 50 cents.

A stepped-up effort to capture unreported income would lead to more audits of the self-employed. And it could also prove costly for families who employ nannies or other full-time household help.

If you paid a nanny $1,500 or more in 2006, you're supposed to file Schedule H with your tax return and withhold a portion of your employee's pay for Social Security, Medicare and unemployment tax.

But despite some high-profile cases of nanny-tax evasion, the tax is widely ignored. In 2003, the most recent year available, only about 241,000 taxpayers filed Schedule H, according to the IRS. The International Nanny Association estimates that about 1 million households employ nannies in the USA. Families bypass the nanny tax for many reasons. Some are already struggling to pay for child care and can't afford it.

Others employ undocumented workers. And some don't understand the rules, or think the tax is too complicated or burdensome, says Robert King, co-owner of Legally Nanny, an Irvine, Calif.-based company that helps people pay nanny taxes.

But this much is clear, King says: If the IRS audits your return and finds you have an off-the-books nanny, you'll owe back taxes and interest — along with penalties for tax evasion and fraud.

Other taxpayers who could be affected by efforts to narrow the tax gap include:

·Online sellers. More than 200 million people buy and sell items on eBay. If you use eBay or another Internet auction site to sell old stuff that's been piling up in your garage, you probably don't have to worry about paying taxes on the proceeds. But if you earn extra income by selling items online, you're supposed to pay taxes on your profits.

An IRS advisory committee recommended last year that online auction sites be required to file reports of sales transactions with the IRS. The committee also suggested requiring sellers to obtain a taxpayer identification number, which would let the government track the transactions.

A crackdown probably wouldn't affect professional sellers. Nor would it affect people who sell used personal items on eBay for less than they originally paid for them. Proceeds from those sales, like money earned from a garage sale, aren't taxable.

But it could cause headaches for people who occasionally buy items at yard sales and sell them online months later, Grant Thornton's Schwarz says. To calculate their profits, those people would have to keep records of the amount they originally paid — known as the basis — for every item they sell. That kind of inventory accounting "is sophisticated even for people who do taxes for a living, much less a guy who is trying to make a little extra money," Schwarz says.

EBay doesn't have records on transactions, because once a winning bid is posted, the sale takes place offline, she says. "We have no way to confirm whether or not that transaction actually happened," she says.

·Homeowners who deduct property taxes. One big benefit of homeownership is the ability to deduct all sorts of expenses. In fiscal 2006, homeowners deducted nearly $20 billion in real estate taxes and nearly $70 billion in mortgage interest. But the non-partisan Joint Committee on Taxation says it believes homeowners are deducting more property taxes and mortgage interest than the law allows — and that tightening those deductions could reduce the tax gap.

In a report to Congress last year, the committee said many homeowners' real estate tax deductions include user fees and special assessments for improvements. Those aren't legal deductions. But it's an easy mistake to make, the committee said, because property tax bills often don't distinguish between deductible taxes and non-deductible fees.

Many homeowners also incorrectly deduct "points" — prepaid interest — when they refinance their mortgages, the committee report said. Under the tax code, points are fully deductible on a mortgage to buy a home, but points on a refinanced mortgage must be prorated over the life of the loan.

To address both issues, the committee recommended increasing reporting requirements for local governments and mortgage lenders. That would lead to more IRS scrutiny of the deductions, and more audits of homeowners who claim them incorrectly.

The IRS has increased the rate of audits in recent years, particularly among high-income earners and the self-employed. Still, most taxpayers are more likely to be hit by a meteor than be audited by the IRS.

Some analysts say the IRS can't close the tax gap without significantly increasing audits. But doing so would risk the kind of backlash that led to congressional hearings of allegedly abusive collection tactics in the mid-1990s.

IRS Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson says she believes audits can be more effective if they're targeted at specific problem groups, such as self-employed workers who are paid in cash.

If the IRS audited a food vendor in a New York City neighborhood, she says, he would probably talk about it with other vendors. They'd get nervous and start reporting more of their income, she says. That's more effective, Olson adds, than "scattershot audits."

Meanwhile, tax watchdogs and consumer advocates argue that Congress won't make real progress toward closing the tax gap unless it simplifies the tax code. Olson agrees that the tax code is too complicated but says that's hardly an excuse to cheat. "We have to start talking about paying taxes as a civic duty," she says. "I'm really proud of our system being based on that trust."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Leaders Admit Failures At Walter Reed (USAT/AP)

By Anne Flaherty

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Army leaders said Monday that they accept responsibility for substandard conditions at the service's flagship Walter Reed Army Medical Center but also said they hadn't known about most of the problems.

At an emotional House subcommittee hearing at the hospital, lawmakers suggested the failings go far beyond the hospital for wounded soldiers in Washington. They demanded action. Military leaders — and Vice President Cheney — promised they'd get it.

"We can't fail one of these soldiers or their families, not one. And we did," said Maj. Gen. George Weightman, who was in charge of Walter Reed from August 2006 until he was fired last week. "We did not fully recognize the frustrating bureaucratic and administrative processes some of these soldiers go through. We should have, and in this, I failed."

Other top Army officials echoed Weightman's comments as Congress began digging into the controversy. In a session that mixed contrition and clashes, lawmakers speculated that dilapidated housing and excessive red tape were problems that went beyond Walter Reed.

"I'm afraid this is just the tip of the iceberg, that when we get out into the field, we may find more of this," said Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., a member of the House Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee that held the session.

"My question is, where have you been?" Rep. John Tierney, D-Mass., asked Army Undersecretary Peter Geren; the Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter Schoomaker; and the vice chief, Gen. Richard Cody.

Schoomaker told Tierney, the chairman of the panel, "I've got a daughter and a son-in-law that are on the way to combat. This is not something about people who don't care. And I am not going to sit here and have anybody tell me that we don't care about —"

"Nobody said anything about people not caring," Tierney interrupted, "so we'll put that red herring aside and, if I can, calm you down and get you back to the issue here."

Addressing war veterans Monday, Cheney promised that the problems at Walter Reed would be fixed.

"There will be no excuses — only action," Cheney told a gathering of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. "And the federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down."

Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson said his office will hire 100 patient advocates, speed benefit claims and improve medical screenings for veterans at its facilities.

"Our goal is to do things that serve the veterans in the manner that they deserve the best way that we can," Nicholson said in an interview on NPR's All Things Considered.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates forced Army Secretary Francis Harvey to step down Friday. Gates also removed Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, who had been named interim commander of Walter Reed. Kiley led the hospital from 2000 until 2004, when he became Army surgeon general.

DOJ_NMG_0140875

At the hearing, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., pointed to several investigative reports — including assessments by the RAND Corp. and the Government Accountability Office — dating back two years ago that sounded "alarm bells."

"Despite all the work that went on before, top Pentagon officials reacted to the reports at Walter Reed two weeks ago by claiming surprise," Waxman said.

Lawmakers listened as patients testified about lax or poor treatment at Walter Reed.

Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, who lost his left eye and suffered traumatic brain injuries from a rifle wound, said that after he was discharged from Walter Reed, he was given a map of the grounds and eventually found his way to outpatient quarters by wandering around and asking for directions.

Then, he said, he "sat in my room for a couple of weeks wondering when someone would contact" him about continuing treatment.

"My biggest concern is having young men and women who have had their lives shattered in service to their country … get taken care of," Shannon said.

Congressional Panel Told Of Shoddy Care At Walter Reed (MCT)

By David Goldstein

McClatchy Newspapers, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - The faces of the scandal over the treatment of wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center appeared before a congressional panel Monday.

Annette McLeod, whose husband suffered a brain injury when he was hit by a steel door in Iraq, said the Army tried to blame his mental problems on the fact that he needed extra help with math and reading while in grammar school.

The hospital kept putting up roadblocks to his treatment, she said. On his test for traumatic brain injury, they said "he didn't try hard enough," McLeod said.

"This is how we treat our soldiers," she said angrily, her voice breaking. "They're good enough to sacrifice their lives, but we give them nothing."

Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, who lost his left eye and received a brain injury after he was shot near the Iraqi city of Ramadi, told lawmakers that once at Walter Reed, he was basically abandoned.

"The system can't be trusted," he said.

The generals in charge were apologetic, even as several said they were unaware of the conditions that blackened the reputation of the Army's premier medical facility.

"I couldn't be madder; I couldn't be more embarrassed," said Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff. "I'm ashamed."

"I'm personally and professionally sorry," said Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who headed Walter Reed before becoming the Army surgeon general. "Simply put, I'm in command and I share these failures."

Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who took over the hospital in August and was fired last week, said, "You can't fail one of these soldiers. Not one. ... And we did."

Weightman, who some in Congress believe has been made a scapegoat for the problems, at one point turned to the McLeods and apologized for "not meeting their expectations. I promise we will do better."

The House Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee held the hearing at Walter Reed, where some combat-wounded outpatients were housed in squalor and had to battle the Army bureaucracy for their disability benefits. Other House and Senate panels, along with similar questions about the Department of Veterans Affairs' treatment of wounded veterans, are certain to hold more on Capitol Hill as the issue crackles like lightning in political and military circles.

The hearing came in response to recent Washington Post reports that the hospital housed some of its wounded outpatients in a bug- and rodent-infested building, known as Building 18. Mold grew on the walls, security was compromised and utilities weren't always working. The online magazine Salon first reported the problems more than a year ago.

"It was unforgivable," said Spc. Jeremy Duncan, who lost his left ear and the vision in his left eye and suffered other wounds when a roadside bomb exploded near him. "It wasn't fit for anybody to live in a room like that."

The 17 lawmakers, plus aides, were squeezed onto the stage behind a long table in a small hospital auditorium. Above them hung the Walter Reed motto: "We provide warrior care."

Democratic Rep. John Tierney, D-Mass., who chaired the hearing, called the conditions "appalling."

"This is absolutely the wrong way to treat our troops, and serious reforms need to happen," he said.

But Tierney added that the housing problems were "only the tip of the iceberg," a phrase that panel members used repeatedly.

DOJ_NMG_0140876

McLeod said the Army never told her that her husband, Spc. Wendell W. McLeod Jr., was injured while he was taking inventory on a food transport truck in Iraq. She learned about it from him.

She became his advocate: "I was very persistent. I went to generals, anybody who would listen to me."

Still, she said, "My life was ripped apart the day that my husband was injured."

McLeod, Duncan and Shannon described a system in which the injured have to justify their wounds in order to earn their disability payments. They said that Army medical personnel can diagnose their conditions, but case managers can question the diagnoses, prolonging their ordeal.

Paperwork gets lost, appointments get postponed and decisions get delayed, they added.

"Too often, wounded soldiers are poorly served and fall through the cracks," Cynthia Bascetta, a Government Accountability Office health care investigator, told the hearing.

Several generals said they were unaware of reports from both the GAO and the media in recent years that have detailed the problems that wounded soldiers often face.

Kiley said that the "bricks and mortar" issues, such as Building 18, can be easily fixed, and that most of the soldiers have been moved out. But the system for helping the wounded needs to be "less confrontational, less adversarial," he said. "We really need to reinvent this process."

Several lawmakers were skeptical. They said the Army has promised in the past to fix problems, only for Congress to later learn that little was done.

"What makes this round of problems any different?" said Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va. "These are heroes, and they're languishing."

'I Failed,' Says Fired Walter Reed General (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — The general who was fired after reports of substandard medical care for veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center said today he agreed with critics that there was a failure of leadership at the facility.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates "called this 'a failure of leadership.' I agree. We can't fail one of these soldiers, one of these patients, and we did."

Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, who was fired as commander at Walter Reed after the Washington Post published a series of gripping stories about the soldiers' shoddy medical care, argued that most patient care for returning soldiers "is superb."

But Weightman, who headed Walter Reed for less than a year, acknowledged he did not realize how frustrated veterans and their families had become in dealing with a gargantuan bureaucracy overwhelmed by injured soldiers returning from war.

"In this, I failed," he said, adding that he was disappointed he was unable to "continue to help" in correcting the problems.

The committee also heard from the Army's top brass. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, chief of staff of the Army, said he was "extraordinarily angry and embarrassed" by the disclosures.

"We've got no excuse for the past," said acting Army Secretary Pete Geren, tapped for the post after predecessor Frances Harvey was forced to resign in light of the widening scandal. As for fixing the problems, he added, "The only way we can prove [our resolve] is to show you."

As several committees gear up to investigate the medical care provided to returning combat veterans from the Iraq War, particularly outpatients, congressional leaders charged today that the revelations are just the "tip of the iceberg."

In hearings of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee at Walter Reed Hospital, Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Los Angeles) said that veterans and their families are "flooding us with complaints" and that "this may be the tip of the iceberg of what is going on all around the country."

And, citing a litany of news stories and congressional reports, Waxman threw doubt on claims by the Army's higher-ups that they were surprised by the Post's disclosures two weeks ago.

"They said, 'We never knew things were out of hand.' " Waxman said. "I have a stack of reports and articles that sounded the alarm bells."

He also questioned the policy of outsourcing care. "We've contracted out so much in this war," he said. "We are using mercenaries instead of soldiers, we contracted out this as well." As a result, he said, "in Iraq, [we're] overpaying for contracting; here we're under-serving our soldiers."

Soldiers and their families testified today that the veterans were denied adequate care, forced to live in squalid conditions and dismissed as troublemakers when they complained.

DOJ_NMG_0140877

"When I have to show my Purple Heart to get my uniform, you know it's bad," said Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon. Waiting for the plastic surgery that would allow him to wear a prosthetic eye, Shannon said he was angry that Army Secretary Harvey was allowed to resign.

"In a war," Shannon said, "you don't resign in the middle of a war, you continue to fight for us and admit mistakes and work to fix mistakes until you're fired."

Specialist Jeremy Duncan, who lost sight in one eye, suffered a fractured neck and almost lost his left arm when a homemade bomb exploded, said he was housed in a building "that wasn't fit for anybody to live in," with holes in the wall and black mold.

Duncan said despite his complaints, nothing ever got fixed. "That's when I called the Washington Post," he said. "The next day they [hospital officials] moved me and renovated that room."

Raising echoes of the federal government's flawed response to Hurricane Katrina, members of Congress blasted the hospital's response to severely wounded soldiers from Iraq and Afghanistan.

"You've been fighting a war," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) "You shouldn't have to come back here and fight a system."

Annette McLeod, wife of Cpl. Wendell "Dell" McLeod, said she became such a ferocious advocate for her husband's medical care that "the case manger got tired of dealing with me" and arranged to send her husband home to be treated by the local VA hospital.

Asked about claims by top Army officials that they had no knowledge of conditions, McLeod she said, "I have one question: were they deaf? I worked the chain, I talked to anybody who would listen."

Telling the committee about a soldier who was diagnosed with bipolar illness, McLeod said that serviceman received no compensation.

"This is how we treat our soldiers, we give them nothing," she said. "What about the ones that don't have [advocates like] me? If you're good enough to go to war, you're good enough to be taken care of when you get home."

Apologies, Anger At Walter Reed Hearing (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Senior commanders of the Army offered profuse apologies yesterday for the poor treatment accorded many soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, but lawmakers expressed skepticism that the generals had been unaware of the problems until they were spotlighted by the media two weeks ago.

Congress opened a round of investigative hearings into the Walter Reed scandal only days after a major shakeup at the Army that followed Washington Post reports about squalid living conditions and bureaucratic tangles for soldiers receiving outpatient care. Walter Reed's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey lost their jobs, and the Bush administration has established several panels to investigate the care being provided to wounded soldiers.

Senior commanders sounded more contrite yesterday than they did when the scandal first broke. At one point during several hours of hearings in the auditorium at Walter Reed, Weightman turned to the soldiers and families behind him and apologized "for not meeting their expectations, not only in the care provided, but also in having so many bureaucratic processes."

"I promise we will do better," Weightman said.

Lawmakers -- Democrats and Republicans alike -- seemed receptive to the candor voiced at the hearing of a panel of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, but they also cited earlier warnings from internal memos, government audits and news reports.

"I have to tell you, the first thing that pops into my mind is: Where've you been? Where has all the brass been?" said Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), who convened the hearing as chairman of the national security and foreign affairs subcommittee. "All the things that [were] heard, read about and heard earlier today, clearly, this can't all be pushed down at the lower level. Clearly this is not some junior officer's responsibility that nobody else has to claim anything for."

Army Chief of Staff Peter J. Schoomaker told the committee that the reports and audits did not come to his attention, but he said it is now clear that there is a much bigger problem in military health care. "I couldn't be madder, and I couldn't be more embarrassed and ashamed of the kinds of things that have turned up, because clearly it's not what my impression would have been based upon the feedback that I've gotten as I've talked to soldiers and the family," he said.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), the ranking Republican on the committee, cited an Oct. 12, 2006, Army memo indicating that a review team found problems with billeting, staffing and other issues at Building 18, the outpatient residential facility whose substandard conditions have been at the heart of the recent scandal. Both Weightman and Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army surgeon general, who previously commanded Walter Reed, acknowledged under questioning that they had been briefed on the findings.

"You knew these were problems," Davis said. "You may not have known specifically what it looked like, and you may not have been able to put faces and stories behind it, but there was an ongoing concern."

Kiley told Davis that his staff "informed me that the Walter Reed staff was working it, that they recognized that there were issues, and that they were taking action."

Kiley came in for tough criticism yesterday for his roles as commander of Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, when problems were developing at the facility, and as surgeon general since 2004, with responsibility for the Army medical command. Kiley accepted responsibility but defended his motives. "I've spent my entire life taking care of patients, training doctors to take care of patients. And I'm committed to Army medicine and committed to taking care of soldiers and their families," he said.

The comments from Davis and other GOP lawmakers underscored the bipartisan nature of the criticism yesterday in the first of what is likely to be a string of hearings probing problems at Walter Reed and in military health care more broadly. With anger building among military families and veterans groups, Republicans have seemed less reluctant to criticize the administration, and the White House is moving to try to get ahead of the political furor by naming a bipartisan commission to examine the care received by soldiers wounded in Afghanistan or Iraq.

Appearing yesterday morning before the national legislative conference of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Vice President Cheney said that President Bush "has made our administration's priority very clear to the Congress and to the country: There will be no excuses, only action. And the federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down. We're going to fix the problems at Walter Reed, period."

Yesterday's hearing, in the main building at Walter Reed, offered more grist for the developing political storm. The emotional impact was provided by three witnesses speaking on behalf of patients at Walter Reed: Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, who lives by the battlefield ethos of not leaving the wounded behind; Annette McLeod, an Army wife who would not stand silent as her injured husband was pushed aside, and Spec. Jeremy Duncan, who spoke out when he could not get the mold in his room removed.

Shannon was shot in the head during a firefight near Ramadi, Iraq, in November 2004 and has languished at Walter Reed ever since, awaiting plastic surgery so he can be fitted with a prosthetic eye. Paperwork for his retirement from the Army has been on hold.

But his ire yesterday was less about his own treatment than about the sense of betrayal he feels for younger soldiers he has tried to shepherd through the bureaucracy at Walter Reed.

"I will not see young men and women who have had their lives shattered in service to their country receive anything less than dignity and respect," said Shannon, who at times said he is having difficulty controlling his anger.

He said some injured troops encounter so much bureaucracy that they give up and forgo benefits to which they are entitled. "I have seen so many soldiers get so frustrated with the process that they will sign anything presented to them, just so they can get on with their lives," he said.

Shannon, who wore a patch over his missing left eye, also said the cost of treating thousands of service members wounded in Iraq should be dealt with honestly. "The system can't be trusted," he said. "And soldiers get less than they deserve from a system seemingly designed and run to cut the costs associated with fighting this war."

McLeod, whose husband suffered a brain injury near the Iraqi border, described her frustration at getting help from the chain of command at Walter Reed. She scoffed at suggestions that higher-ups did not know about the problems. "I have one question: Were they deaf?" she said. "Because I worked the chain. I went anywhere they would listen. So if you don't want to hear it, you don't want to hear it."

During her testimony, McLeod often appeared on the verge of tears, and at one point she wiped her eyes.

In the wake of such testimony, the official witnesses offered little pushback. Instead, Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, offered a withering analysis of the problems faced by wounded soldiers in negotiating the process for ongoing care and disability benefits after they receive initial life-saving treatment at military facilities.

"Our counselors and case managers are overworked, and they do not receive enough training," Cody said. "We do not adequately communicate necessary information. Our administrative processes are needlessly cumbersome and, quite frankly, take too long. Our medical holding units are not manned to the proper level, and we do not assign leaders who can ensure a proper accountability, proper discipline and well-being of our wounded soldiers and their health, welfare and morale, and our facilities are not maintained to the standards that we know is right."

Cody also noted that the 2005 decision by the federal base-closing commission to close Walter Reed in the midst of a war has caused problems getting "the best people" to work at the hospital, and he suggested that the decision be reexamined "during this long war."

'Serious Reforms' At Walter Reed Urged (USAT)

By Douglas Stanglin

USA Today, March 6, 2007

The chairman of a House panel holding hearings today on the care of wounded veterans at Walter Reed Army Hospital said problems at the facility are only the "tip of the iceberg" of poor treatment that extends throughout the military health care system.

"This is the wrong way to treat our troops and serious reforms need to happen immediately," said Rep. John Tierney, D-Mass., in opening hearings in the hospital's auditorium.

ON DEADLINE: Army brass face Walter Reed grilling

Maj. Gen. George Weightman, who was dismissed last week as commander of the Washington-based hospital, acknowledged in his testimony to "failures of leadership" at Walter Reed.

"Mistakes were made, and I was in charge," Weightman said.

Other top Army officers also offered their apologies. "We have let some soldiers down," said Peter Geren, the undersecretary of the Army.

Tierney, chairman of the national security subcommittee of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, called the hearings after a series of articles in The Washington Post two weeks ago about alleged substandard conditions and bureaucratic problems at the Army-run facility.

The newspaper reported on moldy walls, rats and roaches at the outpatient facility where soldiers are sent after their initial treatment at the main hospital. The series also examined the frustrations of wounded soldiers from the Iraq and Afghan wars who face a bureaucratic nightmare in seeking medical help.

"Rats and cockroaches don't burrow and infest overnight," Tierney said. "Mold and holes in ceilings don't occur in a week. And complaints of bureaucratic indifference have been reported for years."

The panel heard wrenching testimony from two wounded soldiers and the wife of a veteran who quit her job to fight the bureaucracy to get him help.

"My life was ripped apart the day my husband was injured," said Annette McLeod, whose husband, Walter, was hit in the head by a steel cargo door while working in Iraq. "And having to live through the mess that we lived through at Walter Reed has been worse than anything I've ever sacrificed in my life."

She said that when hospital officials found out her husband had had trouble with math in high school, they tried to use that to claim he had a learning disability and was mentally retarded, and therefore didn't qualify for treatment of a brain injury.

"He was considered fit enough to serve in the National Guard for 16 years. He was fit enough for deployment. But now they're saying he had his mental problem before he went to Iraq," she said.

Sgt. John Shannon, who lost his left eye and suffered traumatic injury after a firefight with insurgents in Iraq in 2004, said he was lost in the bureaucracy for weeks after he was discharged from the main hospital to the outpatient facility, known as the Mologne House.

Shannon said the staff handed him a photocopied map the grounds and sent him on his way.

"I was extremely disoriented and wandered around while looking for someone to direct me," he said. "Eventually, I found it."

After that, Shannon said, he was shunted from doctor to doctor and at one point had to start over because his records were lost.

"The system can't be trusted," he said. "And soldiers get less than they deserve from a system seemingly designed and run to cut the costs associated with fighting this war."

Tierney said he had concerns that the Army is "trying to whitewash over the problems."

"There appears to be a pattern developing here that we've seen before," he said. "First deny, then try to cover up, then designate a fall guy."

Tierney also suggested that the treatment of a large number of wounded soldiers from Iraq reflected "terrible planning" by the administration over the war.

The lawmaker said he is afraid "these problems go well beyond the walls of Walter Reed," adding that "as we send more and more troops into Iraq and Afghanistan, these problems are only going to get worse, not better."

Tierney also noted that an internal Army memo in September described the exodus of highly skilled and experienced personnel at Walter Reed following the Army's decision to privatize some aspects of health care.

The memo, he said, warned that the loss of staff and the increased workload because of the Iraq and Afghan wars put patient care services at risk of "mission failure."

DOJ_NMG_0140880

The panel heard testimony from patients, hospital staff, relatives of wounded soldiers and top Army officials responsible for the facility. The defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee also opened hearings today into the scandal.

The public outcry over the issue has mobilized Congress and the White House. On Saturday, in his weekly radio address, President Bush vowed quick action to correct any problems and said care for wounded veterans was a top priority for his administration.

Bush has also ordered a sweeping review of conditions at the nation's network of military and veterans hospitals, which have been overwhelmed by injured troops from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The White House said the president would name a bipartisan commission to assess whether the problems at Walter Reed exist at other facilities.

Addressing war veterans today, Vice President Cheney promised that the problems at Walter Reed will be fixed.

"There will be no excuses, only action," Cheney told a gathering of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. "And the federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down."

AUDIO: Cheney: Bush administration determined to ensure proper care for vets

Robert Gates, the new secretary of Defense, has moved quickly to hold top Army officials accountable. After Weightman's dismissal, the man who fired him, Army Secretary Francis Harvey, also was dismissed. Gates said Harvey was not aggressive enough to address the problem.

Gates was particularly upset that Harvey chose as Weightman's temporary successor Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the Army's surgeon general and a recent former commander of Walter Reed.

In interviews, Kiley downplayed the problems at the hospital, blaming the rodents on soldiers leaving food in their rooms.

The Army announced that Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker will be the new commander of Walter Reed. In addition, the branch took disciplinary action against several lower-level soldiers at the hospital.

Gates, who was visibly angry in announcing Harvey's dismissal, also has created an outside panel to review the situation at Walter Reed and the other major military hospital in the Washington area, the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

In a letter to Gates on Sunday, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., called for an independent commission, possibly headed by former secretary of State Colin Powell, to investigate all post-combat medical facilities and recommend changes.

"To think that men and women are serving their country in the most honorable and courageous way possible and all we give them is a dilapidated, rat-infested, run-down building to recover is a disgrace," Schumer wrote. "My fear is that Walter Reed is just the tip of the iceberg, and merely highlights the pervasive and systemic mistreatment of our servicemembers."

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Sunday on CBS' Face the Nation that the scandal is emblematic of the Bush administration's "lack of accountability" and "over-optimism" about the war in Iraq.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., appearing on ABC's This Week, said he likely would support a commission such as the one Schumer proposed.

"Investigations are not always the best way to go, but I think we ought to do whatever's necessary," he said.

Walter Reed In Spotlight (RC)

By Paul Singer

Roll Call, March 6, 2007

Democrats launched their first major investigation of the 110th Congress on Monday with hearings on conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and suggested that weak Republican oversight contributed to the problems experienced by wounded soldiers there.

As the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee convened a hearing at Walter Reed, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) issued a statement proclaiming the beginning of “long overdue oversight of the Bush administration.”

Pelosi spokesman Nadeam Elshami said: “The American people spoke clearly in the November elections that they wanted accountability and oversight. Under the Republican Congress it has been almost nonexistent, and you can certainly see that with what occurred at Walter Reed.”

Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), chairman of the subcommittee on national security and foreign affairs, which hosted the hearing, said in an interview afterward that “we should have known all this before. ... There just hasn’t been enough oversight.” Tierney said he anticipates holding another hearing on the matter within the next 45 days and promised “we are going to stay on this thing until we get it fixed.”

Republicans rejected the notion that they had failed to investigate conditions at Walter Reed, and cited a range of hearings and oversight activities on military health care that preceded the Democratic majority.

The Walter Reed hearing Monday was spawned by a series of published reports depicting wounded soldiers living in squalid conditions in a ramshackle dormitory.

But mice and mold were not the leading issues for the hearing. Instead lawmakers focused on the Byzantine process a wounded soldier must endure as the military attempts to establish how badly wounded the soldier is, and how his or her disability should be classified. This process has created a backlog that strains the medical center's capacity to respond to its wounded, officials said.

Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the army's surgeon general, testified Monday that the Walter Reed outpatient population has swelled during the Iraq War, and the medical review process that is required before a patient can leave the facility may take a year or longer. "Beginning in 2003, the population of active and reserve component soldiers assigned to [medical holding units on the campus] increased from 100-120 before the war, to a high of 874 in the summer of 2005," Kiley said.

Families have no reliable guide through the process and military decisions on physical disabilities may be confusing and contradictory, particularly since the Department of Veterans Affairs frequently comes to a different disability determination than the Defense Department did using the same ranking systems and in reference to the same wounds.

Republicans point out that they have charted many of these problems in oversight hearings in recent years. For instance, in February 2005 the Government Reform Committee under the gavel of then-Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) held a hearing on the convoluted system of designating disabilities. Davis pointed out at the time that "the Army lacks compassionate, customer friendly service," and said in his opening statement for that hearing, "I'm appalled that these men and women not only have had to face recovery from their war wounds, but are forced to navigate a confusing and seemingly uncaring system of benefits."

Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) wrote Monday in an e-mail that prior to the Democratic takeover, "The Committee handled 78 individual cases, recognized flaws in the system and were putting pressure on the Army to fix them. Army officials testified they were aware of the problems and were making progress. When I visited Walter Reed, I met with the wounded soldiers who were not yet in the outpatient labyrinth."

Tierney said many Members of Congress had probably dealt with individual cases of constituents seeking relief from the military bureaucracy, but had not realized that was part of a larger institutional problem. "We've all heard different stories," he said. "When you have a complaint, you get it resolved, you do your constituent service and don't realize it may be part of something broader."

Soldiers Testify Over Poor Care At Walter Reed (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — Members of Congress heard wrenching testimony on Monday from wounded soldiers treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and contrite promises from top Army officials to correct the conditions there.

The general who most recently commanded Walter Reed, a premier military hospital in Washington, and the Army's surgeon general accepted responsibility for the situation faced by some wounded troops, including poor housing, neglect and a hopelessly complicated bureaucratic maze.

The Army officials said they were working to address the problems at Walter Reed and were examining the situation at other medical centers.

"We have let some soldiers down," said Pete Geren, the acting secretary of the Army, addressing the panel before the hearing began.

The hearing was held by a subcommittee of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, whose members convened in an auditorium at Walter Reed, in deference to the soldiers who were to testify. The unusual venue also provided a vivid backdrop for the hearing, the first of several that Congressional committees intended to hold.

The subcommittee members heard first from two soldiers badly wounded in Iraq and from the spouse of another soldier injured in Iraq about their experiences at Walter Reed. Together, the three's stories set the emotional tenor for the testimony from military officials that followed.

Wearing a black eye patch, Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon described how he was struck in the head by a round from an AK-47 in November 2004 during a firefight near Ramadi, causing a traumatic brain injury and the loss of an eye.

Within a week of the injury, he was released to outpatient treatment, Sergeant Shannon recounted.

Despite being extremely disoriented, he said, he was given a map and told to find his own way to his new residence on the hospital's sprawling grounds. He wandered into a building and received directions.

He then waited several weeks wondering whether anyone would contact him about additional treatment, eventually calling people himself until he reached his case worker.

DOJ_NMG_0140882

He told of languishing in the hospital's bureaucratic system that evaluates soldiers for continuing in active duty or becoming medically retired, and what benefits they should receive. His paperwork, he said, was lost repeatedly, forcing him to start over several times.

Specialist Jeremy Duncan, one ear shredded by a makeshift bomb, told of the moldy living conditions in Building 18.

"It wasn't fit for anybody to live in a room like that," Specialist Duncan said.

Annette L. McLeod, whose husband, Wendell, returned from Iraq with a head injury, spoke emotionally of her distress during his treatment.

"My life was ripped apart the day my husband was injured, and having to live through the mess we've had to live through at Walter Reed has been worse than anything I've had to sacrifice in my life," Mrs. McLeod said through tears.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said he was "extraordinarily angry and embarrassed" by the living conditions at the hospital, reported prominently last month by The Washington Post. His brother, Maj. Gen. Eric Schoomaker, a senior medical officer, has now been named to command Walter Reed. The Army officials said extensive repairs were being made to deal with the deplorable conditions at one of the facilities on the hospital campus, Building 18, in which soldiers getting outpatient treatment at the hospital were found to be living in crumbling rooms soiled by mice, cockroaches and mold. Most of the soldiers living there, they said, have now been moved.

Accusations about shoddy treatment received by wounded soldiers at the prominent hospital, which is the centerpiece of the military's medical system, have touched a public nerve and deeply embarrassed the military in the past few weeks. The Bush administration has been thrown on the defensive, and members of Congress have been quick to express outrage.

"This is absolutely the wrong way to treat our troops, and serious reforms need to happen immediately," said Representative John F. Tierney, a Massachusetts Democrat who is the chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's subcommittee on national security and foreign affairs.

Mr. Tierney declared the problems at Walter Reed to be part of broader dysfunction at military health care facilities across the country and wondered whether it was "another horrific consequence of the terrible planning that went into our invasion of Iraq." He warned of a coming crunch with Mr. Bush's new plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"As we send more and more troops into Iraq and Afghanistan," Mr. Tierney said, "these problems are only going to get worse, not better."

Last week, Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was ousted over his handling of the revelations at Walter Reed, and officials changed the hospital's commanding officer twice in as many days.

Speaking at a meeting of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Vice President Dick Cheney restated on Monday the White House's promise fix the problems at Walter Reed.

"There will be no excuses, only action," Mr. Cheney said.

"As we work to improve conditions at Walter Reed, we want to find out whether similar problems have occurred at other military" and veterans' hospitals, he said. "These brave men and women deserve the heartfelt thanks of our country, and they deserve the very best medical care that our government can possibly provide."

Members of the committee from both parties were sharply critical during the hearing, some arguing that government audits and news articles have hinted at similar problems for years. Representative Tom Davis of Virginia, the ranking Republican on the committee, said the military's entire system for handling wounded veterans was in need of a "top-down overhaul."

"You're not going to be able to Scotch tape over it," Mr. Davis said.

Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the surgeon general of the Army, who also headed Walter Reed several years ago, apologized to soldiers and said the bureaucratic process they faced demanded "urgent simplification."

"We really need to reinvent this process," General Kiley said.

General Kiley was initially appointed to replace Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman as commander of the hospital last week, but the appointment came under fire because he had previously appeared to play down problems at the hospital when he was in command in 2004.

He was pressed on Monday to explain how he had not known about the conditions at Building 18, even though he lived across the street from it. He explained that inspections of barracks were not part of his normal job duties. But the subcommittee members continued to hammer him, asking why he had not taken action earlier to deal with the challenges faced by wounded soldiers and wondered whether recent efforts to contract out services to civilians had left the hospital depleted.

"I want you to know that I think this is a massive failure of competency and management and command," said Representative Paul W. Hodes, Democrat of New Hampshire.

Beyond specific steps to streamline the bureaucratic process that is faced by wounded troops and to improve living conditions, military officials said it might be time to re-evaluate whether Walter Reed should be closed in several years, as had been previously planned as part of a national base reorganization process.

DOJ_NMG_0140883

Several patients at Walter Reed attended the hearing Monday and echoed some of the problems described. But Staff Sgt. Brian Beem, who lost his right leg to a makeshift bomb in Baghdad in October, said he had had no idea conditions were so bad for some of his counterparts, even though he had heard grumbling.

"At my level," Sergeant Beem said, "I'm ignorant of it."

Walter Reed Army Medical Center Shapes War Debate (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, March 6, 2007

A House Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee hearing on the conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center yesterday could further pressure Democratic leaders to adopt a more stringent approach to paying for the war in Iraq.

House Democratic leaders are considering how to proceed on several war-related spending bills. After passing a resolution condemning Bush's troops surge with just 17 Republican votes, Democrats spent last week discussing how to challenge President Bush's authority to manage the war.

Some rank-and-file centrist Democrats have challenged a proposal from Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee and a leading anti-war critic, that would tie funding for the war to soldiers' readiness.

"I would suspect [the hearings] would add to anti-war pressures," said Rep. Paul Hodes (D-N.H.), who attended the talks. "It certainly gives weight to Jack Murtha's argument that unless there is adequate time between deployments, [Bush] is proposing a troop increase for a system that can't handle casualties."

Rep. John Yarmuth (D-Ky.), a freshman Democrat who defeated a GOP incumbent, said that the scandal at Walter Reed would add to anti-war pressures.

Other Democrats said the pressure will shift to the Republcans.

"The real pressure will be on Republicans to support our troops by voting for the supplemental spending bill," said a Democratic aide. He indicated that there would be extra money for veterans' healthcare programs in that bill.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), attended yesterday's hearing and said he saw "political dangers" ahead for the Bush administration.

"It's another example of failing to take action in the face of facts staring them in the face," he said.

The scandal adds further support for the Democrats' position "that the administration just botched this war from the beginning, not just in Iraq but to address the needs of returning soldiers," he added.

There was not enough room in the small auditorium at Walter Reed for the bipartisan outrage as lawmakers listened to wounded soldiers, Army officials and a Government Accountability Office investigator testify about the conditions at the Army's premier medical facility. The panel's subcommittee on National Security and Foreign Affairs ran the hearing.

The fast-paced, skeptical questions from Democrats and unusually harsh criticism from GOP lawmakers indicated a sea change in Washington since last year's mid-term elections.

"The frustration of these poor, injured veterans coming back — it is systemic. And I'm afraid this is just the tip of the iceberg. When we got out into the field, we may find more of this," said Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), the senior Republican on the panel.

"I didn't notice any partisan divide in the hearing today. We were all on one page," said Yarmuth, who met last week with former Miss America Heather French, the wife of Kentucky's lieutenant governor and a veterans advocate.

Some lawmakers even praised the media for reporting on conditions at Walter Reed.

Subcommittee chairman John Tierney (D-Mass.) reminded members that he was conducted a hearing, not an inquisition. Lawmakers minded his advice until Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the U.S. Army Surgeon General, and Major General George Weightman, who was recently fired as Walter Reed's commander, sat down at the witness table.

Several lawmakers, including Rep. Bruce Braley (D-Iowa), asked two wounded soldiers and a wounded national guardsman's wife whether they had any help navigating the Army's health care system. The witnesses repeatedly said there were few people with knowledge and expertise who could help them.

"One of the concerns was that there was no advocacy," said Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.). "It's an excellent idea and it has broad support."

There were no memorable moments of confrontation between the lawmakers and Army officials. But without raising their voices, Democrats pounded on the Bush administration's push to privatize services at Walter Reed.

Committee Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) and other Democrats blamed the Bush administration for privatizing outpatient care services at Walter Reed, which in turn led to a decline in the quality of care and a mass exodus of qualified care givers.

DOJ_NMG_0140884

"A $120 million contract [led to] downsizing, and shows that there is an ideology still at work that puts profit ahead of public services," said Welch. "That has to change."

While Democrats called the hearing, the most animated lawmakers were those most affected by the war in Iraq, including Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and freshmen Democrats.

Shays, whose support for the war in Iraq nearly cost him his congressional seat, said, "What I wrestle with is that there's not anyone involved in this that didn't know there were challenges. How can we know when a problem is being addressed? Is it something where we need to have hearings every two months?"

"I'm appalled, I'm outraged," said Hodes, adding that he could barely contain his frustration as Army officials testified that they did not know about the squalid conditions and bureaucratic mismanagement.

Meanwhile, even Vice President Dick Cheney acknowledged the problems at Walter Reed yesterday during a speech to a veterans' group.

"There will be no excuses, only action. And the federal bureaucracy will not slow that action down. We're going to fix the problems at Walter Reed, period," he said.

Congress will hold more hearings this week on Walter Reed. The Senate Armed Services Committee and the House and Senate Veterans Affairs Committees will meet tomorrow. Murtha postponed a hearing yesterday.

Walter Reed Hearing Brings Outrage And Apologies (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Adam Schreck

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Top Army officials faced angry lawmakers during an emotional hearing Monday on shoddy medical treatment and living conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, acknowledging that they had failed in the care of wounded veterans.

Calling the scandal at Walter Reed "the tip of the iceberg of what is going on all around the country," Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said veterans and their families were "flooding us with complaints" about bad medical care.

Waxman, citing news stories and congressional reports that revealed the hospital's problems over the last two years, cast doubt on Army officials' assertions that they were surprised by disclosures that injured soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan had been treated shabbily.

"We get officials who say they just didn't know things were happening," Waxman said. "I have a long list, a stack of reports and articles that sounded the alarm bells about what was going on here and around the country."

Army Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, fired as commander of the hospital complex last week, took responsibility for the problems.

"I failed," he said at the hearing. "We can't fail one of these soldiers or their families, not one. And we did."

Turning from the congressional panel to face a veteran and his family, Weightman expressed regret for a bureaucratic maze that forced the soldier's wife to battle the Army to get her husband proper medical treatment.

"I'd just like to apologize for not meeting their expectations," he said.

Several lawmakers accused Army brass of making Weightman, the medical center's commander for six months, the scapegoat for the problems at Walter Reed. Veterans groups think he had made progress in reducing the ratio of case managers to patients and in spotlighting post-traumatic stress disorder.

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey was forced to resign last week over the scandal.

Weightman's predecessors — retired Maj. Gen. Kenneth L. Farmer Jr., who had commanded the hospital complex from 2004 until August, and Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who was in charge from 2002 to 2004 — have not been disciplined.

After Weightman was fired, Kiley was named interim commander of Walter Reed but was removed a day later. Kiley remains the Army's surgeon general.

"Tell me why [Weightman] got the ax and why the others walk on the earth today," said Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), chairman of the subcommittee that held the hearings. "Where has all the brass been?"

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, responded angrily.

"I've got a daughter and a son-in-law that are on the way to combat," said Schoomaker, whose younger brother, Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, has been named to run Walter Reed. "This is not something about people [who] don't care, and I am not going to sit here and have anybody tell me that we don't care."

Tierney shot back, "Nobody said anything about people not caring." He called Schoomaker's response a "red herring."

The burgeoning scandal over medical treatment for returning troops, much like the government's flawed response to Hurricane Katrina, is exposing weaknesses in federal crisis management.

DOJ_NMG_0140885

Members of Congress promised more hearings on the maze of red tape that wounded soldiers confronted.

"You've been fighting a war," Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) said to veterans. "You shouldn't have to come back here and fight a system."

Peter Schoomaker promised to address the problems.

"I couldn't be madder, and I couldn't be more embarrassed and ashamed," he said.

Lawmakers questioned the policy under which maintenance and operations at Walter Reed were outsourced to IAP Worldwide Services Inc., a Florida firm run by a former Halliburton official who reduced Walter Reed's staff from 300 to 100.

"We've contracted out so much in this war," Waxman said. "We have mercenaries instead of U.S. military…. We are, in Iraq, overpaying for the work of the contractors, and here we're under-serving our military."

The subcommittee made the unusual decision to move the hearing from Capitol Hill to a wood-paneled auditorium at Walter Reed.

As soldiers in camouflage fatigues and sand-colored boots roamed the scrubbed hallways outside, lawmakers squeezed shoulder to shoulder onto a dais in the auditorium. They listened intently to the testimony of two injured soldiers and the wife of a third. All recounted problems and hurdles at the hospital — stories that first captured public attention in articles in the Washington Post last month.

Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, who is waiting for plastic surgery so he can wear a prosthetic eye, was angry that Harvey was allowed to resign.

"I don't know how things work in Washington, D.C., but in combat, we don't get to resign when bullets are flying and people are dying," Shannon said.

His advice to Army officials: "Pull themselves up by their bootstraps like any sergeant would do, admit to their mistakes and work to fix them until they're fixed."

Spc. Jeremy Duncan, injured by a roadside bomb in Iraq, lost sight in one eye, fractured his neck and almost lost his left arm. He was housed in now-infamous Building 18.

"It wasn't fit for anybody to live in a room like that," he said, describing holes in the walls and black mold that exposed vulnerable patients to infection.

Duncan said nothing was repaired despite repeated reports and complaints.

"That's when I contacted the Washington Post," he said.

After the newspaper reported the squalid conditions, "I was immediately moved from that room, and the next day they were renovating the room."

Another witness, Annette McLeod, said she became such a ferocious advocate for her husband's medical care that the case manager "got tired of dealing with me."

"I was very persistent," McLeod said. "Anybody that would listen to me, I would talk."

Asked if she spoke to Farmer, the former head of Walter Reed, she said, "I did. I was at his office door for several days and each time they turned me around…. They told me he did not have time to talk to me."

McLeod recounted the story of a young soldier who, on his return from Iraq, was diagnosed with bipolar disorder. The Army said it was a preexisting condition and refused disability payments.

"This is how we treat our soldiers," she said. "We give them nothing, but they're good and tough [enough] to go and sacrifice their lives. And we give them nothing."

Two Generals Provide A Contrast In Accountability (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Kevin Kiley, the three-star general in charge of all Army medical facilities, seemed stumped as he testified yesterday about his responsibility for the Walter Reed scandal.

"I'm trying not to say that I'm not accountable," he told members of the House oversight committee.

But try as he might, he couldn't fix blame on himself.

How could he not have known that wounded soldiers were living in squalid conditions across the street from his own home? "I don't do barracks inspections at Walter Reed," he said.

Why did he assure Congress in 2005 that the Walter Reed bureaucracy was improving, even though many soldiers were languishing in neglect at the facility? "In my role as the MedCom commander," he said, "Walter Reed was not my only command."

What did he do when a government report in 2006 found numerous problems at the now-infamous Building 18? "My staff informed me that the Walter Reed staff was working on it."

DOJ_NMG_0140886

Lawmakers on the committee, who were visiting Walter Reed Army Medical Center for a field hearing yesterday, quickly tired of the general's I-don't-do-windows routine. Rep. Bruce Braley (D-Iowa) accused him of spouting "hogwash." Rep. Chris Shays (R-Conn.) called his position "dishonest."

"I want you to know that I think this is a massive failure of competence in management and command," said Rep. Paul Hodes (D-N.H.), pointing his finger at Kiley.

After Hodes's harangue, Kiley replied, "I command by commanding through my commanders and trusting them to execute the mission."

Sitting shoulder to shoulder with Kiley was one such commander, Gen. George Weightman, who last week was fired as chief of Walter Reed after just six months on the job. Weightman and Kiley, who ran Walter Reed from 2002 to 2004, wore matching Army dress uniforms, but their responses could not have been more divergent. While Kiley deflected blame, Weightman freely admitted failure -- even though the victims of Walter Reed's neglect testified, and the House committee members agreed, that he was not to blame.

"He was, in my perspective, being punished because he caught the tail end of it," testified Annette McLeod, whose ordeal with her wounded soldier-husband, Dell, was one of those chronicled in a Washington Post series on Walter Reed. "Because somebody had to be the fall guy, he was there."

After Annette McLeod's testimony, the couple sat in the first row of the audience, just three feet from Weightman and Kiley as the two generals testified. "The McLeods are right behind you," pointed out Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va). "Do you have anything you want to say to them?"

"I feel terrible for them," said Kiley, keeping his back to the McLeods. "We have got to double our efforts, redouble our efforts, to make these kind of cases disappear in the system."

Weightman, by contrast, turned around to the McLeods and spoke warmly, addressing Annette directly. "I'd just like to apologize for not meeting their expectations, not only in the care provided, but also in having so many bureaucratic processes that just took your fortitude to be an advocate for your husband that you shouldn't have to do," Weightman said, as Kiley finally turned to face the McLeods. "I promise we will do better."

When the two generals were eventually excused, Weightman again turned to the McLeods and shook hands with them; though he spoke quietly, the words "I'm sorry" were clear. Kiley left the room without a glance backward.

Members of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee shook their heads in amazement as Annette McLeod testified tearfully that she didn't know her husband had been hurt in Iraq "until he called me himself from a hospital in New Jersey."

They reacted similarly when another Walter Reed patient profiled by The Post, Staff Sgt. John Daniel Shannon, spoke about how, while recovering from being shot in the head in Iraq, he was left "extremely disoriented" to wander the Walter Reed campus alone in search of an outpatient facility. The third member of the panel, Spec. Jeremy Duncan, who had two studs where his left ear used to be, described the "unforgivable" squalor of his room at Walter Reed.

But nobody blamed Weightman. "I don't think he should have been fired," said Shannon, wearing a patch over his missing eye.

The lawmakers seemed to agree. "There appears to be a pattern developing here that we've seen before," said Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.) "First deny, then try to cover up, then designate a fall guy." Rep. Stephen Lynch (D-Mass.) advised Weightman that "you probably have a little more blame being laid at your doorstep than I think is probably appropriate." And Rep. John Duncan (R-Tenn.) shared the view of a colleague's wife that Kiley "skirted this stuff for five years and blamed everyone else."

Weightman was not so easy on himself; he pleaded guilty repeatedly to a "failure of leadership," and said lawmakers were "absolutely right" to question what was "obviously a failure."

Kiley started off in similar fashion, saying he was "personally and professionally sorry" and acknowledging: "I share these failures." But the further he got from his prepared testimony, the less contrite he became. He was blameless after Walter Reed shifted maintenance to a private contractor in 2004. "I was not the commander then."

Shouldn't top officers make sure proper care is being given at every level? "I don't get involved at my level . . . at an individual issue."

Will he find a way to break down privacy obstacles that hampered proper care? "I'm not in charge of it, but I'll take care of it."

Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.), like his colleagues, was skeptical about Weightman's guilt and Kiley's self-exoneration; he wondered if Kiley thought the problems at Walter Reed "have been in existence for over six months."

Kiley responded with something about "two 15-6 investigations" and something else about the "MEB/PEB process."

DOJ_NMG_0140887

"The information we have to date is that General Weightman in fact was trying to work through these problems; he's been fired," Welch continued. "Is that an appropriate response to the situation?

"That is a decision for the civilian leadership," Kiley answered.

Whatever the merits of Weightman's dismissal, the problems at Walter Reed have not disappeared with him. Before yesterday's hearing, a patient with a prosthetic arm tried to get in but was stopped by a guard, who asked if the young man was supposed to be in the hearing. "I'd like to be," the soldier said.

"It's preselected, unfortunately," the guard replied. The young amputee walked away. Inside, three rows of seats had been reserved for the Army; almost all were empty.

Testimony At Walter Reed (WP)

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

IN A DIM auditorium at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center yesterday, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, the recently ousted commander of the facility, turned and apologized directly to the maimed soldiers and their families who had assembled for a House subcommittee hearing. Once during the hearing, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, Army surgeon general and former Walter Reed commander, tried to frame the situation as a failure of lower-ranking personnel and characterized an article in The Post as "yellow journalism." Gen. Kiley has reason to be defensive -- he is arguably more to blame for the miserable outpatient conditions described in a recent Post series than is Gen. Weightman but still serves as the Army's top doctor. Nevertheless, he, too, apologized, and he acknowledged that he is ultimately responsible for outpatient facilities. And Gen. Kiley, along with Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, and Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, the new head of Walter Reed, assured the subcommittee that thorough reviews of outpatient facilities will lead to significant reform.

Also encouraging was Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates's swift firing of Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey on Friday after Harvey nonsensically removed Gen. Weightman from his position and placed Gen. Kiley temporarily in charge. Mr. Gates seems to be holding upper tiers of Army management to account.

Being sorry is only the first step, however. Since the series was published, Post reporters have received hundreds of accounts of appalling conditions and management practices at both Army outpatient facilities and Department of Veterans Affairs facilities across the country. One mother complained that a room assigned to her son, who had an open wound, was infested with fruit flies and contained overflowing trash and a syringe. A soldier said that wounded veterans had to sign waivers attesting that they understood that their living conditions were below minimum governmental standards. Most disturbing are reports of Army medical review boards trying to pay wounded soldiers as little as possible in disability benefits, sometimes adjudicating veterans' claims while they were heavily medicated and unable to argue their cases effectively.

Fixing veterans' outpatient care will take a lot more than putting a new roof on Walter Reed's Building 18. It means revamping buildings and bureaucracies across the country. The generals who testified yesterday made an excellent point: More injured soldiers survive now than ever before because of the quality of the Army's inpatient medicine, and the nature of their physical and psychological wounds often makes those injuries difficult to diagnose and treat. Since American action began in Afghanistan, this country has taken on a large responsibility to care for its wounded service members, for life if needed. It may be expensive, but these men and women deserve clean accommodations and straightforward assistance -- not adversity -- from administrators. If the accounts The Post has received over the past couple of weeks are true, then the Army and Veterans Affairs are both far from achieving that goal.

Casualties Of The Budget Wars (NYT)

By Paul D. Eaton

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Fox Island, Wash.

IN his 1997 book “Dereliction of Duty,” Col. H. R. McMaster wrote that “the ‘five silent men’ on the Joint Chiefs made possible the way the United States went to war in Vietnam.” So it is today with the war in Iraq. Regrettably, the silence of our top officers has had a huge impact not just on the battlefield but also on how we have brought our injured warriors home from it. These planning failures led to the situation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center recently reported by The Washington Post, which resulted in the firings of the hospital’s commander and the secretary of the Army.

The sad truth is that The Post’s reports weren’t entirely new: Mark Benjamin, of United Press International and the Web magazine Salon, and Steve Robinson, the director of veterans affairs at Veterans for America, have been reporting on the disgraceful treatment of our war wounded since 2003. More important, the Walter Reed scandal is simply the tip of the iceberg: President Bush, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Congress all pointedly failed to provide the money and resources for our returned troops wherever they are, both the obviously wounded and those who may seem healthy but are suffering mentally and physically from their service.

Soldiers have long joked: "If you are really sick or injured, Army medical care is O.K. But if you are hurting only a little, especially if it isn't visible, you're in big trouble." The American soldier still receives the best trauma care in the world, especially at Walter Reed. The problem there has been with deplorable outpatient care management. The military health system is seriously undermanned and underfinanced for the number of casualties coming home. Also, there has been little preparation for identifying and treating post-traumatic stress injuries.

Last year, because of spending in Iraq, the Army had a $530 million shortfall in its budget for posts at home and abroad. This forced the Army's vice chief of staff, Richard Cody, to tighten belts that were already at the last notch.

Hospitals have taken a big part of the financial hit. General Cody has warned Congress that failure to shore up the tottering military health care system could become a "retention issue." David Chu, the Pentagon's under secretary for personnel and readiness, told The Wall Street Journal that veterans' costs "are taking away from the nation's ability to defend itself."

The result is that Walter Reed and every other domestic Army post have struggled to house soldiers properly after their release from the hospital. For the lucky ones, family members pick up the slack, making sure that follow-up care is provided, that prescription drug regimens are followed, that therapists show up for rehabilitation sessions. Those without family help tend to slip between the cracks.

Walter Reed, in particular, has another problem. The Base Realignment and Closure Commission decided in 2005 to shutter this critical hospital. I won't debate that decision now — what's done is done — but when the commission decides you will close within a few years, money dries up real fast. It is no wonder that buildings fell into disrepair and recovering soldiers slipped off the radar screen.

This was the fiscal environment that Maj. Gen. George Weightman stepped into last August when he took command of Walter Reed. I have known George since he was a plebe at West Point. He is bright, honorable and energetic — and always capable. But as another of his admirers told me, "He was the captain of that ship." And now he has gone down with his ship — the victim of Mr. Rumsfeld's wrongheaded cost-cutting and the joint chiefs' failure to stand up to the civilian leadership.

So, what can we do to ensure that good men like General Weightman aren't put in impossible situations and, more important, that our fighting men and women get the care they need? A good first step has been taken: Secretary of Defense Robert Gates fired the secretary of the Army, Francis Harvey, who was a true Rumsfeld man and viewed by many as more loyal to his boss than to the Army. But some other prescriptions seem obvious:

I would encourage every member of Congress, ever senior Pentagon official and every White House staff member to read the articles Mark Benjamin has written on soldier care, beginning with the 2003 report he did on Fort Stewart in Georgia. The train in this wreck left the station a long time ago.

The Pentagon must do something it has, amazingly, never tried: develop an official doctrine on how to "redeploy" a soldier from the combat zone to the peaceful zone. This means hiring mental health experts to thoroughly analyze the psychology of the returning soldier, and making a commitment to building a health care network that can meet the needs of a growing population of injured soldiers.

Congress must increase financing for research into traumatic brain injuries, the signature malady of this war. Unbelievably, in its Pentagon appropriations bill for 2007, Congress cut in half the financing for the Army's main research and treatment program on brain injury (which, no surprise, is at Walter Reed).

The government should also expand grants to the Fisher House program, a public-private partnership that has "comfort homes" at every major military medical center. These provide families of wounded troops with housing, kitchens, laundry rooms and other support services. The program serves more than 8,500 families a year, but will struggle to keep pace with the growing number of returning wounded.

Like so many government departments, the military has a medical computer system that is made up of a hodgepodge of antiquated machines with outdated software that often can't communicate with one another. This needs to be replaced with a user-friendly system that can efficiently track the wounded as they make their way through the system.

The Pentagon must revamp the Medical Evaluation Board process, the system under which a soldier suffering from injury is screened to see if he should be given a discharge and a disability pension. Cases now are handled in a haphazard way and can drag out indefinitely; each should be held to a disciplined timeline.

The general effort by Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Harvey to privatize services at Army bases needs to be reined in. Some of the problems at Walter Reed seem to have been caused by the contracting out of maintenance services and other support jobs.

While we address the needs of uniformed men and women, we need to assess our civilian employees as well; most are excellent, but some are entrenched and in need of firing.

The money to care for our soon-to-be-veteran soldiers should not come from the Defense Department budget. The immense costs of medical care are simply too attractive to Pentagon budget-cutters, creating a conflict of interest between the war effort and the health of our troops.

And, of course, we must move the outpatient soldiers out of Walter Reed immediately. It is a small, old installation with few recreational outlets in a neighborhood of Washington that is unwelcoming to patients' families. Fort Lewis in Washington State, for example, is a large, well-equipped installation in a beautiful area with a good program for recovering soldiers. And the big goal should be to get our wounded troops off bases entirely and back their own homes, with adequate medical care and insurance.

The other day I had a phone conversation with Mr. Robinson, a former Army Ranger whose group aids Persian Gulf war veterans suffering with health disorders. "The problem with Walter Reed and the nation's defense health program is much more than money, mold and mice," he said. "It is about leadership." He's right. And with Secretary Gates, I expect the Joint Chiefs of Staff to be able to resume their rightful role in our nation's defense

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Doctors found a blood clot in Vice President Dick Cheney's left leg, but he was not admitted to a hospital and will be treated with blood thinning medication "for several months," his office said. Mr. Cheney, 66 years old, went in for tests after experiencing "mild calf discomfort" following a nine-day trip to Asia and the Middle East, his spokeswoman said. The clot, a deep venous thrombosis, may have resulted from spending long periods seated on a plane. "Treated properly, it poses a small threat," said Sean O'Donnell, chief of vascular surgery of Washington Hospital Center.

Supreme Court Declines to Hear Appeal by Ebbers of WorldCom

The Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal by former WorldCom Inc. Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year sentence in federal prison for his role in an $11 billion accounting fraud at the telephone company. Mr. Ebbers appealed the trial judge's refusal to grant immunity to three defense witnesses and argued that the judge wrongly instructed the jury. The court turned away the appeal without comment. A federal appeals court in New York rejected the same arguments last year.

China Aims to Deter Steel Exports

China will cut tax rebates on steel exports in an effort to curb exports and stabilize local prices. China became a net steel exporter last year as its crude-steel output rose 19%, leading to 27 antidumping or antisubsidy investigations against Chinese steel producers by 11 countries. In September, China cut tax rebates for steel exports to 8% from 11%.

Cheney To Be Treated For Blood Clot (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Vice President Cheney will be treated with blood thinners for several months after tests revealed Monday that he has a blood clot in his left leg, a spokeswoman said. Cheney visited his doctor in Washington after feeling minor discomfort in his calf, spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride said. She said an ultrasound showed the deep venous thrombosis.

Cheney, 66, returned to the White House after the exam and continued his workday. "He'll maintain his regular schedule," McBride said. "He feels fine."

The vice president returned last week from a trip that included stops in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

In 2005, he underwent six hours of surgery on his legs to repair a kind of aneurysm, a ballooning weak spot in an artery that could have burst if left untreated.

White House panel OKstwo surveillance programs

DOJ_NMG_0140890

A White House board has determined that two of the Bush administration's controversial surveillance programs — electronic eavesdropping and financial tracking — do not violate citizens' civil liberties.

After operating mostly in secret for a year, the five-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Board is preparing to release its first report to Congress next week.

The report finds that both the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program and the Treasury Department's monitoring of international banking transactions have sufficient privacy protections. They have multiple layers of review before sensitive information is accessed.

"We visited NSA and met with the top people all the way down to those doing the hands-on work," said Carol Dinkins, a Houston lawyer and former Reagan administration assistant attorney general who chairs the board. "The program is structured and implemented in a way that is properly protective and attentive to civil liberties."

Lawyers seek hearing soonfor Guantanamo detainees

Former U.S. solicitor general Seth Waxman and other lawyers asked the Supreme Court to quickly hear the appeal of six detainees who have been held for more than five years at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The case would test the new Military Commissions Act, part of the Bush administration's strategy for special trials for foreign terrorist suspects held at Guantanamo.

The prisoners are appealing a decision last month by a federal appeals court in Washington that said Guantanamo detainees have no right to challenge their detention in federal court. Their lawyers say the ruling conflicts with decisions by the justices in 2004 and 2006 that said detainees could get a hearing by a federal judge.

The lawyers want the case heard May 7. They say it is urgent because of the important issue of access to U.S. courts and "oppressive conditions" at Guantanamo.

The federal appeals court ruled that the Military Commissions Act barred federal judges from hearing detainees' cases. Congress passed the act at the urging of the Bush administration after the justices' decision in June that struck down Bush's original plan for military tribunals as an alternative to regular U.S. courts.

Waxman, who was the government's top lawyer before the court during the Clinton administration, wrote: "At issue is nothing less than this country's commitment to the rule of law. Hundreds of men are currently facing lifelong imprisonment without any assurance that they will ever be tried on a criminal charge or given any fair opportunity to challenge the purported basis" of their detention.

The military has used Guantanamo since 2002 for foreigners picked up as al-Qaeda suspects in Afghanistan and elsewhere. The prisoners in the new case are Algerians arrested in Bosnia on suspicion of an attempt to commit international terrorism.

Dick Cheney Treated For Blood Clot In Leg (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Vice President Dick Cheney, who returned to Washington last week from an around-the-world trip, is being treated for a blood clot in his left leg, his office announced today. Such clots, while rare, are sometimes caused by extended air travel.

Cheney is being treated with a blood thinner intended to prevent the clot from breaking loose and reaching his lungs, said his deputy press secretary, Megan McGinn. She said Cheney, 66, had experienced "mild calf discomfort."

Cheney has been treated for multiple cardiology and vascular issues over the past three decades -- most recently undergoing surgery in September, 2005, to treat swelling in blood vessels behind both knees. He has had four heart attacks, quadruple bypass surgery, two artery-clearing angioplasty procedures, and an operation to implant a pacemaker, designed to start automatically to regulate his heartbeat if needed.

He has struggled for years to keep his weight down and has traveled with an exercise cycle stored in the cargo hold of Air Force Two.

The vice president's most recent travel took him to Japan, Australia, Oman, Pakistan and Afghanistan, a roughly 25,000-mile trip over the course of a week.

"In light of his recent prolonged air travel, he visited his doctor's office at the George Washington University Medical Faculty Associates," she said. An ultrasound revealed the clot, a deep venous thrombosis, or DVT, in his left lower leg, she said.

Cheney would be treated with the blood thinner for several months, McGinn said. The vice president's office did not make public the specific medication with which he is being treated.

McGinn said Cheney, who spoke for about 20 minutes during the morning to a convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, returned to his White House office after visiting the medical office.

Obesity, immobility and age are among the risk factors for deep venous thrombosis, said Leslie Saxon, chief of cardiology at the Keck School of Medicine at USC.

The factors can be multiplied by air travel, Saxon said, because the lower oxygen levels in airplanes lower the oxygen in the bloodstream, increasing the risk of clots, and the dry air of the airplane increases dehydration, another factor in increasing the likelihood of clotting.

In addition, she said, "people who have heart and circulation problems don't have as vigorous a flow" of blood as healthier people.

She said the common blood thinner treatment carried some risk of promoting internal bleeding but that the risk was "extraordinarily low."

Cheney Is Treated For A Blood Clot After Trip (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — Vice President Dick Cheney was treated Monday for a blood clot in his left leg that independent experts said was probably not related to his history of heart disease but rather the result of his recent around-the-world trip, which included 65 hours of plane travel over 9 days.

Mr. Cheney's office said the vice president experienced "mild calf discomfort" sometime after delivering a late-morning speech to the Veterans of Foreign Wars and visited his doctor's office at George Washington University.

An ultrasound revealed a deep venous thrombosis, a blood clot, in the lower part of his left leg. He was treated with anticoagulant medication, which he will take for several months, and he returned to work. Although blood clots in the leg can be dangerous if left untreated, experts say most are successfully treated with the anticoagulant drugs that the White House says Mr. Cheney is now receiving.

A crucial determinant in treating blood clots in the leg is the size of the clot, which a statement Monday from Mr. Cheney's office did not describe. Nor did the statement state the clot's specific anatomical location.

In September 2005, Mr. Cheney underwent surgery to repair aneurysms, bulges in the arteries that can spawn dangerous blood clots, behind both knees. Doctors implanted devices known as stent-grafts in each of his legs.

The blood clot that was discovered in Mr. Cheney's leg on Monday was in a vein, not an artery, and several independent experts said there was most likely no connection between it and the 2005 surgery. Dr. Cameron Akbari, a senior vascular surgeon at Washington Hospital Center in the District of Columbia, said Mr. Cheney's history of heart disease put him at only "a very slightly increased risk" of developing a deep venous thrombosis.

"Reasons No. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 why he developed this are he was on a very long plane ride," Dr. Akbari said.

In otherwise healthy people, such clots most often develop among those who are sedentary, bedridden after orthopedic or major surgery, or during pregnancy. Deep venous thrombosis can also develop after long flights or car rides.

The clots form when blood pools; doctors often advise patients to walk the aisles of a plane, or make road stops every few hours to keep blood circulating. Mr. Cheney's plane, Air Force Two, is roomy, but White House officials did not say how much he walked around during his trip.

The danger from deep venous thrombosis is that a piece of the clot can break off, travel with the blood and lodge as an embolus in a lung to damage the organ or cause sudden death. Experts say an individual who experiences one episode is at risk for a recurrence.

Standard therapy is to start treatment with injections of low molecular weight heparin and Coumadin pills. Both are anticoagulant drugs (often misnamed blood thinners). Coumadin is usually continued for at least six months. In its statement, Mr. Cheney's office said he would be treated with "blood thinning medication for several months."

Doctors allow most patients to return to work after therapy starts. At least one expert, Dr. K. Craig Kent, chief of vascular surgery at New York-Presbyterian Hospital, said he would not advise a patient like Mr. Cheney to take a long plane trip in the next few days.

During his speech to veterans Monday morning, the vice president made joking reference to the trip, which covered 25,000 miles and took him to Australia, Pakistan and Afghanistan, where a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the base where Mr. Cheney had spent the night.

"As you may have heard, I've been away from Washington recently," the vice president said, adding, "Some, of course, consider that a positive."

Cheney Treated For Blood Clot In Leg (WP)

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Vice President Cheney is being treated for a blood clot that his doctor discovered in his left leg, his office announced yesterday.

Cheney's doctor at George Washington University discovered the clot during an examination yesterday after the vice president experienced mild discomfort in his calf, spokeswoman Megan McGinn said. The doctor prescribed blood-thinning medication, which Cheney is to take for several months, she said.

Cheney, who may have developed the clot during a recent trip to Afghanistan, Pakistan, Australia and elsewhere that involved extensive air travel, saw his doctor after delivering a speech yesterday morning to the national legislative conference of the Veterans of Foreign War. He then returned to the White House and continued to work.

Cheney, 66, has a long history of heart problems. He has suffered four heart attacks and has had quadruple bypass surgery, two artery-clearing angioplasties and an operation to install a pacemaker.

Cheney, who became vice president in 2001, had his last heart attack, which doctors described as slight, in 2000. He was hobbled briefly in late 2005 after having surgery to repair aneurysms behind each of his knees.

The kind of blood clot Cheney developed is known as a deep venous thrombosis, which forms in a vein deep in the body. Most deep vein clots occur in the lower leg or thigh.

Sitting for long periods of time, such as on long plane flights, can increase the risk of such clots. Cheney returned last week from his trip.

"He spent over 60 hours in the air," McGinn said.

A clot that breaks off and travels through the bloodstream can cause a deadly pulmonary embolism by lodging in a lung, a heart attack by lodging in the heart or a stroke by traveling to the brain.

A blood clot in the thigh is usually more likely to break off and cause a pulmonary embolism than a clot in the lower leg or another part of the body, according to the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute.

Making Up For Lower Pay (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

When Michael Maynard's company announced it was moving overseas, the 53-year-old machine technician from Massachusetts quickly found a job at another firm. As the sole provider for his wife and two daughters, Maynard jumped at the new opportunity, even though he had to take a pay cut of nearly $8 an hour.

Then Maynard got lucky. He discovered that, unlike most Americans who lose their jobs, he qualified for a little-known federal program that pays up to $10,000 to certain workers dislocated by trade. In addition to his regular paycheck, he gets a government check for $117 a week, he said, a sum that "helps a lot."

Now, congressional leaders want to expand the program, known as wage insurance, with some arguing that it should be available to any worker who loses a job for almost any reason. The proposal is part of a broader effort to ease the anxieties of middle-class Americans who feel threatened by the globalization of business and a churning U.S. labor market that creates and destroys about 30 million jobs a year.

The proposal is also central to the debate in Washington over trade. Democrats warn that it will be difficult for them to extend the Bush administration's authority to negotiate trade agreements unless the social safety net for U.S. workers is significantly expanded. That authority expires in June.

"There's a huge ferment out there. And part of the reason for that ferment is that for the last 12 years we have denied what was happening to people while trade just exploded," said Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.), chairman of the panel on income security and family support of the House Ways and Means Committee, which handles trade legislation.

From 2003 to 2005, 3.8 million workers were laid off from jobs they had held for at least three years because of plant closings, insufficient work or the elimination of their positions, according to data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. About 70 percent had found new jobs by January 2006. But nearly half took a pay cut, the BLS found, and 29 percent reported earnings losses of 20 percent or more.

Only a fraction of job losses are due to increased competition from imports or the transfer of jobs overseas, economists say. Nonetheless, "people do wrongly associate a lot of job loss with trade," said Rep. Jim McCrery (La.), the ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee. "So addressing this in some meaningful way is necessary to keeping us at the forefront of knocking down trade barriers."

Entire Washington think tanks have cropped up to propose solutions, including a "strategic pause" in the approval of new trade agreements, a position backed by labor, and an array of expensive social reforms to ease the pain of job loss and reemployment. The Hamilton Project, founded by former Clinton Treasury secretary Robert E. Rubin, urges continued trade liberalization along with the creation of universal health insurance, more portable pensions, more focused job-training programs and wage insurance.

In Congress, leaders from both parties are working with the Bush administration to tackle the issue in hopes of proceeding with pending trade agreements -- while responding to a surge of public anger over free-trade policies, which became evident in last year's election. In recent weeks, wage insurance has emerged as a key part of those discussions.

The concept has been around for years, but no country has tried it on a grand scale, said Lael Brainard, director of the Global Economy and Development program at the Brookings Institution. The goal, she said, is to give displaced workers "a strong incentive to search actively for new employment," even at lower pay, by "smoothing over" the reduction in income.

Unlike unemployment insurance, wage insurance rewards a worker for taking a new job, Brainard said. And unlike general job-training programs, which carry no guarantee of future employment, wage insurance subsidizes on-the-job training and, in theory, helps a worker climb back up the economic ladder.

The nation's existing wage-insurance benefit was tucked into the federal Trade Adjustment Assistance program in 2002. It applies only to manufacturing workers 50 and older who are laid off as a direct result of international trade. They are eligible if they take a new job within six months of the layoff that pays less than $50,000 a year. The program, administered by the Labor Department, will make up half of a worker's lost wages for two years, up to $10,000.

The program is reaching only a fraction of those eligible, however, due to the complicated qualification requirements and a lack of knowledge about the program among front-line job counselors. Last year, a Government Accountability Office report found that no more than 20 percent of older workers at five closed job sites received the wage benefit; at two sites, more than half of older workers were not aware of it. Others had trouble finding a new job before the six-month deadline.

Since the program began in 2003, fewer than 6,800 workers have received wage insurance, with nearly half of them signing up last year.

A bill by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) would expand the entire trade-adjustment program to include service-sector workers whose jobs are lost to trade and would lower the age minimum for wage insurance to 40. McDermott and Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), the third-ranking Democrat in the Senate, are working to adapt a proposal by Brainard and others that would cover almost any displaced worker of any age who loses a job for almost any reason and takes a new one for lower pay. Workers who make less than $97,500 would be eligible, according to a Schumer aide, and benefits could be increased to a maximum of $20,000.

Such an expansion would cause the cost of the program to increase to roughly $3.5 billion annually from about $20 million. Brainard said the cost could be covered by adding $25 to every worker's annual unemployment tax, an idea Schumer said he is considering.

While there is support in both parties for wage insurance, the idea is also drawing fire. Many labor unions oppose it, saying it encourages workers to accept lower wages and benefits. They also argue that the program amounts to "burial insurance" for workers whose jobs should have been protected in the first place.

At a hearing on wage insurance before the Joint Economic Committee last week, Maurice Emsellem, policy director for the National Employment Law Project, argued that wage insurance doesn't work and is likely to steal resources from the nation's unemployment insurance system and other benefit programs.

Some Republicans are willing to embrace a limited expansion of the program as a trade-off for renewing the president's trade-negotiating authority. But they are reluctant to expand it significantly at a time when the Bush administration and congressional Democrats have promised to balance the federal budget.

"My role is to make sure it's directly related to trade, not used as a subterfuge for another social-benefit program," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (Iowa), the ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee, which handles trade legislation.

With many people in both parties backing at least a limited expansion, more workers seem likely to find themselves eligible for the program that has been a blessing for Michael Maynard.

"I thought I was going to lose a lot of money and that's that," he said. But the extra money he gets from the government "is keeping me alive."

A Stampede Of Lobbyists Heads Toward The Budget (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, March 6, 2007

The farm lobby, higher-education advocates, veterans' organizations and a host of other groups are pressing their cases with budget committee staffers for increased funding as Democratic lawmakers look to release their spending blueprint as early as next week.

DOJ_NMG_0140894

The Veterans of Foreign Wars, for example, wants a $4 billion increase in funding for veterans' healthcare over last year's level. The request is likely to resonate at least somewhat this year in the wake of the Walter Reed scandal.

"If the Congress is going to send men and women into harm's way, it's their obligation to pay for their care," Dennis Cullinan, the group's legislative director, said.

Hospital groups, doctors and other recipients of payments under Medicare and Medicaid are pushing to forestall any program cuts in an environment where Congress is under intense budget pressure.

The HMOs and other insurance plans such as Blue Cross Blue Shield are particularly worried after seeing their funding targeted over the last two years.

With the gaping budget deficit, such lobbying pleas may not work this year. Arguments to spend money on new initiatives are even more difficult with the reinstatement of pay-as-you-go.

Under pay-go rules, which were adopted by the House earlier this year and embraced by several committee chairmen in the Senate, any spending increase or tax cut must be deficit-neutral. So advocacy groups are trying to convince budget staffers that their causes should be exempted from pay-go. Others are coming hat in hand with suggestions for revenue offsets.

"It's tough right now. But we will continue our efforts to ask for an increase," Dana Brooks, who is overseeing the lobbying for the U.S. Farm Bureau on the farm bill, said. She believes any increase in agriculture spending merits waiving the pay-go rules.

In the pay-go environment, groups worry they might be targeted in the hunt for offsets. Companies that provide services under Medicare fear they will bear the brunt of any expansion to the State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP) when it is reauthorized this year.

"We're very supportive of SCHIP and making some sure all the kids that are covered under it get health-insurance services. But that shouldn't be done at the expense of Medicare beneficiaries," Erickson said.

A budget resolution is not binding. It merely suggests rather than dictates the amounts authorizing and appropriating committees can allocate to certain broad goals and programs. But it does cap the total amount of spending and revenue legislators have to work with without running afoul of budget rules.

More and more, groups lobbying on the budget realize that the top-line spending figure is more important than how the budget committee divvies it up, argued James Horney, a budget expert at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

"If the overall level isn't big enough, it's almost impossible for appropriators to make an increase," he said.

Some budget experts predict that the budget committees will try to wield more power over policy this year by creating a "deficit-neutral reserve fund." Used in previous years when Congress adhered to pay-go rules, the fund would provide money for spending increases — but only if legislators spend it on budget committee priorities and if they find a way to pay for it.

Yet all this assumes there will be a budget at all. On four occasions starting in 1998, Congress has failed to pass a budget resolution. Given the narrowly divided House, and especially the Senate, many lobbyists aren't holding their breath for an agreement this year. The Republican House barely passed its version last year, though it didn't come close to becoming law.

This week, lobbyists will also focus on the homeland-security legislation that is moving through the upper chamber. Sponsored by Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), the bill would implement many of the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

Discover America Partnership, a group that advocates reforms to make the United States more hospitable to tourists to advance foreign-policy goals, is pushing a number of amendments to the legislation. Among them are provisions to increase the number of Customs and Border Control agents in major airports and a "registered traveler program" with biometric and background screening that would allow the registrants to speed through customs and immigrations lines at airports.

"We're leading an aggressive effort to find things that can simultaneously strengthen security as well as fix the travel problems we've created these last five years," said Geoff Freeman, the group's executive director.

But the legislation may hinge on a provision to allow Transportation Security Administration (TSA) workers the right to organize into unions. Several Senate Republicans oppose the measure and Bush has threatened to veto the legislation if it is kept. The unions, led by the American Federation of Government Employees, are fighting tooth and nail to keep it in.

Lobbying Bill Sparks Populist Uprising -- On Both Sides (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

The National Right to Life Committee and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) are locking horns -- not over abortion, but over whether thousands of top executive branch officials should have to disclose the names of people who lobby them.

Driven by the over-the-top, clandestine lobbying of Bush administration officials by now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Waxman's House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform has unanimously approved the Executive Branch Reform

Act. A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said that she backs the measure, which would require senior bureaucrats to report quarterly whom they speak to about government actions, and that she expects it to get a vote in the House.

But Douglas Johnson, legislative director of the National Right to Life Committee, is vowing to stop the bill at all costs. He thinks it would discourage officials from meeting with citizens, including his own members. That makes it downright undemocratic. And he is consistent: He led a coalition that helped kill broad ethics reform legislation last year because it would have imposed a similar type of reporting requirement on grass-roots lobbying.

Grass-roots and executive-branch disclosure "are of a kind," Johnson said. "They both have as a purpose to insulate policymakers from ordinary citizens and citizen groups in order to enhance the influence of certain inside-the-Beltway elites." He points out, for example, that communications from lawmakers and other elected officials would not be disclosed under the Waxman proposal.

Johnson is recruiting activists and has lined up the Family Research Council and Concerned Women for America (CWA) as allies. "We believe this bill poses a tremendous threat to any American who wants to communicate with a member of the executive branch," said Shari Rendall, a lobbyist for the conservative CWA. "The burdens of this bill are onerous on government officials and intimidating to the public."

The legislation's advocates are also preparing to fight and they hope eventually to expand reporting to include lobbyists' meetings with lawmakers. Liberal watchdog groups such as Public Citizen, Common Cause and Democracy 21 yearn to give the public a clearer picture of who asks what from government officials all over the nation's capital.

But for now they are content to start with the executive branch. "It's not a burdensome reporting requirement, and it is important information for the public to know," said Craig Holman, lobbyist for Public Citizen's Congress Watch.

Johnson and his allies are just as determined and are trying to spark protests nationwide with e-mail such as this: "Waxman wants to sell his bill as an expansion of 'government in the sunshine,' [but it's really] a tanning salon: a structure in which executive branch officials would be isolated from the real world and then exposed to intense, artificial and unhealthy radiation generated by privileged inside players such as himself."A Peek Into Corporate America

Not waiting for Congress to impose new disclosure laws, shareholder activists have persuaded some of the nation's largest companies to disclose their political spending on such things as issue campaigns. General Electric, Hewlett-Packard and American Electric Power recently agreed to report how much they give trade associations for politics and lobbying. Home Depot said it would report "soft money" gifts such as corporate donations to political advocacy groups.

The decision was announced by the Center for Political Accountability, Trillium Asset Management and Green Century Capital Management. The four companies join 15 other major corporations that have adopted increased transparency policies since 2005.

Separately, Aegon USA, a financial services firm, has begun to list on its campaign finance reports the events at which it gives money to politicians, a disclosure not required by law. It said its $5,000 donation to the leadership fund of Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.) was made during a "ski weekend." Anyone see a trend?Government Client? Not So Fast

Qorvis Communications, a fast-growing D.C. PR shop, is still waiting for the $3 million, or 13 percent of its revenue, that Saudi Arabia owes it from last year. But Qorvis managing partner Michael J. Petruzzello said he is confident that the payment will show up soon, now that the Saudis have a new U.S. ambassador, Adel al-Jubeir.

"I'm not at all concerned," Petruzzello said. "It will all be resolved imminently." Then again, delays are common when countries are involved. "This is not the last time that they or any of my government accounts have been late," he added. "That's what happens when you work with governments."Lobby for Money? Not Me

Last week, former attorney general John D . Ashcroft blasted Sirius Satellite Radio's proposed acquisition of XM Satellite Radio Holdings on antitrust grounds. He is a consultant, no surprise, to the merger's main opponent, the National Association of Broadcasters.

Thing is, XM says that Ashcroft's office also approached it to see if it would hire him to help with the merger fight, but the company turned him down. XM accuses Ashcroft of "parroting" NAB's views for money, a charge Ashcroft and NAB deny.

Separately, former senator Alfonse D'Amato (R-N.Y.) says he has acted out of "passion" to accept the chairmanship of the Poker Players Alliance, an organization of 160,000 gambling enthusiasts that wants to reverse a law banning online poker.Ex-Top-Aide Hires of the Week

Dutko Worldwide has hired Judy Lemons, a former chief of staff to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), and Andy Wright, former chief of staff to Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.). The Watts Consulting Group of former congressman J.C. Watts (R-Okla.) has added Steve Pruitt, once the top Democratic aide at the House Budget Committee.

Public Strategies Inc. has hired Lee Godown, former chief of staff to Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.). Joshua F. Hurvitz, former legislative director for Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.), has joined American Continental Group. And ML Strategies, the consulting affiliate of law firm Mintz, Levin, Cohn, Ferris, Glovsky and Popeo, has hired Jeremy Rabinovitz, former chief of staff to Rep. Lois Capps (D-Calif.).

David E. Yudin, former director of the city of Chicago's Washington office and more recently legislative counsel to Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), has joined B&D Consulting as a senior adviser.

Brad Woodhouse, a longtime political operative with strong ties to liberal causes, was named president of Americans United for Change, replacing Karen Olick, a former chief of staff to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.). Olick joined the media and communications firm Squier Knapp Dunn.

Apparently thinking ahead, XM Satellite Radio last summer hired as a senior vice president Jeff Blattner, who was chief counsel on the Senate Judiciary Committee staff of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and also helped run the Justice Department's antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft in the 1990s. XM is involved in a huge antitrust effort to win government approval to merge with Sirius Satellite Radio.

And on the GOP side, Dan Meyer of the Duberstein Group, a top aide to former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), will replace Brian Conklin as the White House's chief lobbyist in the House.

Caucus Embroiled In Leadership Dispute (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, March 6, 2007

Members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus scheduled a special meeting Tuesday to try to resolve an embarrassing leadership dispute that led one lawmaker to quit the group.

Among the options is a power-sharing arrangement that would dilute the authority of the caucus' controversial chairman, Rep. Joe Baca, D-Calif.

So far, Baca has resisted any changes to the caucus' power structure, according to caucus members and staff. Baca is under fire from female lawmakers, including fellow California Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, who quit the 21-member, all-Democratic group after accusing Baca of calling her a "whore."

Baca denies that. A meeting last Thursday broke up without resolution or a vote, and afterward Baca insisted that he was still in charge and that he was focusing on the future.

"I'm still the chair. ... I was elected in a Democratic process," Baca said. "We've got a lot of high priorities and we need to stay focused."

Sanchez has said she'll rejoin the group only if Baca is out as chair, and other members haven't ruled out quitting. Baca was supported by only one of six women in the caucus when he was elected chairman in November, and Sanchez, her sister Rep. Linda Sanchez, and two others subsequently contested the election procedure and asked for a new secret-ballot vote.

Female caucus members have complained of being ignored and disrespected.

In another episode a year ago, six caucus members — including Loretta and Linda Sanchez — cut ties to the group's campaign arm after it helped finance the unsuccessful campaigns of Baca's two sons for seats in the California Legislature.

Baca defended the decision to give money to them and other nonfederal candidates, saying the caucus should seek to build a farm team. Opponents said the focus instead should be on electing Latino House members.

McConnell Helps Save GOP's Agenda - But Risks Its Future (POL)

By Carrie Budoff

The Politico, March 6, 2007

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell returned to the Senate in January with a conference slashed in size and chastened by voters. Neither the Republican president nor the Democratic-controlled Congress had much use for him. Colleagues whispered that the senator, with all the pizzazz of plain oatmeal, was terrible on television.

Two months later, though, McConnell has managed to make the Republican stance on Iraq -- oppose a rebuke of the president while pressing for continued war funding -- look downright vogue. In the process, even skeptics have acknowledged that McConnell knows how to work a chamber.

Not with everyone.

"McConnell is in fact a combination of the worst of all worlds -- the arrogance of Bush, the social conservatism and lunacy of Rick Santorum, the hypocrisy of Mark Foley, the corruption of Tom DeLay," Matt Stoller, a Washington-based Democratic consultant, wrote on the liberal blog MyDD.

DOJ_NMG_0140897

As the Kentucky Republican defends his party -- and President Bush -- like a Cub Scout den mother, he's threading the needle between a conference in need of an opposition identity and a public mood divided on the position he has staked out. Insiders admire his tactical maneuvers on Iraq, but could he lose the broader public relations battle outside of Washington?

"They have a potential double whammy," said Norm Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "They could ultimately be portrayed as obstructionists, and obstructionists in favor of a policy that deteriorates anyhow."

The competing agendas underscore the conflict between his leadership role and his style. He's the face of the Senate GOP, but aides have to nudge him to show it more on television. He's a backroom operator in a need-to-know-everything political age. He's the congressional Republican backstop at a time when voters say they want action.

The source of his highest praise -- and sharpest critiques -- stems from what he's stalled: a resolution opposing Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops into Iraq.

The left issued a call to arms last week against the four-term incumbent, who's up for reelection next year.

"It's time to do to Mitch McConnell what the GOP did to Tom Daschle -- make him the symbol of everything that is wrong and get rid of him in a presidential year," wrote Stoller.

With appraisals like that, this prim politician, whose flashiest attribute might be his pinstriped suits, morphed into the silver lining of an otherwise dark year for Republicans.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee reported a slight swell in fundraising. And on Friday, Bush's appearance with McConnell in Louisville, Ky., raised $2.1 million for GOP candidates.

"For the first time in a long while," William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard, wrote in Time magazine, McConnell's performance has "given Republicans a congressional leader worth rooting for."

Kristol's statement could be viewed as a subtle jab at McConnell's predecessor, Sen. Bill Frist, the Tennessee Republican who rose to majority leader after only eight years in the Senate and always had his eye on the presidency. McConnell has no designs on higher office, a departure from several of his recent predecessors in both parties, including Frist, former Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) and former Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.).

Moreover, political observers say McConnell brings a legislative know-how to the job that Frist lacked, earning him loyalty in his conference -- and because of that, greater negotiating power with the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

"The Senate is built for defense. The House is built for offense," McConnell said in a Politico interview. "The minority is never irrelevant in the Senate, particularly at 49" members.

McConnell has handled his minority leadership "exactly as Senator Reid expected," said majority leader's spokesman, Jim Manley.

"Senator McConnell is a fierce partisan," Manley said. "He is someone who knows the rules of the Senate and is prepared to use them."

A month ago, the reviews weren't so glowing.

Republican aides arrived at the Capitol Feb. 6 in a tizzy. The GOP was taking a pounding in the headlines. Voters across the country were hearing one message: Republicans defied the will of the American people. They obstructed a debate on Iraq.

A day earlier, McConnell had won the battle inside the Capitol by lining up his conference against a Democratic Iraq resolution. It was a testament to his tactical skills, but raised concerns about his style.

Was his workmanlike persona better suited for the 7 a.m.-to-11 p.m. media cycle of the 1980s?

Aides quickly regrouped, by conference call and in person. "Do we give up? Do we keep talking about it?" asked McConnell's communications director, Don Stewart.

Within hours, the edict was issued. No more talk about the process. Talk only about funding the troops -- and that's all they did.

"I'm not here to talk about the process," McConnell said at one point, trying to shoo reporters off the procedural maneuverings that aides say he revels in.

Reid balked at side-by-side votes -- one on the Democratic resolution opposing the troop surge and one on the Republican resolution pledging to continue funding the war. But McConnell held firm, insisting that the GOP plan receive a vote.

Eventually, the story line shifted to "Democrats in disarray" as they struggled to craft a resolution that could make it by McConnell's minority.

"His strength is how much he listens to colleagues and is able to develop solutions that benefit them," said Ken Mehlman, the former Republican National Committee chairman who managed Bush's 2004 campaign.

The debate was the first major test of McConnell's commitment at the outset of his term to "a restoration of civility and common purpose" in the Senate -- and of his relationship with Reid.

DOJ_NMG_0140898

Both lawyers and longtime legislators, the two leaders meet every Monday, one week in Reid's office, the next in McConnell's, where a National Gallery portrait of his hero, Henry Clay, watches over the proceedings. In between, they talk on the Senate floor.

"We have an understanding of what the institution is like, the rhythm and flow of the institution," McConnell said. "You tend not to get frustrated because of the little impasses that develop along the way. That is just the way the Senate has operated for 200 years. Snags develop and you sit down later and work it out and go on."

McConnell relies on a kitchen cabinet outside his deputy leaders. Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah), an old friend, joins the weekly leadership meetings. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) has acted as McConnell's legislative wingman, taking the lead so often on the floor debates that Reid described him last month as the "designated 'see-if-we-can-mess-up-the-legislation' guy this year."

McConnell's performance has inspired a certain level of assuredness in the ranks. By last week, as Reid announced that the Senate would hold off debating Iraq for another two weeks, Republicans were anxious for the showdown.

"My attitude is, 'Bring it on,'" said a senior Republican leadership aide. "Let's keep going here."

Embattled Abramoff Associate Lobs Charges of His Own at Ex

While he awaits sentencing for his role in the Jack Abramoff scandal, Michael Scanlon is fighting another court battle -- on the home front.

In papers filed in Montgomery County last fall, the former Tom DeLay staffer-turned-mega-lobbyist is suing his ex-wife for $2 million plus all the money in their son's educational trust, claiming she and her new husband spent funds meant for the 8-year-old boy.

In his suit (which he amended last week to include a conspiracy charge), Scanlon claims his ex, Carrie Anne Liipfert Messina, now living in Los Angeles, had him wire money to what was supposed to be a segregated fund but proved to be a joint account with her husband, Matthew Messina. Scanlon claims they withdrew money meant for young John Patrick's education to buy a condo at the Mammoth Lakes ski resort, timeshares in Orlando and Mexico, and concert tickets.

Intriguingly, Scanlon also claims that his ex-wife broke a 2003 "confidential agreement" the two reached on child support by sharing info about Scanlon's finances with unnamed "third parties." But what she allegedly disclosed, and to whom, is unclear: Messina's response and countersuit -- which court records indicate involve "breach of contract" claims, the same as he makes against her -- have been placed under seal.

So it's unclear whether any of this is entangled in the Abramoff fraud/public corruption mess. While an ex-fiancee of Scanlon's reportedly helped federal prosecutors build a case against him, some observers of the case doubt there would have been much incentive for Messina to leak to investigators. Both Scanlon's attorney and Messina's declined comment.HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

The Courage Cup polo war is heating up. Over the weekend, founder Greg Ball sent an e-mail to thousands of local fans advertising a charity polo match he calls the Courage Cup at Leesburg's Morven Park on May 12. But not so fast! Three directors of the group once allied with Ball quickly responded with an e-mail saying the official Courage Cup is slated for June 16 at Great Meadow Polo Club near Middleburg.

Since Ball left D.C. to become a New York state legislator, he and the new board have fought each other with dueling Web sites and bitter e-mails. Ball now contends that his cup is taking place in conjunction with America's Cup of Polo (England vs. United States). No way, said Charlie Muldoon, director of polo for the May 12 event.

Meanwhile, the chances of a friendly resolution are shrinking by the day. The new directors have washed their hands of Ball, saying in an open letter: "We will have nothing further to do with this person or his imaginary polo activity, either collectively or individually." In a letter on his Web site, Ball shot back, denouncing the "unauthorized and renegade outfit." Remember when polo was civilized?THIS JUST IN . . .

The Right To Organize (NYT)

There are many reasons for the long decline in the membership rolls for private sector unions, including powerful changes in the economy and the unions' past corruption scandals. And there is little doubt that federal rules and regulations for union organizing have also become increasingly hostile to labor, helping to drive unions' share of the work force down from a peak of 35 percent in the 1950s to a mere 7.4 percent today.

The House of Representatives passed a bill last week that would strengthen the rights of employees to form unions, and it drew an immediate veto threat from President Bush. But if Mr. Bush were, as he claims, truly concerned about rising income inequality and truly committed to improving the lives of America's middle class, he would support the legislation and urge the Senate to approve it.

The most significant change in the bill is known as a majority signup, which would allow employees at a company to unionize if a majority signed cards expressing their desire to do so. Under current law, an employer can reject the majority's signatures and insist on a secret ballot. But in a disturbingly high number of cases, the employer uses the time before the vote to pressure employees to rethink their decision to unionize.

The bill would also increase the penalty for employers who fired or otherwise discriminated illegally against pro-union employees. An employer currently found guilty of an illegal firing must pay back pay, minus whatever the fired employee might have earned at a new job — a fine so low as to be meaningless. And the bill would require binding arbitration if a newly formed union and company management were unable to agree on a first contract after 120 days. The refusal to bargain is among the most common allegations against employers in filings to the National Labor Relations Board.

Some employers, like Cingular Wireless and the health care provider Kaiser Permanente, have voluntarily embraced the practice of the majority signup. But many others, represented by interest groups like the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, remain rigidly opposed.

The bill's opponents charge that replacing secret ballots with the majority signup would be undemocratic. But the current system is by no means fair. The law prohibits union advocacy by employees during work hours and allows employers to ban organizers from the work place. But employers can require workers to attend anti-union presentations, and can discipline or fire those who refuse to attend.

In 2005, according to the most recent annual report of the National Labor Relations Board, 31,358 employees were receiving back pay after being discriminated against for their union-related activities. In research for a bipartisan Congressional commission in 2000, Kate Bronfenbrenner, a labor relations professor at Cornell University, reported that 25 percent of employers illegally fired at least one employee during organizing campaigns.

Labor unions have a role to play in helping to fix today's economic ills — most notably, worsening income inequality, a problem that's caused in part by unions' decline and the workers' resulting lack of bargaining power. What's needed is a Congressional drive to help Mr. Bush see this obvious connection. The Senate should take up the House bill promptly and send it to the president for his signature.

The No Child Left Behind education law is up for renewal this year, and an independent commission recently released some recommendations for improvement. Not to be outdone, the White House has also put out its own "blueprint" for strengthening the law. The legislation could use a serious reworking, but any fixes won't go far enough unless they do more to expand public and private school choice.

NCLB's political bargain was that, in return for a big increase in federal education spending, the government would hold schools more accountable for results in the classroom. Six years later, taxpayers have done their part. Since 2001 overall NCLB funding has risen by 34%, and federal spending on Title I schools serving low-income students has gone up 45%.

NCLB and the Bush Administration also deserve some credit for shifting the terms of the education debate. The law has focused attention on learning gaps between students of different races and economic backgrounds that persist even at some of the nation's best public schools. The law's requirement that schools test annually in grades 3-8, and report both averages and the results of racial and economic subgroups, has made it much more difficult for administrators to hide the fact that all students aren't learning.

NCLB has been much less successful in bringing pressure to bear on states and school districts that fail to implement the law. That's especially true of the school choice provisions, which are the best way to get the attention of the education bureaucracy. Unfortunately, the Bush Administration abandoned its voucher proposal very early in the 2001 negotiations. What passed was a watered-down version of public school choice, which in theory allows a child in a failing school to transfer to a better public school or get free after-school tutoring from private providers. * * *

In practice, however, the Education Department has too often allowed school districts to skirt even these limited choice provisions, either by granting exemptions or looking the other way. It took a formal complaint from the Alliance for School Choice before Secretary Margaret Spellings did anything about Los Angeles failing to notify parents of their transfer rights as required under the law. So far she's sent the district a sternly worded letter.

And the Chicago public school system, which has been repeatedly labeled "in need of improvement" and thus should be banned under NCLB from offering its own after-school tutoring, has been given a waiver to do exactly that. So while it would be nice if the Bush Administration enforced its own law, the larger lesson is that school choice "lite" turns out to be no substitute for the real thing.

To be fair, some of these problems are structural. Even if more school districts were implementing NCLB's transfer provisions, there often isn't enough room in decent schools to handle all the children who qualify for a transfer. And many of the private after-school tutoring services allowed under the law are simply employing the same teachers from the local public school system who are failing the kids during regular school hours.

There's also the problem of allowing each state to develop its own standards and tests to determine proficiency in reading and math. The Administration was deferring to federalist principles on an issue that's traditionally been handled at the state and local level. But the reality has been a "race to the bottom," with some states constructing easy tests to avoid federal penalties.

"If you're in Oklahoma right now, you're told that 95% or 96% of your schools are doing fine," says Frederick Hess, who follows education at the American Enterprise Institute. "And if you're in Massachusetts, you're told that 40% to 45% of your schools are doing fine. But if you look at the actual achievement data, it suggests that kids in Massachusetts are doing far better than kids in Oklahoma."

Some education reformers are now calling for "national standards" to address this problem. But we tried national history standards in the 1990s, and the politicized results weren't pretty -- unless, of course, you favor a history curriculum that downgrades the Founding Fathers while playing up the working experiences of midwives in 19th-century Nebraska.

Rather than force a national test on states, the best compromise here may be to require them to benchmark their own assessments against the National Assessment of Education Progress (NAEP), a federal standardized test that already exists and that most educators agree is fairly rigorous. "So people at least have a common metric by which to judge the rigor of the state assessment," says Mr. Hess.

It's worth considering, and we wish we could say the same about the Commission on No Child Left Behind, which was funded by private foundations and co-chaired by former Governors Tommy Thompson and Roy Barnes. But the panel's report is more interested in tinkering than fundamental change, and its 75 recommendations don't include the one that would make the biggest difference: school vouchers. * * *

The Administration's proposed fixes are bolder and potentially more consequential. President Bush's 2008 budget sets aside $250 million for "promise scholarships" for low-income students in schools that have consistently underperformed for five years. The scholarships would average about $4,000 and "the money would follow the child to the public, charter or private school of his or her choice."

Them's fightin' words for the Democrats who now control Congress. But Mr. Bush has the bully pulpit, as well as the moral authority from five years of evidence on failing schools. We hope his Administration uses them to explain why real school choice is essential to any reform in K-12 education.

Stocks Decline As Weakness In Asia Trumps Other News (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

DOJ_NMG_0140901

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

A big drop in oil prices didn't stanch the bloodletting in the stock market.

As was the case last week, weakness in overseas markets, especially Asia, trumped any shreds of good news elsewhere. Signs of so-so growth in the U.S. service sector didn't help matters.

"All the things that [investors have] been talking about are not going away," said Michael Mainwald, head trader at Lek Securities Inc., a New York brokerage. "If anything, they're just getting bigger and bigger."

The Dow Jones Industrial Average opened lower, seesawed in and out of positive territory throughout the day, then suffered a late round of selling to end lower for the third straight day. It finished off 63.69 points, or 0.5%, at 12050.41, down 3.3% on the year. Since last Tuesday, when the blue-chip average had a headline-grabbing one-day plunge, it is now off 4.6%.

On a day when it celebrated its 50th anniversary, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.9%, or 13.05 points, to 1374.12, off 3.1% on the year. Still, the broad measure has now risen to nearly 31 times its initial close of 44.42 on March 5, 1957.

The Institute of Supply Management said its nonmanufacturing index, a broad measure of service-sector activity in the U.S., fell to 54.3 last month. That level indicates that the service sector is still growing, but was below both January's reading of 59 and Wall Street's consensus expectation for 57.5.

Concerns that demand could slow pushed crude futures contracts for April delivery sharply lower, off $1.57 to $60.07 a barrel, down 2.5% for the day and 1.6% for the year on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Such declines usually help stocks, since investors figure that lower energy prices will lead to more consumer spending and boost corporate profits. Yesterday's session was an exception, as economic fears held back both stocks and energy, said Raymond Carbone, president of Paramount Options, a brokerage firm active on Nymex's floor.

"What we're seeing is fear of a global slowdown," which could lead to less robust consumption of fuel in the U.S., said Mr. Carbone.

Technology shares, which most investors believe are riskier during periods of slow economic growth, were especially weak. The Nasdaq Composite Index shed 1.2%, or 27.32 points, to end at 2340.68, off 3.1% on the year.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 2.3%, or 5.64 points, to 237.47. Major stock indexes fell in Tokyo and Hong Kong.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks declined1 and bond prices fell2. The 10-year note fell 1/32 point, or 31.25 cents for each $1,000 invested, lifting its yield to 4.518%. The 30-year bond fell 2/32 to yield 4.654%.

The dollar was mixed3. The dollar fell to 115.83 yen from 116.85 yen. The euro fell to $1.3093 from $1.3194.

Unsteady U.S. Markets Take Another Hit (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Money flowed out of global stock markets again Monday as fears of a coming economic slowdown continued to discourage investors around the world.

Following another brutal showing for Asian markets and a choppy day in Europe, U.S. stocks fluctuated Monday before ending with their eighth loss out of the past nine trading sessions. The Dow Jones industrials fell 64 points to 12,050, which left the blue-chip barometer 736 points below its record close on Feb. 20 and at its lowest level since the beginning of November.

That 5.8% slide in the Dow is shy of the 10% drop that defines an "official" correction and is less than some emerging markets have dropped in a single day. But the damage runs far deeper in some sectors on Wall Street, showing the velocity at which U.S. investors are fleeing riskier asset classes such as:

·Subprime mortgage lenders. Investors are hammering companies that gave loans now proving to be problematic to consumers with questionable credit. New Century Financial collapsed $10.09, or 69%, to $4.56 Monday after the industry leader's warning last week that its losses from bad loans have widened, its accounting is being investigated and its survival depends on the large investment banks that lend it money. Scott Valentin of Friedman Billings Ramsey says it's quite possible some subprime lenders will fail.

Investors are bailing out of all subprime lenders and even some diversified mortgage lenders, says Chris Brendler of Stifel Nicolaus. The worries have bled further in the financial ecosystem, infecting shares of real estate investment trusts and investment banks such as Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley, which provide cash to subprime lenders. There are even concerns the subprime industry's problems eventually could hurt the broader financial system.

·Tech and biotech. Suddenly investors want little to do with these traditionally volatile sectors. Networking-gear makers Ciena and PMC-Sierra and biotech Celgene are among the worst performers in the Standard & Poor's 500, down 17%, 15% and

12% since the market cracked last Tuesday and investors scrambled for safety. "Tech is thought to require a firm economy to do well. That's an open question now," says David Joy at RiverSource Investments.

·Turnaround plays. Circuit City and General Motors, companies in the midst of fixing themselves, have been punished, falling 13% and 10% in the past week. Investors now prefer more stable companies, which in some cases are also less expensive, Joy says.

The flight from risk is likely to continue as long as investors, unlike just a few weeks ago, are skeptical of rosy economic forecasts. "Positive statements by economists do not have credibility with some investors," S&P's Sam Stovall says. "It's total uncertainty."

U.S. Stocks Drop As Investors Avert Risk (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton And Tom Petruno

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

Done in by another late-day swoon, U.S. stocks dropped again today as investors continued to dump the type of risky issues they had embraced so strongly last year.

Though most broad-market indexes slid, the worst losses occurred in the financial and housing sectors and among small-company stocks.

Shares of some Southern California-based sub-prime mortgage lenders -- including New Century Financial -- were hammered relentlessly as investors bailed out, fearing that the industry's collapse will worsen.

The blue-chip Dow Jones industrial average fell 63.69 points, or 0.5%, to 12,050.41. The Dow had rallied at the outset of trading but couldn't hold its gains.

Still, big-name stocks were a haven relative to the rest of the market.

The Russell 2,000 small-stock index slid 2% to 760.06, bringing its loss for the last five trading sessions to 7.7%.

The Standard & Poor's mid-size stock index fell 1.8%.

The technology-heavy Nasdaq composite dropped 27.32 points, or 1.2%, to 2,340.68.

Losers swamped winners by nearly 5 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Wall Street's struggle today followed another sharp decline in Asian markets overnight. Japan's Nikkei index fell 3.3%. The Shanghai composite index dropped 1.6%.

Emerging markets in general were broadly lower. The Mexican market gave up 2%.

The market's slump began a week ago with a sharp sell-off in Chinese shares that reverberated worldwide. China's slide caused concerns that had been simmering in the United States to boil over -- specifically, fear that the U.S. economy was at risk of falling into recession this year instead of experiencing a so-called soft landing.

The Dow plummeted 416 points, or 3.3%, on Feb. 27, its worst loss in nearly four years. It has been mostly downhill for markets worldwide since then.

"What we have had is a big change in psychology from [investors] not worrying about anything to looking for things to worry about," said Phil Roth, chief technical market analyst at brokerage Miller Tabak & Co. in New York.

The housing market has figured prominently in those new worries, amid rising defaults by sub-prime borrowers -- those with poor credit histories or no credit histories.

Irvine-based sub-prime lender New Century Financial Corp. dived $10.09 to $4.56 today after its disclosure late Friday of a federal criminal probe into its accounting.

Another sub-prime giant, Countrywide Financial, fell $1.82 to $35.20. Impac Mortgage of Newport Beach dropped $1.91 to $4.05.

Anything real estate-related was targeted by sellers today. The Bloomberg News index of real estate investment trust shares sank 3.7%, its worst one-day loss in the last five sessions.

Despite losses over the last week, key stock indexes are down relatively modestly, by historical standards.

The S&P 500 index, which fell 0.9% today, is down 5.9% from its six-year high reached Feb. 20.

A garden-variety "correction" in a bull market would be a drop of 10% to 15%.

Nonetheless, the selling has amplified fears in financial markets that the economy was weakening more than had been expected under the soft-landing scenario.

"You can say it's just a nasty correction or the start of a bear market," said Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors in Albany, N.Y. "Either way, the stock and bond markets are sending a strong and unambiguous signal that something may have gone wrong for the economy."

In other markets today, the dollar fell further against the yen, to 115.42 from 116.75 on Friday, as speculators continued to unwind their trades of borrowing in Japan to buy high-risk assets elsewhere.

Stocks Fall Further, Mirroring Europe, Asia (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Stocks faltered again yesterday during a global equities sell-off and as concerns mounted about the health of a high-risk part of the home mortgage industry.

Each of the major indicators added to their losses of last week, the worst in several years. The Dow Jones industrial average shed 63.69, or 0.53 percent, to close at 12,050.41. The tech-heavy Nasdaq dropped 27.32, or 1.15 percent, to 2340.68. The broader S&P 500-stock index fell 13.05, or 0.94 percent, to 1374.12.

"I don't think it's the bottom. You've got earnings growth decelerating and no Fed easing in sight," said Jeff Schappe, chief investment officer at BB&T Asset Management, referring to the Federal Reserve's position on interest rates. "So the market is having trouble hanging its hat on something good."

Overnight selling in Asia and Europe appeared to set the tone for U.S. exchanges. The Dow dropped more than 70 points in early trading. The average bounced in and out of negative territory throughout the day as investors took their profits, shopped for bargains or bought safer equities and bonds.

Japan's Nikkei index lost 3.3 percent of its value yesterday, falling 575 points. It recovered slightly in early trading today. Declines were led by exporters, whose overseas profits are being eaten by the rallying yen. It was the fifth consecutive day of losses for the Nikkei since Chinese stocks fell almost 9 percent Feb. 27. The Shanghai index dropped 1.6 percent yesterday. Hong Kong's Hang Seng index posted a 4 percent loss.

The picture was similar in Europe, where worries about weakness in the U.S. mortgage business and the strong Japanese yen lingered. Britain's FTSE 100 lost 0.9 percent, and Germany's DAX index fell 1 percent.

The yen rose 1 percent to hit a three-month high against the dollar. It was trading at about 115.5 to the dollar yesterday, up more than 4 percent in less than a week. The yen gained 2 percent against the British pound.

Analysts are keeping a sharp eye on the yen because of concerns about an unwinding of what's known as the carry trade, which refers to the process in which people borrow in currencies with low interest rates, such as the yen, and invest those assets elsewhere. The rising yen suggests that investors are pulling out of those investments and putting their money, for safety reasons, back into the Japanese currency. This movement could hurt the availability of capital worldwide.

Fresh signs of trouble surfaced in the part of the U.S. mortgage industry known as subprime, further weighing down the market. New Century Financial, which issues the risky, subprime home loans to borrowers with questionable credit records, said late Friday that it was the subject of a criminal investigation into securities trading and warned it may violate loan agreements with its financial backers. Its shares dropped yesterday by $10.09, or 69 percent, to close at $4.56.

David G. Dietze, president and chief investment strategist of Point View Financial Services, said "carnage" in subprime markets had made investors wary of the financial service stocks, which make up roughly a quarter of the S&P 500.

"People are looking at some of the financial services companies and asking, 'To what extent could they be left holding the bag?' " he said, adding that all major banks have some exposure to subprime loans.Movers

Palm dropped $1.80, or nearly 10 percent, to $16.50, wiping out its rally on Friday after speculation that Nokia might buy it.

Fremont General, a subprime lender, lost $2.82, or 32 percent, to $5.89, after saying it would sell its subprime loan business.

Alcoa dropped 97 cents, almost 3 percent, to $31.73.

Shares Continue To Sink, From Hong Kong To New York (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters And Heather Timmons

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

The fallout from last week's global stock dive showed few signs of letting up yesterday, as markets from Hong Kong to New York deepened their losses.

Share prices in the United States fell for the eighth time in the last nine trading days. The combined losses have wiped out more than 5 percent of the American market's value.

Wall Street started the morning in the red, then bobbed in and out of positive territory. At first, investors appeared moved to sell by a report showing that business activity in the service industry fell to the lowest level in almost four years. But those losses were later reversed, and for much of the day it looked as if stock prices would finish the day with some moderate gains.

DOJ_NMG_0140904

But in the final half-hour, prices dropped sharply. The Dow Jones industrial average lost 63.69 points, or about 0.5 percent, to close at 12,050.41. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fared even worse, losing 13.05 points, or about 1 percent, to close at 1,374.12.

The Nasdaq composite fell 27.32, about 1.2 percent, to 2,340.68. The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies dropped 15.38, or nearly 2 percent, to 760.06.

Another big sell-off in Asia overnight and more modest declines in European markets later in the day preceded the downturn in the United States. The Nikkei fell for the fifth consecutive session to close down 3.3 percent; Hong Kong's Hang Seng index fell 4 percent; and the Shanghai composite index fell 1.6 percent. In Britain, the FTSE 100 dropped 0.94 percent, in Germany the DAX index fell 1.04 percent, and in France the CAC-40 declined 0.73 percent.

Analysts in Europe said that the sell-off of assets considered risky was likely to continue for some days. But they said that the decline was probably not a sign of a recession and that it was unlikely to set one off.

In the United States, analysts said that a government report on productivity and labor costs due out today could accelerate losses. The report is expected to show that productivity did not advance as rapidly as first thought and that businesses spent more on employee compensation than first reported.

Tim Bond, head of asset allocation strategy for Barclays Capital, said in a research report yesterday that news about the strength of the United States economy would weigh on stocks in the coming weeks. "We should expect underperfomance of both U.S. stocks and bonds over the next several months, at least in the absence of a surprising recovery in productivity growth."

Others echoed that sentiment. "There is a genuine fear that the correction will be more than 10 percent globally for the developed markets," said Michael Hughes, chief investment officer at Baring Asset Management in London. "We had such a good run that there is a sense that money has been made too easily."

Still, some analysts say they believe the damage will be limited. "This is the way that corrections work," said Garry Evans, a strategist with HSBC in Hong Kong. "A week ago, everyone was very excited about the markets and now no one wants to buy stocks."

The declines extended a downward trend that began last Tuesday when the Shanghai stock market dropped nearly 9 percent. Many economists and strategists predicted that volatility could increase sharply in Asian markets as investors pull back from speculative investments and redirect assets to more mature markets, and as other investors look for buying opportunities.

This flight from risky assets has become particularly evident in currency markets. The Japanese yen, which rose again yesterday against the dollar, has been strengthening even as other Asian currencies have declined because many investors are unwinding some of their transactions, called "carry trades."

In this trading strategy, hedge funds and other investors have been borrowing yen at low interest rates and then converting them into other currencies to buy stocks in markets with higher returns, like Australia, Malaysia, Indonesia and the Philippines. But they are now reversing many of these trades.

The retreat of investors from carry trades is now accelerating regional declines, analysts said. The more the yen rises, the more expensive it becomes for carry traders to pay off their Japanese debt. As they try to sell their holdings faster, they feed a cycle of rising yen and more selling.

Banking stocks have suffered as profit at financial institutions took a hit on bad loans, especially in the American mortgage market. But bonds have still performed well. "If bond markets stop performing well, then it is more difficult for equity markets to recover," Mr. Hughes said.

The benchmark 10-year Treasury bond rose 1/32 yesterday to 101. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, fell to 4.49 percent, from 4.50 percent.

Economists in Asia maintain that the outlook for the region's economies remains sound. Many are comparing it with the sell-off in emerging markets last May, a fall that had been mostly reversed by October.

Some countries published positive economic data yesterday, including strong capital expenditure figures in Japan, and positive news about pension funds in Taiwan.

In the United States, investors await this week's employment report from the Labor Department, which will shed some light on the economy's current strength.

Following are the results of yesterday's Treasury auction of three- and six-month bills:

Fed Governor Says Market Discipline Working Well (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Financial markets are "functioning well amid higher volatility" while "overall liquidity does not appear to be in short supply", the Federal Reserve governor Kevin Warsh said on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0140905

Mr Warsh, who acts informally as a point of contact between the Washington-based Fed governors and Wall Street, said market discipine “appears to be effective, as investors are reviewing their positions”.

He added: “Solid fundamentals may help to ease any changes in liquidity should they occur.”

His comments suggest the Fed is confident that recent market turmoil will not have drastic -consequences, and may even be beneficial in the long run by reminding investors of the need to pay an adequate price for risk.

Mr Warsh’s remarks came in a speech in which he suggested that in the modern financial system, liquidity should be thought of primarily in terms of investor confidence.

He said liquidity conditions “can be assessed through the risk premiums on financial assets and the magnitude of capital flows”. On this basis, he said, “it would be hard to conclude that monetary policy has been restrictive” in recent quarters.

While most of the speech did not refer directly to recent market developments, Mr Warsh noted: “If unmoored from fundamentals, confidence can give way to complacency, complacency can undermine market discipline, and liquidity can falter unexpectedly.”

He said liquidity was “significantly higher than it would otherwise be due to the proliferation of financial products and innovation by financial providers.”

The threefold increase in the amount of interest rate swaps and options outstanding, plus the tenfold increase in the amount of credit default swaps over the past four years “allow investors to hedge and unwind positions easily without having to transact in cash markets”.

But Mr Warsh warned that while risk could be sliced up and distributed in ever more sophisticated ways, “even the most sophisticated financial products are not im-mune to the physical law of conservation of matter: the risk must rest somewhere”.

Liquidity in US markets was also underpinned by confidence in the US economy, and in particular, the reduction in macroeconomic volatility – the ups and downs of the business cycle. Finally, it was supported by international capital flows arising from “excess savings in some emerging market and oil-exporting countries”.

Mr Warsh said the US economy continued to de-mon-strate “extraordinary resilience” and this was “no doubt supported by the ability of financial markets to absorb substantial shocks” – such as the collapse of Amaranth hedge fund with losses of $6bn (€4.6bn, £3.1bn).

But he admitted that it was “hard to know with certainty when investors’ confidence will be stirred but not shaken by these events”.

Mr Warsh said super-abundant liquidity might also be distorting financial asset prices, including the slope of the yield curve, lessening the usefulness of these metrics as a guide to monetary policy.

Market Flux Doesn't Faze Bank Official (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Liquidity in financial markets isn't "in short supply" despite last week's market turmoil, a Federal Reserve official said.

Fed governor Kevin Warsh yesterday told the Institute of International Bankers in Washington that while "risk premiums"—the additional return an investor demands to hold a risky asset—"rose some last week, markets are functioning well...and overall liquidity does not appear to be in short supply." But he cautioned it is too soon for a "comprehensive" assessment.

Stocks world-wide fell sharply last week and yields on risk debt, such as bonds backed by subprime mortgages, rose sharply. Futures markets priced in a higher probability that the Fed would cut interest rates this year because of the Fed's history of easing monetary policy in response to disorderly market conditions, and because weaker stock prices and higher risk premiums often foreshadow economic weakness.

However, Fed officials have in the last week struck a sanguine tone, even arguing that periods of such volatility are healthy safeguards against investor complacency. That suggests little inclination as yet to cut rates.

Fed governor Randall Kroszner told a community bankers' meeting in Washington that "the outlook for the U.S. economy has not materially changed." Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis President William Poole said in Santiago, Chile, that it would be wise for the Fed not to respond to the trouble through its monetary policy "until you have a better idea of what's actually happening."

Mr. Warsh said by the standard of liquidity conditions in recent quarters, "it would be hard to conclude that monetary policy has been restrictive." He said liquidity has multiple definitions, but he defined it as investors' confidence in their ability to buy and sell with ease because they can quantify risks. In conditions like those of recent months, when investors believe the economic outlook is "benign" and more damaging possibilities remote or easy to measure, he said, liquidity is "plentiful."

While Mr. Warsh, a former investment banker, said investor overconfidence couldn't be "ruled out," he cited fundamental explanations for low risk premiums. The economy is less volatile, there are many new financial products for spreading risk and investors such as hedge funds to buy them, and emerging markets are sending excess savings to developed countries, he said. Even if there is a shakeout, risks will remain easier to disperse and hedge, he said.

US Service Sector Growth Slows (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott In New York

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

The US service sector saw a sharp drop off in activity last month, growing at its slowest rate since during the Iraq war in April 2003, according to data released on Monday.

The Institute for Supply Management said that its index of business activity for the services sector stood at 54.3, down 4.7 percentage points from January.

The report badly missed economists' forecasts of a level of 57.

New orders in the service sector were down 0.6 percentage points at 54.8. But figures on employment in service industries put a more positive gloss on the state of the economy as the index for non-manufacturing jobs rose 0.5 percentage points to 52.2.

The figures added to concerns surrounding the state of the US economy, but the markets did not react strongly when the data was released. Alan Greenspan, former chairman of the Fed, warned last week that a recession was "possible".

Other data released last week showing that the US economy grew less quickly than expected last quarter and that industrial investment slowed at the start of the year worried investors and contributed to the chill in global markets.

The service industries covered by the report make up around 80 per cent of the US economy and are the driver of economic growth as manufacturing faces ongoing weakness in housing, and the auto industry continues to ail.

Some analysts said that although the headline figure of the report was probably somewhat misleading, in the current market conditions it was still worrying.

Alan Ruskin, chief currency strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital, called the numbers "disappointing, but the breakdown is not nearly as poor as the headline would suggest. Both the employment index and orders data were fairly close to the prior months numbers."

But he said that the data would "only add to fears that the economy may be losing a little momentum, even allowing for the breakdown."

"The headline index is usually little more than a lagging indicator of the rate of growth of core retail sales," said Ian Sheperdson, chief US economist at High Frequency Economics. "Given the mood of the markets, however, and the uncertainty surrounding the economic outlook, the report does not look good."

Others warned that the data supported the view that the US economy was heading for slower growth this year.

"With the escalation of pressures on the financial services industry connected with problems in the sub-prime mortgage lending market, the services industries are expected to track in the slow to moderate growth range for several more months," said Brian Bethune, US economist at Global Insight. "For the economy as a whole, this points to "slow speed ahead" - with potentially rough seas and headwinds - in the first half of 2007."

Service Sector Likely Feels Housing's Pinch (WSJ)

By Conor Dougherty

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Business activity among service companies -- from freight haulers to mortgage bankers -- grew at a slower-than-expected pace in February, suggesting that weakness in housing and manufacturing is filtering into the broader economy.

The Institute for Supply Management, an Arizona-based group of purchasing managers, said its index of nonmanufacturing business activity fell to 54.3 in February from 59.0 in January. Any reading above 50 indicates growth in the sector; below 50 indicates contraction. The service sector makes up 80% of the U.S. economy.

Given the weakness in housing and manufacturing, economists had expected the service index to drop: If companies make fewer goods, that will mean less demand for shipping, and with people buying fewer homes it follows that demand for services such as loans and homeowner's insurance would also slow.

Though economists expected a decline, the drop was steeper than anticipated. "I thought it might take two or three months," for the index to fall as far as it did, said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist for consulting firm Global Insight. A large part of the decline was attributed to the financial-services industry, which fell to 49.5 -- representing a contraction -- from 59 in January.

Mr. Bethune attributed the sharpness of the decline to the recent pullback in subprime lending, or loans made to customers with shaky credit or high levels of debt.

"The speed with which [subprime lending] has become a major concern in the last month is something that definitely pushed the index down," he said. The nonmanufacturing index was also pulled down by industries that included construction and wholesale trade.

The report showed an easing in prices. In February, the ISM's index of prices paid by nonmanufacturing companies fell to 53.8 compared with 55.2 in January, meaning the cost of services such as commodities, labor and energy is increasing at a slower rate.

"It's a welcome fall. It indicates that there has been a reduction in pipeline inflationary pressures," said Richard Iley, U.S. economist at BNP Paribas.

While the overall index fell, some service sectors continued to chug along. Of the 18 industries that make up the ISM's nonmanufacturing index, nine showed growth as nine showed declines. Industries including education, health care and restaurants remained well in positive territory.

The ISM's nonmanufacturing new-orders index also fell, to 54.8 from 55.4, with the group's members reporting concerns about health-care costs and declines in the housing market. Stability in new orders is the main reason why Anthony Nieves, a supply-management executive at Hilton Hotels Corp. and author of the report, said he doesn't expect business activity to show big losses or gains next month. "This report overall is saying we're stabilizing a bit. We're getting to a level that is more middling."

Small Firm Tops Bernanke Logs (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone And Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A Who's Who of economists from Wall Street, academia, consulting and central banking scored coveted meetings with Ben Bernanke during his first months as Federal Reserve chairman.

Topping a list that included Wall Street heavyweights like Bear Stearns Cos. and Morgan Stanley, however, was a small St. Louis-based forecasting firm: Macroeconomic Advisers.

Former Fed Gov. Laurence Meyer and former Fed economist Brian Sack, both now with Macroeconomic Advisers' Washington office, enjoyed the greatest access to Mr. Bernanke among private-sector economists, the Fed chairman's visitor logs show.

The pair met with Mr. Bernanke three times last year, in March, August and September. Mr. Sack met with Mr. Bernanke an additional time in July, the logs showed.

Mr. Meyer co-founded Macroeconomic Advisers in the early 1980s as Laurence H. Meyer & Associates. While it isn't a household name, the firm carries considerable weight in investment and economic circles.

1 · See the list of economists arranging meetings with Bernanke.2

Mr. Bernanke's visits with economists and consultants aren't unusual. His predecessor, Alan Greenspan, met often with private-sector economists, including many of the same ones seeing Mr. Bernanke in recent months. Mr. Greenspan's visitor logs for 2004 and the first half of 2005 showed no meetings with Messrs. Meyer and Sack, however.

"Federal Reserve officials find it beneficial to hear perspectives on markets from a wide range of practitioners, academics, forecasters and other specialists," said Fed spokeswoman Michelle Smith.

Mr. Bernanke's visitor log was obtained by Dow Jones Newswires through a Freedom of Information Act request. It lists only the names of people cleared through security to meet with him specifically. He may have also met with other people who were cleared to meet with other Fed officials.

Since taking the helm at the Fed in February 2006, Mr. Bernanke has sat down with several Wall Street economists, including Richard Berner of Morgan Stanley, David Malpass of Bear Stearns and several members of the American Bankers Association's economic advisory panel.

Top academics on his visitor logs include: Martin Feldstein, head of the National Bureau for Economic Research; Princeton Prof. and former Fed Vice Chairman Alan Blinder, and C. Fred Bergsten of the Peterson Institute for International Economics.

Mr. Bernanke also has met with economic consultants such as Larry Lindsey, head of the Lindsey Group and former economic adviser to President Bush, David Hale of Hale Advisers, and Manuel Johnson and David Smick of Johnson Smick International. Mr. Johnson was vice chairman of the Fed in the late 1980s.

Other firms whose representatives met with Mr. Bernanke included Goldman Sachs Group Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, BP PLC and the hedge funds Brevan Howard Asset Management and Tudor Investment Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0140908

Asked about his visits to the Fed chairman, Macroeconomic Advisers' Mr. Sack said, "The Fed is often grappling with the same issues about the outlook that we are. ... We assess the economic outlook using an analytical approach that we believe is similar to that used by the Fed staff."

Under Mr. Bernanke, Fed policy is much less shrouded in secrecy than in the past.

EU Economy Is 20 Years Behind That Of US, Says Study (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

The European Union's economic development is only now reaching the level achieved by the US more than two decades ago, according to a study released yesterday.

The US reached the EU's current level of gross domestic product per capita in 1985, according to the report by Eurochambres, the pan-European business lobby.

The EU's employmentrate and level of investment in research and development were reached by the USin 1978, and its level of productivity (expressed in GDP per employed) was reached by the US in 1989, thereport said.

The conclusions suggest that despite last year's growth spurt and an acceleration of economic reforms, the EU is still far from matching America's economic clout.

It will make uncomfort-able reading for EU leaders at their economic summitin Brussels this week, a gathering that traditionally concludes with a call for further reforms to improve competitiveness.

The study illustrates the development gap between the two blocs by establishing how many years earlier the current set of EU indicators was attained in the US.

Compared with the first such report by Eurochambres published two years ago, it shows the time lag widened between 2003 and 2006.

The most drastic gap appears in R&D spending, where the time lag expanded from 23 to 28 years.

Though the deterioration can be explained in part by EU enlargement in 2004, when 10 less developed countries joined the bloc, it also reflects the fact that the US has extended its lead over Europe in many categories.

The study said: "Europe would need to register monstrous yearly performances to reach the current US levels by 2010."

It pointed out that in order to match the 2005 US level of R&D spending, the EU's expenditure would have to grow by almost 14 per cent every year until 2010.

For the EU to catch up with US GDP per capita by 2010, the bloc would require annual growth rates of more than 8 per cent.

Last year US GDP grew by 3.3 per cent, compared with an average growth rate of 2.9 per cent across the 25 EU member states.

The study warned: "The EU is progressing at an insufficient pace to really compete on the world stage."

From Obama, A Map For A New March (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

If you had to pick a winner in last weekend's Selma bake-off between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, it would have to be Obama. It is not just that he performed better than Hillary Clinton; it's that he had something very important to say to black America. It has to do, I think, with the extraordinary promise of his candidacy.

This is not an endorsement of Obama. At 45 years of age, questions about his youth, judgment and experience linger. We all have time to assess him on that score and glean -- and it will be no more than that -- whether, like Teddy Roosevelt (42), he is old enough for the presidency or, like Bill Clinton (46), he is still too young. For the moment, though, I wonder about something else: What impact will he have on America's abiding problems with race?

The cynic in me says that the answer is "not much." Yet the speech he gave commemorating the anniversary of the march by civil rights activists from Selma to Montgomery, Ala., is one that could not have been delivered by a white candidate, not even one with impeccable civil rights credentials such as Hillary Clinton has. Her speech was a recitation of Democratic Party cliches.

Not so Obama's. As Clinton did, he voiced the expected obeisance to Democratic Party shibboleths about school funding, health care, pensions and such, some of which matter, some of which don't. But then he turned to what clearly does matter: "discipline and fortitude . . . sometimes I feel like we've lost it a little bit."

There was a whole paragraph of text between the words "discipline and fortitude" and "we've lost it a little bit." Suffice it to say, it was an homage to the incredibly brave and, yes, disciplined civil rights activists of old -- ordinary people, most of them black, who practiced passive resistance. These were the young men and women -- "backs straight, eyes clear, suit and tie, sitting down at a lunch counter knowing somebody is going to spill milk on you" -- who subordinated their anger to something bigger: their cause. They made this country a much better place.

"But I'll tell you what," Obama went on. "Even as I fight on behalf of more education funding . . . I have to also say that if parents don't turn off the television set when the child comes home from school and make sure they sit down and do their homework and go talk to the teachers and find out how they're doing . . . I don't know who taught them that reading and writing and conjugating your verbs was something white."

Obama went on to urge blacks to couple their complaints with activism. "Put on your marching shoes," he said. "Go do some politics. Change this country!" That's what we need. And then he said, as he had to, that while there are too many children living in poverty -- and, of course, there are -- "don't tell me that it doesn't have a little to do with the fact that we got too many daddies not acting like daddies. Don't think that fatherhood ends at conception."

There is nothing particularly new about this message. You might call it warmed-over Bill Cosby or even an echo of Jesse Jackson. But Cosby is an entertainer and Jackson never stood any chance of getting to the White House. So the uniqueness is not the message; it is the refreshing combination of this particular man and what he is saying.

Will any of this matter? I can only hope so. After all, the problem no longer is widespread racism but the crushing effect that past racism has had on a particular group: young black men. A disproportionate number of them are in trouble -- and so, on that account, are we all. The statistics are appalling. Young black men are a teeny piece of the population, yet they are implicated in 25 percent of the nation's homicides and comprise 15 percent of all murder victims. Black men are more likely than white men to die of AIDS or, if you will, just plain die. Their life expectancy is more than six years shorter.

Would a black president make a difference? Hard to say. But a black president -- or, for the moment, a black presidential candidate of consequence -- permits others to say what needs to be said, and that is a step in the right direction. It's been 42 years, but maybe a new march is about to begin.

Clinton Opens Door To Gay Activists (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, March 6, 2007

Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton told the nation's leading gay rights group in an unpublicized speech that she wants a partnership with gays if elected president.

Clinton also said she opposes the "don't ask, don't tell" policy regarding gays in the military that was instituted during her husband's presidency.

"I am proud to stand by your side," Clinton said in a keynote speech Friday to the Human Rights Campaign. Neither Clinton's campaign nor her Senate office made any announcement that she would be making the Friday address.

Asked twice at a Monday campaign stop in Iowa why she did not publicize her speech to the group, Clinton said: "You'll have to ask my campaign."

In the speech, Clinton joked that she shares the same initials as the group, and pledged to maintain the same close working relationship that last year helped defeat the federal amendment which would have banned same-sex marriage.

"I want you to know that this is exactly the kind of partnership we will have when I am president," Clinton told the group. "I want you to know that just as you always have an open door to my Senate office, you will always have an open door to the White House and together we can continue this journey."

Clinton's husband Bill Clinton was president when the Pentagon instituted the "don't ask, don't tell" policy, which says gays may serve in the military only if they keep their sexual orientation private. In 1999, as she prepared to run for the Senate from New York, Clinton publicly opposed that policy.

Previous to Bill Clinton's administration, gays were flatly forbidden from serving in the military.

Sen. Clinton said it would be safer for the nation if openly gay soldiers, sailors, Marines, and airmen could wear the uniform.

"This policy doesn't just hurt gays and lesbians, it hurts all our troops and this to me is a matter of national security and we're going to fix it," Clinton said.

Her chief rivals for the Democratic nomination, John Edwards and Barack Obama, also favor repealing the policy.

She also criticized the Bush administration for making political appeals based on gay rights issues, vowing that her presidency would mark "the end of leadership that has politicized the most personal and intimate issues."

Human Rights Campaign vice president David Smith said Clinton's comments were "very well received," though he added the group is not endorsing any candidate and does not anticipate making an endorsement "anytime soon."

Clinton spokesman Blake Zeff said Monday the candidate "affirmed her desire to have a strong partnership with the community as president," adding they were "delighted" the speech was available on the Internet.

DOJ_NMG_0140910

Clinton aides said no announcement was made because the group's gathering is traditionally closed to the press. Video of the speech was posted on the group's Web site.

Smith said such annual board meetings have always been closed to the press, but it was the first time he could remember that a speech at such a meeting had been made public afterward.

"There's no contradiction," he said. "The event is always closed to the press and we wanted to make (the remarks) available for people to see."

Clinton spent Monday in Iowa, telling workers energy independence is critical to the country's future and similar to the U.S. fight against communism during the Cold War.

"Today we know that we have to move away from our dependence on foreign oil. Everyone says that," she said. "Our problem is figuring out how we would actually do it."

Clinton Plans Major Appeal To Women (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton will begin an ambitious effort on Tuesday to enlist thousands of women to play roles in her presidential campaign, hoping to build on the enthusiasm her candidacy has stirred among female voters at early campaign events.

Mrs. Clinton will announce the drive, which will unfold through March to coincide with Women's History Month, in a speech at the annual luncheon held by Emily's List, a political group favoring Democratic female candidates who support abortion rights that has already endorsed her.

The campaign intends to use social networking tools and other Web technology to develop a thousands-strong Women's Leadership Network, which would promote Mrs. Clinton's candidacy nationwide and, by this fall, hold campaign events and take part in fund-raising.

"When a woman has an important question, like who's a good doctor, they're more likely to talk to another woman," said Ann Lewis, a senior adviser to Mrs. Clinton. "If we can get a discussion going among women about the campaign, and Hillary as a candidate, it would be hugely important."

Clinton advisers are also devising campaign roles for prominent female supporters who made breakthroughs in their own fields, including the tennis champion Billie Jean King; Geraldine Ferraro, the vice-presidential nominee in 1984; and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Ms. Albright, for instance, recently joined former President Bill Clinton to help raise $1 million in a week for Mrs. Clinton, while Ms. Ferraro, a contributor on Fox News, recently told people there that she or another Clinton surrogate should appear whenever someone known to hold strong views against Mrs. Clinton is invited on air to talk politics.

Another component of the plan would provide a Web platform and networking tool to mothers and daughters to share stories that relate to the theme "I Can Be President." A children's poster contest on the theme is also being planned.

Clinton advisers said their outreach plan had been in the works since Mrs. Clinton's first trip to Iowa in January.

The advisers estimate that 60 percent of voters in the 2008 Democratic primary will be women, and their goal is to win at least twice as many female votes as any of Mrs. Clinton's rivals.

"I've joked that we should put up a big sign on the door that says '54 percent,' since women are 54 percent of the electorate," Ms. Lewis said.

Advisers to Mrs. Clinton say she does particularly well with young women, single women and mothers. At the same time, in interviews, some women in the Democratic Party have expressed concerns about Mrs. Clinton, like her ability to win a general election, her early support for the Iraq war and her proposed legislation to ban flag burning.

Ms. Ferraro said she believed that many women, including Clinton skeptics, would ultimately be impressed with Mrs. Clinton's gutsiness in enduring the scrutiny and attacks that could come along with being a "first."

Listening And Nodding, Clinton Shapes '08 Image (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton signs autographs meticulously, drawing out each line and curve of "H-i-l-l-a-r-y," "R-o-d-h-a-m" and "C-l-i-n-t-o-n." She leaves no stray lines or wayward marks.

"Hillary, over here, over here," called out a young woman from the mob that formed outside the Berlin Town Hall when Mrs. Clinton, Democrat of New York, arrived for a "conversation," in the parlance of the made-to-order intimacy of her presidential campaign. "Can you sign my Hillary sign, please?" the woman asked.

DOJ_NMG_0140911

Mrs. Clinton autographed the poster, carefully. It took a full seven or eight seconds, none of the two-second scribbles of other politicians. She is the diligent student who gets an A in penmanship, the woman in a hurry who still takes care to dot her i's.

To watch Mrs. Clinton up close during these "rollout" weeks of her presidential campaign is to see a familiar political figure try to reclaim her name.

"I'm Hillary Clinton, and I'm running for president," she says at campaign appearances. Lamenting that her public image has been distorted by caricature, she often says, "I may be the most famous person you don't really know." In the cliché of contemporary politics, Mrs. Clinton is "reintroducing herself to the American people."

She is, in this latest unveiling, the Nurturing Warrior. She displays a cozy acquaintance ("Let's chat") and leaderly confidence ("I'm in it to win it"). She is a tea-sipping girlfriend who vows to "deck" anyone who attacks her; a giggly mom who invokes old Girl Scout songs and refuses to apologize for voting for the Iraq War Resolution in 2002. Her aim, of course, is to show that she is tough enough to lead Americans in wartime but tender enough to understand their burdens.

Over the years, Mrs. Clinton has evolved through a series of female personas. Her outspoken feminism and perceived putdown of cookie-baking mothers provoked fierce criticism. She became the classic "woman wronged" after the Monica Lewinsky scandal.

As a Senate candidate in 2000, Mrs. Clinton embraced the role of an attentive "listener" as opposed to the power-hungry climber many had suspected. In the Senate, Mrs. Clinton has applied herself to winning over colleagues and becoming one of the boys.

In Mrs. Clinton's campaign now, her operative conceit is "the conversation." It is impossible to attend a Hillary-for-president event and forget you are joining a "conversation," instead of hearing a conventional political speech. Mrs. Clinton relentlessly repeats the catchword, and for those who missed it, there are huge "Let the Conversation Begin" signs on the wall.

After each presentation, Mrs. Clinton engages in a frenzy of 20-second conversations with the rhythmic efficiency of an assembly line.

"What kind of solar panels do you use?" she asked a woman in Berlin, a small city in the mountains of northern New Hampshire. "And do you sell to the grid?" Then she moved to the next person.

She contrasts the give-and-take of her chitchats — even though she does most of the talking — with what she suggests are the pig-headed pronouncements of a male bogeyman, George W. Bush. She rails against what she calls the "one-sided conversation" of Washington during the Bush years, bemoans President Bush's "stubbornness," speaks of her frustration at getting him to hear opposing views. She essentially portrays him as an exasperating husband who is beyond marriage counseling.

It is not easy, though, to humanize a juggernaut, which Mrs. Clinton's well-financed and hyperdisciplined campaign most certainly is. And it is difficult to appear authentic in tightly controlled settings, or conduct intimate conversations amid mobs of people, many wearing press credentials.

But the senator is trying hard. In appearances in Washington and around the country, Mrs. Clinton — Version 08, Nurturing Warrior, Presidential Candidate Model — is speaking more freely of her gender than she has in years. Her campaign knows that Democratic women are her most loyal supporters. Ann Lewis, a senior campaign aide, points out that women made up 54 percent of the electorate in 2004; Mrs. Clinton garnered 73 percent of female voters in her re-election campaign last year, compared with 61 percent of male voters, according to exit polls.

At a Capitol Hill ceremony in February to honor Sojourner Truth, the 19th-century slave turned abolitionist, Mrs. Clinton enveloped a series of women in hugs. She bestowed the "best-dressed and most-stylish" status on one guest and commented that an old, departed friend "has got one of those turbans on, showing that style all over Heaven."

Mrs. Clinton then looked to the ceiling and spread her hand wide over heart, performing a little side-to-side jig with her head.

She invoked Sojourner Truth's iconic quotation, "Ain't I a woman?" and added, "Well, I've been saying that a few times lately, too."

There were whoops, applause and shouts of "you go, girl" for Mrs. Clinton.

As she spoke, a press aide, Philippe Reines, held her purse.

The Listener

Mrs. Clinton is a prodigious nodder. She is always nodding, in an array of distinctive flavors: the stern, deferential nod (at a Senate news conference, when her colleague Evan Bayh described conditions in Afghanistan); the empathetic, lips-pursed nod (when a man in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, tells her about his son's epilepsy); the squinty, disbelieving nod (when a general testifies on Iraq before the Senate Armed Services Committee); the dutiful acknowledgment nod (when being applauded); and the blushing nod (when a veteran in Des Moines tells her "I think you look very nice").

When bored, Mrs. Clinton will occasionally fall into a far-off gaze before catching herself, defaulting to a nod.

DOJ_NMG_0140912

The nodding appears unconscious, but not always. She nodded through a news conference with New York lawmakers discussing medical care for Sept. 11 relief workers.

"Nine-eleven was an act of war," Representative Jerrold Nadler, Democrat of New York, said as Mrs. Clinton stood by, head bobbing.

"The villains aren't the terrorists," Mr. Nadler continued. "The villains live in the White House."

At which point Mrs. Clinton, perhaps sensing that the rhetoric had gotten too hot, stopped nodding.

Bill Clinton was also a great nodder, known for his "I-feel-your-pain" empathy and seeming ability to summon a misty-eyed visage on demand. He will pretty much hug anyone. His wife, who regularly invokes him on the campaign trial — "When Bill had his heart surgery," "Bill used to love Dunkin' Donuts," "Bill always reached out to other people who would be patient and listen" — can suffer by comparison. She keeps a more cautious distance, although when she does hug, she also tends to air-kiss (with a loud "mwwwwwahh").

The former president has a gift for the quick connection, making people feel special. Mrs. Clinton appears more interested in exchanging information. She is quick with questions ("When did you graduate?") and rejoinders ("You're the second person I've met from Park Ridge today!").

Numerous attendees seem to know people who went to college or law school with Mrs. Clinton, or used to live in Arkansas, or the Chicago suburbs, or who have a daughter named Chelsea.

She impresses them and others with her listening prowess.

"She connected with me much better than I expected she would," said Rachel Stuart, in Berlin. "She was right there. There was a real sense of her as a great listener."

Mrs. Clinton clearly likes that portrayal. In face-to-face campaign settings, she brings her head close in, appearing engaged. After the Berlin conversation, Mrs. Clinton stopped in for one of those "spontaneous" campaign drop-bys at a local cafe (thoroughly scoped out by advance-people and Secret Service agents). She sat at a corner table and chatted with a group of local reporters.

When cameras approached, Mrs. Clinton nodded intently and squinted hard, the look of a listener.

The Sister Act

"Conversation" audiences are predominantly female. At her events, Mrs. Clinton is more likely to call on women than men. She gets physically closer to women who approach her. She compliments their clothes and asks about their children.

She is proper and polite, diligent about thanking everybody, including "the janitor who got up at 5 a.m. to open the facility," at Berlin Town Hall, "Tea Birds for the delicious food," and "everyone in Berlin for making me feel so welcome."

In Keene, N.H., in February, Mrs. Clinton said she was so thankful to all of the people "who gave me confidence," not something that male politicians typically say. Nor do they worry aloud about gaining weight.

"I really don't understand why people hate her so much except that they don't like strong women," said the Rev. Eleanor McLaughlin, the rector at St. Barnabas' Episcopal Church in Berlin. "I get a lot of that myself."

Ms. McLaughlin taught at Wellesley College in the 1960s and remembers Mrs. Clinton as a firebrand undergraduate. A few feet away, the senator was between autographs. She popped a red lozenge into her mouth, took a sip of water and shouted out after someone for whom she just signed a copy of her book ("Young man, I have your pen!").

Her eyes bugged out when Ms. McLaughlin introduced herself. "Oh my God," Mrs. Clinton exclaimed.

Afterward, Ms. McLaughlin said: "It's great to be able to talk to her for a few seconds. To be able to say, 'You go, girl.' Wow."

The senator regularly mentions familiar female grievances. "I don't think I'm the only woman here who thinks you have to work harder," Mrs. Clinton said at a high school in Des Moines.

"I expect," she added with a sigh, "there'll be more stories about my clothes and hair than the other people running." That elicits scattered jeers.

The comedian Jon Stewart questions whether her "conversation" conceit will work with men. "I think the typical response would be 'Now?' " he joked recently on "The Daily Show," adding that Mrs. Clinton's new Iraq policy is "America, let's just pull over and ask for directions."

But she tries to connect with women by expressing her frustration with those men now in charge. In Berlin, she waves her hands in the air when discussing Mr. Bush's — and Vice President Dick Cheney's — seeming infatuation with invading Iraq from early on in their administration.

"I'm not a psychiatrist," she declared, "so I don't know all the reasons behind their concern, some would say obsession, with Saddam Hussein."

There is a larger lesson here, girls. "You've got to be willing to talk to bad people," she said. "Sometimes you just have to deal with people you don't agree with."

DOJ_NMG_0140913

She asked, "Have you ever tried to have a conversation with a difficult person?"

She nodded for emphasis, and many in the audience nodded back at her.

Tough Hostess

She cannot appear mushy. She drops in periodic tough-talk, glibly mentions the time "my husband bombed Iraq," or says she is willing to "shoot down" violators of a Darfur no-fly-zone. When asked in Des Moines how her campaign would differ from that of Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat and presidential nominee in 2004, she vows, "You can count on me to stand up and hold our ground and fight back."

Everywhere she goes, Mrs. Clinton is invited to apologize for her Iraq vote in 2002, but no dice. "There are no do-overs in life," she says. Tough self-love, in other words, implicitly chiding her girlie-men opponents for running around, saying they had made a mistake.

"I'm in the arena," she said in Concord, quoting Theodore Roosevelt, one of the enduring political alpha-males in American politics. She says so in the high, insistent pitch of a fed-up mom.

Her constant "I'm in to win" affirmations convey a calibrated confidence. She prefers the "when I'm president" construction to the humbler "If you elect me president" qualifier.

"I want to have universal health care by the end of my second term" she announced at an education event in Nevada in February.

She is not above trash talk. In Nashua, Mrs. Clinton boasted that the Republicans Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker; Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader; and Karl Rove, the president's adviser, had "privately" said "I am the one person they are most afraid of."

But there is also a discernible sense of nervousness at the conversations. Her aides are fiercely protective of her, as are many of her supporters.

The crowd booed reflexively, for instance, after Mrs. Clinton called on a man in Keene who promised that he would not ask her whether she wore boxers or briefs — as a young woman once famously asked Bill Clinton on MTV.

The joke fell predictably flat, and Mrs. Clinton smiled tightly amid more boos.

Her staff members hunch visibly and look up from their BlackBerries when audience members unfurl their questions, as if every conversation could be ruined at any moment by an unwelcome remark — about impeachment, Monica, Whitewater or some other unpleasantness. But in an odd way, Mrs. Clinton's unspoken vulnerability also enhances her ability to forge affinities.

"You have to feel bad for her after what she went through with her husband, you know?" said Bruce Bunnell, a forestry worker, in Berlin.

He handed Mrs. Clinton photos of his young son and daughter. She said they were beautiful, asked how old they were, went over the spelling of their names and then signed her own, slowly.

Disinvitation By Obama Is Criticized (NYT)

By Jodi Kantor

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

CHICAGO, March 5 — The Rev. Jeremiah A. Wright Jr., senior pastor of the popular Trinity United Church of Christ in Chicago and spiritual mentor to Senator Barack Obama, thought he knew what he would be doing on Feb. 10, the day of Senator Obama's presidential announcement.

After all, back in January, Mr. Obama had asked Mr. Wright if he would begin the event by delivering a public invocation.

But Mr. Wright said Mr. Obama called him the night before the Feb. 10 announcement and rescinded the invitation to give the invocation.

"Fifteen minutes before Shabbos I get a call from Barack," Mr. Wright said in an interview on Monday, recalling that he was at an interfaith conference at the time. "One of his members had talked him into uninviting me," Mr. Wright said, referring to Mr. Obama's campaign advisers.

Some black leaders are questioning Mr. Obama's decision to distance his campaign from Mr. Wright because of the campaign's apparent fear of criticism over Mr. Wright's teachings, which some say are overly Afrocentric to the point of excluding whites.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Obama campaign, said the campaign disinvited Mr. Wright because it did not want the church to face negative attention. Mr. Wright did however, attend the announcement and prayed with Mr. Obama beforehand.

"Senator Obama is proud of his pastor and his church, but because of the type of attention it was receiving on blogs and conservative talk shows, he decided to avoid having statements and beliefs being used out of context and forcing the entire church to defend itself," Mr. Burton said.

Instead, Mr. Obama asked Mr. Wright's successor as pastor at Trinity, the Rev. Otis Moss III, to speak. Mr. Moss declined.

DOJ_NMG_0140914

In recent weeks, word of Mr. Obama's treatment of Mr. Wright has reached black leaders like the Rev. Al Sharpton and given them pause.

"I have not discussed this with Senator Obama in detail, but I can see why callers of mine and other clergymen would be concerned, because the issue is standing by your own pastor," Mr. Sharpton said.

Mr. Wright's church, the 8,000-member Trinity United Church of Christ, is considered mainstream — Oprah Winfrey has attended services, and many members are prominent black professionals. But the church is also more Afrocentric and politically active than standard black congregations.

Mr. Wright helped organize the 1995 Million Man March on Washington and along with other United Church of Christ ministers was one of the first black religious leaders to protest apartheid and welcome gay and lesbian worshippers.

Since Mr. Obama made his presidential ambitions clear, conservatives have drawn attention to his close relationship to Mr. Wright and to the church's emphasis on black empowerment. Tucker Carlson of MSNBC called the precepts "racially exclusive" and "wrong." Last week, on the Fox News program "Hannity & Colmes," Erik Rush, a conservative columnist, called the church "quite cultish, quite separatist."

In Monday's interview, Mr. Wright expressed disappointment but no surprise that Mr. Obama might try to play down their connection.

"When his enemies find out that in 1984 I went to Tripoli" to visit Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, Mr. Wright recalled, "with Farrakhan, a lot of his Jewish support will dry up quicker than a snowball in hell." Mr. Wright added that his trip implied no endorsement of either Louis Farrakhan's views or Qaddafi's.

Mr. Wright said that in the phone conversation in which Mr. Obama disinvited him from a role in the announcement, Mr. Obama cited an article in Rolling Stone, "The Radical Roots of Barack Obama."

According to the pastor, Mr. Obama then told him, "You can get kind of rough in the sermons, so what we've decided is that it's best for you not to be out there in public."

Obama: Man Of The World (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON

The conventional wisdom about Barack Obama is that he's smart and charismatic but so inexperienced that we should feel jittery about him in the Oval Office.

But that view is myopic. In some respects, Mr. Obama is far more experienced than other presidential candidates.

His experience as an antipoverty organizer in Chicago, for example, gives him a deep grasp of a crucial 21st-century challenge — poverty in America — that almost all politicians lack. He says that grass-roots experience helps explain why he favors not only government spending programs, like early childhood education, but also cultural initiatives, like efforts to promote responsible fatherhood.

In foreign policy as well, Mr. Obama would bring to the White House an important experience that most other candidates lack: he has actually lived abroad. He spent four years as a child in Indonesia and attended schools in the Indonesian language, which he still speaks.

"I was a little Jakarta street kid," he said in a wide-ranging interview in his office (excerpts are on my blog, www.nytimes.com/ontheground). He once got in trouble for making faces during Koran study classes in his elementary school, but a president is less likely to stereotype Muslims as fanatics — and more likely to be aware of their nationalism — if he once studied the Koran with them.

Mr. Obama recalled the opening lines of the Arabic call to prayer, reciting them with a first-rate accent. In a remark that seemed delightfully uncalculated (it'll give Alabama voters heart attacks), Mr. Obama described the call to prayer as "one of the prettiest sounds on Earth at sunset."

Moreover, Mr. Obama's own grandfather in Kenya was a Muslim. Mr. Obama never met his grandfather and says he isn't sure if his grandfather's two wives were simultaneous or consecutive, or even if he was Sunni or Shiite. (O.K., maybe Mr. Obama should just give up on Alabama.)

Our biggest mistake since World War II has been a lack of sensitivity to other people's nationalism, from Vietnam to Iraq. Perhaps as a result of his background, Mr. Obama has been unusually sensitive to such issues and to the need to project respect rather than arrogance. He has consistently shown great instincts.

Mr. Obama's visit to Africa last year hit just the right diplomatic notes. In Kenya, he warmly greeted the president — but denounced corruption and went out of his way to visit a bold newspaper that government agents had ransacked. In South Africa, he respectfully but firmly criticized the government's unscientific bungling of the AIDS epidemic. In Chad, he visited Darfur refugees.

"My experience growing up in Indonesia or having family in small villages in Africa — I think it makes me much more mindful of the importance of issues like personal security or freedom from corruption," he said, adding: "I've witnessed it in much more direct ways than I think the average American has witnessed it."

As a senator, Mr. Obama has not only seized the issue of nuclear proliferation, but also the question of small arms. For a majority of the world's inhabitants, those AK-47s and R.P.G.'s are the weapons of mass destruction.

So how would an Obama administration differ from the Bill Clinton presidency in foreign policy? One way, he said, would be a much greater emphasis on promoting education, health care and development in Africa and other poor regions — not just for humanitarian reasons, but also with an eye to national security.

"If we can't take what, relative to our military hardware and defense budgets, are a pittance, and put some resources into these areas, we will not be secure," he noted, adding: "The Marshall Plan was part of a security strategy; it wasn't simply charity."

Mr. Obama thumps the White House on trade and foreign investments, like the Dubai ports deal — but he isn't demagogic in the way that too many Democrats have been. And three years ago, Mr. Obama was quoted in The Chicago Tribune as making hawkish comments about a military strike on Iran, but in the interview he pirouetted and noted that one of the lessons of Iraq is that "being trigger-happy ... is a recipe for disaster." That's a welcome sign of growth.

So, granted, Mr. Obama lacks the extensive experience at top levels of diplomacy of, say, Dick Cheney or ... oh, never mind.

What sets Mr. Obama apart is the way his training has been at the grass-roots rather than in the treetops. And that may be the richest kind of background of all, yielding not just experience, but also wisdom.

Edwards: Jesus Would Be 'Appalled' (AP)

By Mike Baker

AP, March 6, 2007

Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards says Jesus would be appalled at how the United States has ignored the plight of the suffering, and that he believes children should have private time to pray at school.

Edwards, in an interview with the Web site Beliefnet.com, said Jesus would be most upset with the selfishness of Americans and the country's willingness to go to war "when it's not necessary."

"I think that Jesus would be disappointed in our ignoring the plight of those around us who are suffering and our focus on our own selfish short-term needs," Edwards told the site. "I think he would be appalled, actually."

Edwards also said he was against teacher-led prayers in public schools, but he added that "allowing time for children to pray for themselves, to themselves, I think is not only OK, I think it's a good thing."

In the interview, the former North Carolina senator discussed how he lost touch with his day-to-day faith during college, but that it "came roaring back" after the death of his 16-year-old son, Wade, in 1996.

Edwards has often cited religion as a part of his politics, frequently linking his efforts to fight poverty as a matter of morality.

Edwards was interviewed by David Kuo, a conservative Christian who served as deputy director of President Bush's Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until 2003. Kuo wrote a book, "Tempting Faith, An Inside Story of Political Seduction," that said Bush aides privately called conservative Christians "nuts," "ridiculous" and "goofy."

Edwards told Kuo he stood by a decision to keep two bloggers on his staff despite their provocative writings criticizing the Catholic Church. Edwards said he also found the writing offensive, but "decided to forgive them and stand by them, knowing there would be potential political consequences for that."

The bloggers later quit, saying they didn't want to be a liability to the campaign.

WASHINGTON (AP) — A video is worth a thousand words. And dollars, too.

Prominently featured on John Edwards' presidential campaign Web site is a video of conservative commentator Ann Coulter insulting him. And with just a mouse click you can hear the invective and get a chance to donate at the same time.

On Friday, Coulter, a writer and columnist known for provocative remarks, told an audience at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington: "I was going to have a few comments on the other Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, but it turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I — so kind of an impasse, can't really talk about Edwards."

The Edwards camp is now seeking to capitalize on the slur by soliciting $100,000 in "Coulter Cash" to "show that inflaming prejudice to attack progressive leaders will only backfire."

Meanwhile, conservatives were none too pleased with Coulter, either. Rev. Patrick J. Mahoney, Director of the Christian Defense Coalition, said: "Frankly, I would have loved to have heard Ann expose and dissect the radical agenda of Senator Edwards instead of resorting to cheap name calling."

On Fox News Channel's "Hannity & Colmes" Monday night, Coulter said the word "isn't offensive to gays, it has nothing to do with gays. It's a schoolyard taunt."

ORANGEBURG, S.C. (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Joe Biden on Monday called Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad a "madman" and raised the possibility that he could be assassinated by foes within his country.

"Ahmadinejad, the madman, is in competition with mullahs and ayatollahs who think he's overstepped his bounds," Biden told members of a local Kiwanis Club in this early voting state.

Ahmadinejad may be "assassinated, not by the good guys, but by the bad guys," said the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

At a campaign stop Sunday, Biden called Ahmadinejad "that wacko guy, the crazy president," and said he would only be in office for a little more than a year before being "taken out" because he threatened Shia interests.

Last week, Connecticut Democratic Sen. Chris Dodd told a University of South Carolina audience he endorsed the Bush administration's recent willingness to hold joint talks on Iraq with Syria and Iran. But Dodd, also a presidential hopeful, said the United States needs to avoid talking with Ahmadinejad and called him "a thug."

Biden's campaign on Monday also announced he was endorsed by state Sen. Gerald Malloy and state Rep. Jerry Govan, both members of the Legislative Black Caucus.

NEW YORK (AP) — New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg had a slightly different answer on Monday for that same old question he's dismissed over and over: Are you going to run for president?

"I don't think so — and if I was going to do it, I don't think I'd announce it right here," he said during a brief appearance Monday morning on Fox News.

The host noted that the billionaire businessman had a similar answer when asked, years ago, if he planned to run for mayor.

"And then fast forward, here you are," she said.

"You never know," he said.

For the record, just days ago Bloomberg told an audience at Harvard University that he was not, in fact, a presidential candidate.

Ever since the Democrat-turned-Republican won re-election in 2005, there has been some talk of a Bloomberg presidential bid. Most of the talk has been fueled by one of his aides, Kevin Sheekey, who has publicly acknowledged his efforts to cajole his boss into the race.

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. (AP) — Democratic presidential contender John Edwards is mailing Iowa caucus voters some 70,000 DVDs that argue he is the only candidate with a health care plan for all Americans.

The Edwards campaign hoped to reach a significant number of Iowa's Democratic caucus voters with the DVD. Slightly more than 100,000 participated in the 2004 caucus.

"What America really wants in their next president is to be able to trust their president," Edwards says in the six-minute video. "In order for that to be true, they want to feel like ... the president is a good and decent and honest human being who's trying to do what's right."

The video and pamphlet specifically address health care problems and statistics in Iowa, where the state's leadoff caucuses will begin the nomination process.

Sen. John Kerry won Iowa in 2004 and went on to earn the party's nomination. Edwards placed second in Iowa and later earned a spot as Kerry's vice presidential nominee.

Edwards has proposed a tax increase to fund a universal health care plan that would cover the estimated 47 million Americans who do not have insurance. The plan would create "health markets," including a government-run plan like Medicare, to create competitive prices. It would also subsidize insurance for low-income Americans and require businesses to help cover the insurance costs of their employees.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Judicial Watch, a conservative investigative group that dogged the Clinton presidency, is asking for an investigation of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for filing an incomplete financial disclosure report.

DOJ_NMG_0140917

The group filed a complaint with the Senate Ethics Committee and the Justice Department, noting that Clinton had failed to report that she was secretary-treasurer of the Clinton Family Foundation in documents that must be filed annually with the Senate. In the face of an official complaint, Senate rules require the ethics committee to begin a preliminary inquiry.

Clinton amended her disclosure report on Feb. 26 to include her foundation affiliation after The Washington Post reported the omission. Data about the foundation, and Clinton's role in it, also is available from other public records. According to Internal Revenue Service records, the foundation had nearly $1.8 million in income in 2005.

"This was an inadvertent omission that was immediately corrected," said Clinton spokesman Philippe Reines.

Giuliani Seeks Privacy On Family Issues (AP)

By Michael R. Blood

AP, March 6, 2007

Republican presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani asked for privacy on Monday to deal with strained relationships within his family, including the estrangement between his son and his third wife.

Campaigning in Southern California, Giuliani faced questions about his family after his son, Andrew, publicly said their relationship had become distant after Giuliani's messy divorce from Andrew's mother, Donna Hanover, and his later marriage to Judith Nathan.

"My wife Judith is a very loving and caring ... mother and stepmother. She has done everything she can. The responsibility is mine," the former New York mayor told reporters gathered outside the Los Angeles County Sheriff's headquarters.

"I believe that these problems with blended families, you know, are challenges — sometimes they are," he said. "The more privacy I can have for my family, the better we are going to be able to deal with all these difficulties."

The New York Times reported Saturday that Andrew Giuliani and his father have recently tried to reconcile after not speaking "for a decent amount of time." In the Times article, Andrew said, "There's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife."

He told the newspaper he would not participate in his father's campaign, saying he intended to concentrate on becoming a professional golfer. The 21-year-old Duke University student told ABC News' "Good Morning America," "I got my values from my mother. She's a strong influence in my life. She's a strong woman. I have problems with my father, but that doesn't mean he won't make a good president."

The dispute with his son sidetracked a Giuliani event that was intended to highlight his crime-fighting credentials. He met privately with sheriffs from Southern California and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who later introduced him at a brief news conference.

The Republican governor, who had not endorsed a 2008 candidate, called the former mayor "very successful," but his praise was more restrained compared to the compliments he lavished on rival candidate John McCain last week.

Giuliani's personal life was a staple of New York tabloid headlines during his later years at City Hall. Hanover accused Giuliani of having an affair with a former staffer, which he denied. At one point, the mayor began staying away from the official mayoral residence, Gracie Mansion, and sleeping at a co-op owned by friend and fundraiser Howard Koeppel. Giuliani and Hanover reached a divorce settlement in 2002.

The couple had two children, Andrew and Caroline, now 17.

Giuliani's first marriage was annulled.

Hizzoner The Curmudgeon (WP)

By Jonathan Capehart

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Forget about whether Rudy Giuliani is too moderate to win over the conservatives who dominate the nomination process in the Republican Party. The real story is whether the opera buff's nascent presidential bid will be crushed under the weight of the Pucciniesque life of the 107th mayor of New York.

We all know about the first wife who was his second cousin, the second wife who found out she was being divorced while watching television and the third wife who was barred by court order from the mayor's residence or from meeting Giuliani's children, Andrew and Caroline, there before the divorce was final.

Now come the public comments from Andrew that he won't be stumping for pops in Iowa, New Hampshire or anywhere else. Not only did he say "I have problems with my father," but he also added, "There's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife."

If past is prologue, the younger Giuliani's phone must have crackled with Rudy rage once his comments came to light. See, when Giuliani was mayor, he brooked no criticism -- no matter how minor, no matter how constructive. Having been on the receiving end of one of Giuliani's withering verbal assaults, I know of what I speak.

The phone rang around 9 a.m. on Jan. 7, 1999. It was Giuliani's personal assistant, Beth Patrone. "Please hold for the mayor." He had never called me before. His skin-peeling tirades against reporters, politicians, community leaders, perceived enemies and those deemed too weak to fight City Hall were legendary. Now it was my turn.

Giuliani was spitting fire over my column in that morning's New York Daily News, in which I likened his second term to the sitcom "Seinfeld." The thesis was summed up in the first paragraph: "The show has been reincarnated as Mayor Giuliani's second term, which has turned into a term about nothing."

"Jonathan," he said.

"Good morning, Mr. Mayor," I said, "How . . ."

For the next 10 minutes, Giuliani ripped me apart, calling my column "intellectually dishonest," among other things. He hung up when he couldn't find a favorable editorial that I'd written on his State of the City speech the previous year. But he called back, spouting off the headline and launching into another 10-minute monologue.

His press secretary, Sunny Mindel, called me afterward. "Consider yourself flattered," she said. "You're important enough to warrant a phone call. You got under his skin." I knew that I had accomplished no great feat. The mayor's skin is as thin as America's Next Top Model.

People disagreed with me all the time. I encouraged discussion and accepted that others had different viewpoints. But Giuliani's reaction was over the top. I tell this story because it points to other aspects of hizzoner's personality that were more troublesome.

Giuliani could be vindictive. He had no qualms about using government to settle a score. When the City Council overrode his veto of a bill to change the operations of homeless shelters in December 1998, Giuliani sought to evict five community service programs, including one that served 500 mentally ill people, in the district of the bill's chief sponsor, and to replace them with a homeless shelter.

What's more, he released a list of sites for other shelters that would be housed in the districts of council members who voted in favor of the override. (He backed down two months later, after much public outrage.)

Rather than take the high road earlier that year, Giuliani erupted when the Rev. Calvin O. Butts, a prominent Harlem minister who had endorsed Giuliani for reelection, said, "I don't believe he likes black people." In fact, Giuliani put a lockdown on city funding for projects affiliated with the politically connected cleric.

But it was his reaction to racially charged incidents involving the police that highlighted Giuliani's other affliction: tone-deafness.

Amadou Diallo was reaching for his wallet when undercover police officers gunned him down in a hail of 41 bullets in the vestibule of his apartment building in 1999. New Yorkers of all colors and political stripes trouped to police headquarters to be arrested in protest of not only the officers' actions but also of Giuliani's inability to grasp why everyone was appalled by what happened.

The visionary mayor who brought law and order to the ungovernable city and who became the face of a bloodied but unbowed nation on Sept. 11, 2001, was a difficult mayor. Many wonder whether the trauma of that day has mellowed Giuliani. We'll soon know. There's nothing like the stress of a presidential campaign to find out for sure.

Giuliani Is Selling Investment Firm; Spokeswoman Calls Step Part Of Focusing On Campaign (NYT)

By Russ Buettner And Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani announced yesterday the planned sale of his boutique investment bank to an Australian company, a transaction that a company official said was part of Mr. Giuliani's increasing focus on his presidential campaign.

The firm, Giuliani Capital Advisors, is being sold to the Macquarie Group, a financial services business based in Sydney, Australia, with more than 9,600 employees worldwide. Terms of the sale, which is expected to be final in June, were not released.

"It's indicative of his gearing up and focusing on his candidacy," said Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Giuliani Partners, Mr. Giuliani's core consulting business.

Giuliani Capital Advisors, a subsidiary of Giuliani Partners, advises parties in bankruptcy proceedings and has a practice in mergers and acquisitions. It has about 100 employees and reported revenues of $47.8 million in 2005, its most recent filing, and the firm's officials have described Mr. Giuliani's role as very limited.

The firm would be the easiest of Mr. Giuliani's business interests to break off for sale. Giuliani Partners, the parent company, relies to a far greater extent on the name value and expertise of Mr. Giuliani and his closest advisers, many of whom are expected to join his campaign.

Another division, Giuliani Safety and Security, suffered a setback in 2004 with the unexpected departure of Bernard B. Kerik, who faced ethical and legal problems after his withdrawal from consideration to be President Bush's secretary of homeland security. The division has since grown under the leadership of a respected former F.B.I. official, but it still had only about 10 clients as of January.

Company officials have previously said that Giuliani Capital's client list could pose problems for the Giuliani campaign. So, too, could his other businesses and affiliations. Giuliani Partners has advised companies facing accusations of financial improprieties. And Bracewell & Giuliani, a law firm based in Houston, represents many companies often accused by environmentalists of being excessive polluters.

Similar companies have been selling for about 1.6 times their annual revenue, but that multiple assumes that key personnel sign on with the new owner, said Tobey Sommer, an analyst with SunTrust Robinson Humphrey Capital Markets who covers leaders in the sector. Such a multiple for Giuliani Capital Advisors would generate a price of about $76 million, based on the 2005 revenue figure.

That would mark a substantial gain. Giuliani Partners bought a majority interest in the firm from Ernst & Young in 2004 for $9.8 million.

Eight of Giuliani Capital's original 22 managing directors left last year, which can be indicative that a firm is not paying its top executives competitively, said Mr. Sommer, the analyst.

"Turnover is the bugaboo you've got to manage against," said Mr. Sommer, who is based in Nashville.

The transaction is contingent upon regulatory approval and the signing of Giuliani Capital's employees by Macquarie, which currently has 350 investment banking professionals in North America, a Macquarie spokesman said.

During an appearance yesterday in Monterey Park, Calif., Mr. Giuliani for the first time addressed remarks by his son, Andrew, in The New York Times in which he said he felt estranged from his father because of his marriage to Judith Nathan, Mr. Giuliani's third wife.

"My wife, Judith, is a very loving and caring and good mother and grandmother, good mother and stepmother," Mr. Giuliani replied to a barrage of questions from dozens of journalists about his relationship with his children. "She has done everything she can. The responsibility is mine.

"And I believe that these problems with blended families are challenges. Sometimes they are. And the challenges are best worked on privately. In other words, the more privacy I can have for my family the better we are going to be able to deal with all these difficulties, and the best way to kind of handle that is to make as little comment about this as possible."

Giuliani Sells Bank In Campaign Move (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington And James Politi In New York

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, on Monday provided further evidence that he is stepping up his presidential campaign for 2008 when he sold his boutique investment bank, Giuliani Capital Partners, addressing concerns about potential conflicts of interest and adding to his warchest of campaign financing.

The terms of the sale to Macquarie Group, an Australian financial group, were not disclosed but analysts said that Giuliani Capital Advisors could be worth as much as $100m. It represents a large chunk of Mr Giuliani's business interests, which he began building in early 2002, shortly after leaving his post as mayor.

GCA advises on mergers and acquisitions and restructurings in sectors such as infrastructure, energy, and property. Although largely US-based, it has advised on several international deals, particularly in Germany and the UK. It came under Mr Giuliani's umbrella in 2004, trebling the size of his business interests, which were mostly confined to Giuliani Partners, a management consultancy. A spokesman for GP declined to comment on whether it would also be sold.

After months of being coy about his intentions Mr Giuliani has emerged as the Republican frontrunner, benefiting from strong name recognition, celebrity status from 9/11 and doubts about Senator John McCain and his advocacy of the unpopular troop surge in Iraq.

A Newsweek poll at the weekend showed that in a head-to-head contest with Mr McCain, he jumped into a 25-point lead, with 59 per cent to 34 per cent for McCain. That compared with just a 4 per cent edge in a January poll. Mr Giuliani came second this weekend in a straw poll of conservative activists at the Conservative Political Action conference.

On Tuesday Mr Giuliani will add to his resources with a fundraiser in Palo Alto hosted by Floyd Kvamme, a leading technology veteran from Silicon Valley who served on the National Finance Committee for President George W Bush.

Although he is a social conservative, Mr Kvamme is willing to overlook Mr Giuliani's liberal positions. "You can't help but be impressed by his leadership on 9/11. He was the bright shining star that day," he said, adding: "Rudy Giuliani is a strict constructionist and wants judges who don't make laws from the bench. I'm comfortable with that."

Charlie Cook, editor of the Cook Political Report, warned that three-quarters of those surveyed in a recent Gallup poll were unaware of Mr Giuliani's views on abortion and gay marriage.

"His backers are mostly conservatives and evangelicals drawn by his 9/11 strong leadership. That support will melt like an ice cream cone in August once abortion, guns, gay rights, Vietnam draft, marriage to his second cousin, and infidelities come out."

In a hint of those potential problems, Andrew Giuliani, his son from his second marriage, told ABC this weekend that he "got his values from his mother" and had "problems with my father", but added that he would still make "a great President".

Giuliani Sale May Portend A Presidential Campaign (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper And Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani has sold the investment-banking arm of his consulting firm to an Australian banking company, a move that may help clear the decks for his 2008 presidential campaign.

Giuliani Capital Advisors LLC and Macquarie Group, of Sydney, announced the deal yesterday without disclosing terms. The sale is expected to close in June, the companies said.

Giuliani Capital, which does investment-banking work for small companies and restructurings for larger ones, is one of a handful of businesses Mr. Giuliani has run since leaving office in 2002. Although leading the Republican field in many early polls, he hasn't formally entered the race, which appeared to be the catalyst for the sale.

REACTION FROM DEAL JOURNAL

· Dana Cimilluca: Potential Tie to Future President? Priceless1

A person at the New York company said the former mayor indicated some time ago that he wanted to concentrate on the campaign, in which he has set up an exploratory committee and is traveling to key primary states.

Giuliani Capital and Giuliani Safety and Security are units of Giuliani Partners LLC. Mr. Giuliani also is a partner in the Houston-based law firm Bracewell and Giuliani, and he has been a fixture on the lucrative speaking circuit, which his campaign says he would suspend during his presidential run.

Although not a major player in the investment-banking world, Giuliani Capital has maintained a steady list of clients, particularly for its restructuring work. Its clients include Delta Air Lines Inc., which sought bankruptcy protection in 2005. It handled similar work recently for US Airways Group Inc. and Aloha Airgroup Inc., a regional carrier.

Mr. Giuliani bought the firm, formerly Ernst & Young Corporate Finance LLC, from the Big Three accounting firm in December 2004 for $9.8 million. Of the two units of Giuliani Partners, it is thought to have the greater value.

It also may be the most problematic politically for a potential presidential candidate. Analysts say the nature of the firm's client list may make Mr. Giuliani politically vulnerable. It remains to be seen whether a sale of the company will quiet such criticism.

The Democratic Party said in a memorandum sent to some reporters that Giuliani Capital Advisors had displayed "greed" when it sought millions of dollars in fees from troubled airlines.

"Rudy Giuliani is very proud of his business endeavors," said Sunny Mindel, a Giuliani Partners spokeswoman.

Macquarie Group is perhaps best-known in the U.S. for operating public infrastructure such as toll roads and bridges under long-term government leases. Macquarie also has an investment-banking operation in North America that employs about 350. Macquarie said the acquisition of Giuliani Capital would have no effect on the company's balance sheet, and it suggested it planned to absorb all 100 of the smaller company's employees.

The purchase "is a significant strategic step forward for Macquarie and a highly complementary addition to our North American investment-banking business," said Murray Bleach, head of Macquarie's Investment Banking Group in North America and co-CEO of Macquarie Securities (USA) Inc. "GCA provides Macquarie with an opportunity to build upon and expand our existing U.S. capabilities, particularly in corporate-restructuring transactions."

Giuliani's Firm Sells Investment Business (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani's consulting firm sold its multimillion-dollar investment banking component yesterday in a move intended to free him to concentrate on his presidential bid, even as the former New York mayor was confronting some of the campaign season's first scrutiny of his personal life.

Campaigning in California, the Republican asked reporters to keep out of his private life after they quizzed him about the strained relationship between his college-age son, Andrew, and Giuliani's third wife, Judith Nathan.

The sale of the investment banking business offered a rare glimpse into the complex financial enterprise that Giuliani helped create after leaving the mayor's office in 2001.

An Australian-based firm bought Giuliani Capital Advisors LLC for an undisclosed amount. A source close to the Republican candidate who spoke on condition of anonymity said the sale is intended to free Giuliani from distractions as he pursues the White House.

"This enables him to sustain his intense focus on his candidacy," the source said.

Others viewed the sale as Giuliani's first step away from the lucrative private-sector career he built during the years he spent outside the public spotlight. Eric Abrahamson, a Columbia Business School professor, said he thinks Giuliani will have little choice but to start building a higher wall between his campaign and his business activities.

"The organization has dealt with all varieties of clients over time, some of whom would expose his image to certain perception problems," Abrahamson said yesterday. "I would imagine that, fairly soon, he would have to completely distance himself from the business."

Giuliani has held sizable leads in several independent polls and has tried to frame his campaign for the Republican nomination around the image of strength he built after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

His multifaceted consulting firm, Giuliani Partners, primarily advises security companies and promotes their products, many of which have been marketed to federal agencies. That proved problematic for one of Giuliani's early business partners, Bernard B. Kerik, a former New York police commissioner who withdrew as President Bush's nominee for Homeland Security secretary after potential conflicts were exposed.

The 100-member banking outfit that Giuliani sold to the Macquarie Group yesterday specialized in helping companies restructure after bankruptcy. Giuliani Partners bought the boutique investment firm from accounting giant Ernst & Young in 2004 for $9.8 million.

Since then, the company has had tepid earnings, according to Jennifer Payne, an industry analyst with SNL Financial. In 2005, the company's federal filings show it took in $47.8 million in revenue, but its net income showed a loss of $1.4 million, she said. The parties involved declined to provide financial details of the sale.

Giuliani is also a partner in a Texas law firm and has maintained a lucrative public speaking career.

As a candidate, he will be required to reveal only broad information about his business relationships on personal financial statements that he will be asked to provide to federal elections regulators by May 31.

Shortly after he announced the sale of his investment firm, Giuliani faced reporters in Southern California and took responsibility for what he called a strained relationship between his son, Andrew, and Nathan.

"I believe that these problems with blended families, you know, are challenges," he said. "The more privacy I can have for my family, the better we are going to be able to deal with all these difficulties."

Giuliani's bitter and messy divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover, produced headlines for months, as did his courtship of Nathan, his longtime companion. Giuliani's first marriage, to a second cousin, was annulled after a little more than a year.

In the New York Times last weekend, Andrew Giuliani, 21, said that he and his father had resumed speaking after "a decent period of time." He added that "there's obviously a little problem that exists between me and his wife."

Rudy Giuliani Sells Financial Arm Of Consulting Firm (NSDY)

By Amy Westfeldt

Long Island Newsday, March 6, 2007

NEW YORK -- Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani is selling off the investment banking arm of his consulting firm to an Australian company, his company said Monday.

Giuliani Capital Advisors LLC, a 2{-year-old firm offering advice on business and investment banking, will be acquired by Macquarie Group of Sydney, Australia. Financial terms of the deal weren't disclosed.

DOJ_NMG_0140922

Giuliani's business interests have come under closer scrutiny lately as his presidential campaign progresses. The former New York City mayor, who led the city through the aftermath of Sept. 11, has emerged as the front-runner for the 2008 GOP nomination in most national polls.

Doug Muzzio, a politics professor at Baruch College, said Giuliani is trying to head off any future conflicts in the campaign.

"Doing it now signals that they consider what they're doing for the clients will be politically problematic for a run for president, so they're getting rid of it early so that even if a story emerges, they will be politically inoculated from it," said Muzzio. He added that it's hard to know how much Giuliani's personal financial considerations played a part in the sale.

Giuliani Partners spokeswoman Sunny Mindel said the sale had nothing to do with potential client conflicts.

"This is so Rudy can continue to focus his efforts on his candidacy," Mindel said.

Giuliani has earned millions through his consulting firm, other business interests and his high-priced speaking appearances since leaving office in 2001. He recently said he will stop accepting invitations to give paid speeches.

It is largely through his post-Sept. 11 popularity that he built up Giuliani Partners LLP, which focuses on emergency preparedness, public safety and corporate governance. He is also a partner at Bracewell & Giuliani, a well-established law firm best known for its energy company clients.

Giuliani Capital Advisors, formerly the investment banking arm of accounting firm Ernst & Young LLP, was acquired by Giuliani Partners in 2004. It has over 100 employees in Chicago, New York, Los Angeles, Atlanta and Michigan.

Mindel wouldn't disclose the extent of Giuliani's ownership in the subsidiary.

"Joining the Macquarie team will allow the professionals of GCA to benefit from the vast resources of a leading global investment bank," Giuliani said in a statement.

Murray Bleach, head of Macquarie's investment banking group in North America, said Giuliani's firm will provide the company "with an opportunity to build upon and expand our existing U.S. capabilities, particularly in corporate restructuring transactions."

The Romney Rehab Plan (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, March 6, 2007

Mitt Romney may be low in the polls right now, but he is a man with a plan, a plan to make him the Republican nominee for president.

Though he is at only 4 percent in national polls, The Politico has learned that in the coming weeks and months, he will:

--- Game the system. Romney intends to take advantage of the various and complicated rules governing the primaries.

The prime example is the change in the way California will conduct its Republican primary on Feb. 5.

Unlike Democratic primaries, Republican primaries are winner-take-all. Whoever wins statewide gets all the delegates at stake. This favors front-runners, who, with their early money and early support, can wrap up the nomination quickly.

But, in a barely noticed move, California Republicans have changed the system. Now it is winner-take-all by congressional district.

That means a candidate no longer needs to win the whole state to get delegates. It also means a candidate does not need a $25 million TV budget to do a serious statewide media buy.

Romney not only will target his TV ads to certain congressional districts, but he intends to treat California as if it were a "retail" political state instead of a tarmac state. (Because California is so large geographically, candidates spend most of their time flying from airport to airport, standing on the tarmac, doing a sound bite for local TV and then flying on.)

Romney intends to emphasize more intensive, face-to-face campaigning in select congressional districts in which he has the best chance of winning delegates.

--- Feel the burn. While Romney expects to raise significant amounts of money, his "burn rate," or expenses, will be high. (Howard Dean impressed the media by raising tens of millions of dollars on the Internet in 2003, but his campaign burned through it so fast that he had almost nothing left by the time he faced the New Hampshire primary in early 2004.)

Romney says he'll spend his money wisely -- but spend it. Although it is early, he's already putting TV commercials on the air. He has to raise his poll numbers, which are in the single digits.

True, early polls measure little but name recognition. But contributors read polls, and nobody wants to back a loser. Romney must raise his profile to make his poll numbers bounce and compete seriously for money and support.

For More Info Visit Our Candidates Page

Further, he is not buying the commercials willy-nilly but in states that may be key for him in the early contests: Florida, Iowa, Michigan, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

DOJ_NMG_0140923

--- Make clear both explicitly and implicitly the differences between himself, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain, whether on issues or on lifestyle.

Unlike the Democratic top tier, in which the candidates agree on virtually all issues, there are significant differences among the candidates of the Republican top tier.

Romney intends to exploit what he perceives as two of McCain's great vulnerabilities in the Republican primaries: the McCain-Feingold law, which restricts campaign contributions, and the McCain-Kennedy bill, which would change immigration laws and allow for a guest-worker program. And while Romney disagrees explicitly with Giuliani on issues such as abortion, gun control and gay rights, he implicitly draws distinctions between Giuliani's rather turbulent personal life -- he has been married three times -- and Romney's own marriage of nearly 38 years.

"There are issues on a social basis that I think are critical for the future of America," Romney told The Politico. "One of them relates to the family. I really fundamentally believe the strength of America derives from the American family."

"The breakdown of the family," Romney continued, "is an issue that needs to be spoken about."

When I asked Romney if it was legitimate to ask people to vote for him because of his stable family life, his wife, Ann, who was sitting next to him, interjected: "We'll take that! I'll take it!"

Romney also drew implicit differences between himself and McCain, who has been a U.S. senator for more than 20 years.

"I don't think America wants another lifetime politician leading the country," Romney said.

Also, when I asked about whether, in a post-Sept. 11 world, Americans might want a president with national security experience, Romney replied: "Well, just because someone gets elected senator doesn't make them a foreign policy expert."

--- Make a splash. Romney intends to make a big effort at the splashiest event on the primary calendar: the straw poll in Ames, Iowa, on Aug. 11. The straw poll is the "American Idol" of political events. The hoopla and spectacle, which includes fireworks, bands, barbecue and body-painting, is unlike any event except the nominating conventions themselves.

But unlike the nominating conventions, the winner at Ames is not known in advance.

And the media coverage will be enormous. Failure at Ames can end candidacies, because campaign contributions can dry up for those who do not do well.

In 1999, George W. Bush decisively won the Ames straw poll with about 24,000 votes. In the next 10 weeks, Lamar Alexander, Dan Quayle and Elizabeth Dole dropped out of the race and Pat Buchanan left the Republican Party.

Top-tier Republicans (Democrats ban straw polls) could spend in excess of $2 million each at Ames to bus supporters in and entertain them, while the bottom-tier candidates will depend on speaking skills and message to win support. Romney intends to makes Ames a summer showdown.

--- Encourage the media to look into the background of his opponents. In his interview with The Politico, Romney decried opposition research directed against him.

"There is going to be a lot of opposition research folks on other campaigns trying to put up things that aren't accurate (about me)," Romney said. But his campaign is already predicting reporters will find plenty to write about when it comes to Giuliani's ex-police chief, Bernard Kerik, and Giuliani's complex business associations.

--- Minimize his own negatives. Romney is vulnerable to accusations of being a flip-flopper -- he admits he was not pro-life until just a few years ago, and he joined the National Rifle Association just last August -- but his biggest negative, according to the polls, is his Mormon religion.

Two recent Gallup Polls found that 46 percent of Americans have an unfavorable opinion of Mormonism and 24 percent would not vote for a well-qualified candidate who was a Mormon.

Romney intends to recast the issue by emphasizing that he is a person of faith and that that is more important to voters than what faith he is. Second, his Mormon faith has been fundamental to his commitment to family, which he believes people of all faiths can respect.

--- Mend a fence. Romney formally announced for president last month in Dearborn, Mich., at the Henry Ford Museum. Aside from being an inventor and a highly successful businessman, however, Ford was a notorious anti-Semite.

That is not the message Romney wanted to send, and in the interview, he said, "Catholics, evangelical Christians, Mormons, Jews will find me to be an attractive candidate. I've gotten great support financially from members of the Jewish faith. I am a strong supporter of Israel and feel the need to defend Israel."

--- Be funny, even if he has to borrow the jokes. Romney quoted Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, a Mormon, telling other senators the difficulty he has raising money among members of his own faith.

"You'd have had trouble raising money, too, if all the people you were asking money from were sober," Hatch said.

Health Care Already A Key Issue In 2008 Race (WP)

By Christopher Lee

DOJ_NMG_0140924

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

Former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) says providing health coverage to the 47 million Americans who lack it is so important that he is willing to raise taxes to do it.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) says he is determined to enact universal health care by the end of his first presidential term.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), no novice on the subject, calls universal coverage "not only a moral and health imperative, but an economic and jobs imperative as well."

Although health care is usually a bigger factor in Democratic primaries than in Republican contests, at least two GOP contenders -- former governors Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Tommy G. Thompson of Wisconsin -- are expected to use their extensive track records on the issue as campaign selling points, especially if either emerges as the party's nominee.

All of which illuminates the reality that no White House hopeful can be taken seriously in the rapidly evolving 2008 race without confronting what many Americans have long said is one of their biggest concerns: the availability and affordability of health care.

"Every candidate is going to have to have a health-care plan, because it is the number one domestic policy issue on the minds of voters," said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, an industry group whose "Harry and Louise" television ads in the early 1990s helped torpedo the last big push to overhaul health care.

Although fixing health care is back in vogue, some analysts worry that the prescriptions of the presidential candidates miss the heart of the problem. All the talk about creating universal coverage has obscured the fact that most voters already have insurance, some analysts say, and what they are most concerned about is curbing costs.

"They want some more active government effort to change the way the insurance system works, and to put some more pressure on doctors and pharmaceuticals and hospitals to give a better deal to working people," said Robert Blendon, a professor and public opinion expert at the Harvard School of Public Health. "The cost issue is a very important driving issue, and politicians haven't figured out how to touch that nerve yet."

Taking on costs is more difficult politically because it generally involves challenging powerful interests with a financial stake in the current system, including hospitals, doctors, and drug and insurance companies, said John Rother, policy director for AARP, the seniors lobby.

"The heavy lifting from a candidate's point of view is what they would do to control costs," Rother said. "Getting everybody covered is significant, but it doesn't take you right up against the power of the $2 trillion-a-year medical lobby the way that cost containment does. That's what's missing in the debate."

Since 1999, health insurance premiums have risen faster than wages and inflation. U.S. spending on health care, already the highest per person in the world, is expected by 2016 to nearly double, to $4.1 trillion. One in six Americans has no health insurance, and a shrinking share of those who do can get coverage through their jobs, census figures show.

The burden of rising costs on employers has led to calls for major change, even from some business groups that opposed earlier efforts to revamp the system. Pressure is also bubbling up from states, most notably California, Massachusetts and a few others that have begun, or are considering, statewide experiments to make health insurance affordable for everyone, through state subsidies and new fees on businesses if necessary.

"We're at the beginning of the next great debate about health reform," said Drew Altman, president of the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonpartisan source of health-care information. "This is an issue which was very much on the minds of the American people as an economic worry for quite some time, but was just nowhere as a national political priority even six months ago. Now it's front and center again, and the words 'universal coverage' are back at the center of the debate."

Indeed, analysts say national politicians are approaching the subject with a zeal not seen since the Clinton administration's health plan collapsed in 1994, amid concerns that it would give big government too much control over the health-care system.

Edwards has so far staked out the most detailed position. His plan would require employers to provide health coverage for workers or pay a portion of their payroll into a fund that would help individuals buy private insurance through new regional health-care purchasing pools. He would also expand Medicaid and the state-federal Children's Health Insurance Program, and would provide tax credits to help make insurance more affordable for lower-income families.

Most of the $90 billion to $120 billion annual cost could be paid for by eliminating President Bush's tax cuts for households earning more than $200,000 and by increasing Internal Revenue Service efforts to collect unpaid capital gains taxes, Edwards has said.

"I want to start putting universal health care in place as soon as I am sworn into office in January of 2009, which is what America needs," he said at a Feb. 22 candidate forum in Carson City, Nev. "We can't wait."

His campaign sent a mailing yesterday touting the plan to more than 70,000 Iowa households, the first such large-scale voter contact effort by a Democratic presidential candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0140925

The 12-page booklet notes that 265,000 Iowans have no health coverage and argues that only Edwards has a plan "that will cover all of them and lower healthcare costs for everyone." It does not mention the program's cost.

Obama has not released a detailed plan, but in announcing his candidacy last month he said he would deliver universal health care by 2012. "Let's be the generation that finally tackles our health-care crisis," he said. "We can control costs by focusing on prevention, by providing better treatment to the chronically ill, and using technology to cut the bureaucracy."

Clinton said last month that she wants universal health-care coverage by the end of her second term, but she has not offered a plan to achieve it. She has said that she "learned from experience" that no comprehensive proposal will work unless employers, government and labor organizations support it, and that simply throwing money at the problem will not solve it.

"I am looking for answers that will not have us spend more money," Clinton said while campaigning in New Hampshire last month. "I am convinced we can do that."

Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio) has proposed expanding Medicare to cover everyone, a plan he says would eliminate any role for for-profit insurance companies. Their certain opposition would be a major political obstacle.

Polls by Gallup and other organizations routinely show that Democrats are more likely than Republicans to rate health care as an extremely important issue for Congress and the president. Still, some Republican presidential hopefuls have considerable bona fides on the issue. In 2006, Romney signed legislation requiring that all Massachusetts residents have health insurance by July of this year. Thompson served as President Bush's health and human services secretary at a time when the administration successfully sought to create a drug benefit under Medicare.

Whoever wins the presidency will have trouble converting voters' desire for change into politically viable legislation, analysts say. There is broad agreement on health-care problems, but a consensus on how to fix them remains elusive -- a reality Bush encountered when his recent proposal to overhaul the tax treatment of health insurance fell flat in the Democratic Congress.

"One thing that history really shows us is that the enthusiasm at the beginning of these debates often wanes when you get to the details at the end," said Altman, the Kaiser president.

GOP Protectionists (WSJ)

By Jack Kemp

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

As the GOP stumbles around Washington trying to be the party of Herbert Hoover, it's sad to see so many Republicans drifting so far and so fast from the Reagan model that helped pave the way for the great, non-inflationary economic and jobs expansion of the past 25 years.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, (R., S.C.) threatens China with a 28% tariff for daring to tie the yuan to the dollar. Rep. Tom Tancredo, running for president, is miffed at President Bush for trying to design comprehensive immigration-reform legislation. The president wants a guest-worker program that could help alleviate border problems in the Southwest.

But Mr. Tancredo is a sissy compared to my old pal Duncan Hunter, the congressman from San Diego. He's also running in the GOP primaries as an unambiguous Hoover-like protectionist and anti-globalization candidate. Then there's my other old friend Pat Buchanan, railing against Japan and Toyota for having the chutzpah to sell so many cars in the U.S., even going so far as to build manufacturing plants right here under our noses.

Mr. Buchanan resigned from the GOP a few years ago because Republicans weren't tough enough on trade, tariffs and immigration for his so-called "economic nationalism" model. His answer to the competition faced by U.S. automakers from abroad is to bash Japan, and to accuse those of us who believe in classical free-trade policies of being "fanatics" who cause U.S. manufacturing to move offshore. Adam Smith and David Ricardo are spinning in their graves!

In the interest of full disclosure, I'm on the advisory board of Toyota North America and now drive a hybrid Lexus. But I also believe that the real answer for U.S. auto companies is a decrease in tax rates, lower costs of labor and greater flexibility in future union contracts. The attack on a trading partner like Japan is misguided when the real enemy of American jobs and auto production comes from Washington and Detroit. Having driven American automobiles for 50 of my 71 years, my long-term, (and short-term) solution to the profound challenges faced by U.S. manufacturers is to reform the complex, confusing and confiscatory U.S. tax code, and to ease the onerous regulatory burden that undermines our ability to compete in the global economy.

The suggestion that Japan manipulates its currency for trade advantages -- even though the yen has appreciated against the dollar by 75% since 1985 -- is misleading. The same attack could have been made against the U.S. when the Fed lowered the federal-funds rate to 1% in 2003 in order to boost the economy. Every central bank manipulates its currency to some degree in that they control the printing of the supply of money that determines the value of their currency.

Protectionists claim that the trade deficit threatens the dollar and causes it to fall, further de-industrializing America and diminishing our freedoms. In reality, the trade deficit is just the other side of what President Reagan correctly called the capital account surplus, which reflects foreign investment leading to increased production, output and job creation in the U.S.

As a case in point, since coming to America 50 years ago Toyota has invested more than $14 billion in our domestic economy and set up 10 manufacturing plants. It has "insourced" more than 380,000 jobs since 1981, and just announced an 11th plant, with more U.S. jobs. Toyota pays close to $15 billion in wages to American workers.

Overall, since the 2001 recession, according to David Malpass of Bear Stearns, the U.S. economy has created 9.3 million jobs; Japan only 350,000. As for the legacy health costs and pension costs for U.S. auto workers, protectionists would better spend their time lobbying for Detroit to move to health-savings accounts and defined pension-contribution plans. Defined-benefits pension plans are far too costly for auto makers, as economist Arthur Laffer has written and lectured about for years.

Protectionist views on trade resemble Al Gore on global warming: Pessimism permeates their arguments and they misuse statistics to drive their propaganda on these very important issues. Mr. Buchanan, for example, argues that the U.S is witnessing the passing of our nation as the greatest industrial power the world has ever seen. Nonsense: Half the wealth our nation has ever produced was generated in the last 25 years or so.

With the recent passing of Milton Friedman and Ronald Reagan, we've lost two great champions of the free-enterprise and free-trade policies that helped lay the groundwork for the last two decades of low unemployment and low inflation, fostering the growing class of working families who own stocks, bonds and property.

The answers to our challenges in today's global marketplace can be found in sound money, lower tax rates on capital and labor, an easing of regulatory burdens, and the welcoming of foreign investment and trade with nations like Japan. Isolationism and protectionism are not worthy of 21st century America.

Mr. Kemp is founder and chairman of Kemp Partners and former Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

Jenna Bush Embarks On Book 'Journey' (USAT)

By Bob Minzesheimer

USA Today, March 6, 2007

Jenna Bush, in a rare interview, says her forthcoming book for teens — about a 17-year-old single mother in Panama who is living with HIV — will end with a "call to action."

HarperCollins announces today that it's publishing Bush's Ana's Story: A Journey of Hope this fall. It will be illustrated with photographs by Mia Baxter, a former classmate of Bush's at the University of Texas.

The president's daughter, 25, says the book is not political. It's aimed at "getting kids thinking and involved," Bush said Monday by phone from Panama, where she has worked since September as an unpaid intern for UNICEF.

Bush, a former public school teacher in Washington, D.C., says: "I'm aware that not all kids can pick up and fly to Panama. I'm very lucky."

But, Bush says, "there's so much they can do" to deal with issues of "exclusion" — from research on HIV discrimination to "inviting new kids to sit with them in the cafeteria."

The book grew out of her UNICEF job to "put a face on statistics" and document the lives of children in Central and South America who live in extreme poverty.

Jenna and her sister, Barbara (who works at a New York museum), have tried to avoid publicity and have been protected by the White House. But, she says, "I'm willing to give up some of my anonymity" to promote the book and "start a dialogue with kids."

A book tour is planned in schools, libraries and bookstores. "This is not about me," she adds, "but the kids I met here."

The Bush twins have been fodder for tabloids and gossip columnists for their partying and underage drinking. Jenna Bush, who campaigned for her father in 2004, says she doesn't worry about her media image: "I care what people who know me think of me. I think they would disagree (with her image). I like to go to bed early."

Kate Jackson, editor of HarperCollins Children's Books, says she was impressed by Bush's "intellect, drive and passion." A first printing of about 500,000 copies is expected.

Bush says she will donate her earnings to UNICEF. She says she "very, very modestly" hopes her book will have some of the influence of two books about girls caught up in the Holocaust: Lois Lowry's novel Number the Stars and Anne Frank's The Diary of Anne Frank.

Bush Reaches Out To Latin America (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Monday that the United States will help the working poor of Latin America as part of a plan meant to show the region it has not been forgotten by the United States.

Preparing for a seven-day, five-nation swing, Bush outlined past efforts to help the region while offering new plans for health care, education and business development.

"The working poor of Latin America need change," Bush told members of the United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce.

During a Monday briefing, national security adviser Stephen Hadley said the trip will emphasize the continuing U.S. efforts to bolster Latin American democracies and economies.

Those efforts, Hadley said, have not received the attention they deserve. "That's one of the reasons we're doing this trip."

Bush leaves Thursday for São Paulo, Brazil, the first stop on a trip that includes Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

Latin Americans believe that the Bush administration has ignored the region since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, said pollster John Zogby, who recently conducted a survey in seven Latin American nations.

"There is a sense that the United States is so focused on other parts of the world that Latin America is just not on the radar screen," he said.

Zogby, whose respondents included government and business leaders, said most also believe the United States benefits more from one of its key Latin American policies — free trade.

In his speech, Bush said expanded trade, democracy and educational exchanges have improved conditions in Latin America.

"Despite the advances," he added, "tens of millions in our hemisphere remain stuck in poverty and shut off from the promises of the new century." Almost 25% of Latin Americans live on less than $2 a day, he said.

Bush said he was sending a Navy medical ship to 12 Latin American and Caribbean nations to treat an estimated 85,000 patients and perform up to 1,500 surgeries.

He also touted a $75 million program to allow Latin American youths to study English in the USA and a $100 million effort to provide mortgages to working families.

The proposals seem aimed at countering the appeal of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, said Peter Hakim, president of the Inter-American Dialogue. Chávez has blamed U.S.-style economic policies for the persistence of poverty.

Hakim said Central and South Americans will be skeptical until they see results and that the United States "is there for the longer term."

Hadley said the trip wasn't an anti-Chávez trip. Instead, the region has long been one of the president's top priorities.

Much of Bush's work in Latin America, he said, was overshadowed by the continuing war on terror.

Bush Outlines Agenda For Latin America Trip (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Ahead of a six-day swing through Latin America, President Bush unveiled plans to send a Navy vessel to dispense medical care throughout Latin America, spend $75 million over three years on English-language training for the poor and develop a new small-business loan initiative.

Mr. Bush's trip to Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala, and Mexico is officially designed to tout the benefits of democracy and open markets in fighting poverty and improving health care and education. But the tour is also designed to let the White House provide a counterweight to Venezuela's popular Bush-bashing President Hugo Chavez.

During a speech to the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce Monday, Mr. Bush never mentioned Mr. Chavez Monday's speech, but the Venezuelan leader is expected to cast a shadow over the president's trip. Mr. Chavez has been discussing confrontation with Mr. Bush and is expected to appear at a public demonstration in Buenos Aires while Mr. Bush is in Uruguay. Mr. Bush is viewed with skepticism in many Latin American countries, particularly those with close ties to Mr. Chavez.

Mr. Bush also didn't touch on energy issues, expected to be high on the agenda during his meeting with Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said earlier Monday that Messrs. Bush and Lula will agree to cooperate on the development of ethanol, encourage greater cooperation on local biofuels production in Central America and the Caribbean, and participate in the International Biofuels Forum, an attempt to standardize the industry.

During his speech, the president said an important priority for the U.S. is "helping our neighbors to the south of us build a better and productive life." The region "has made great strides toward freedom and prosperity," he said. "Despite the advances, tens of millions in our hemisphere remain stuck in poverty."

To help alleviate the situation, Mr. Bush said he's sending the USNS Comfort to make medical stops in 12 countries, including Panama, Nicaragua, Colombia and Haiti. The mission is expected to provide care to 85,000 patients and result in 1,500 surgeries. Another initiative will provide training for nurses, technicians and health-care workers in Panama.

"It is in our national interest ... to help the people and democracies in our neighborhood succeed," Mr. Bush said. "When our neighbors are prosperous and peaceful, it means better opportunities and more security for our people. When there are jobs in our neighborhood, people are able to find work at home and not have to migrate to our country."

Since taking office, Mr. Bush has doubled U.S. foreign assistance to Latin America to about $1.6 billion a year. The money includes development assistance, military assistance and counter-narcotic assistance. Colombia is the largest recipient of U.S. aide outside the Middle East and Afghanistan, with most of the money earmarked for anti-drug efforts.

AP, March 6, 2007

President Bush, facing criticism he has ignored Latin America, said Monday the region's grinding poverty is a scandal that has caused some to question the value of democracy. He said the United States will spend tens of millions of dollars to improve education, housing and health care across the region.

"The United States of America is committed to helping people rise out of poverty," the president said.

Many children in Latin America do not finish grade school and many mothers never see a doctor, Bush said in a speech at the Ronald Reagan Building to about 400 invited guests, most of them members of the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce.

"In an age of growing prosperity and abundance, this is a scandal and it is a challenge," Bush said.

The speech came three days before the president leaves on a weeklong trip to Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said Bush's efforts in Latin America have been overshadowed by the global war on terror, the fight against illegal drug trafficking and trade issues.

"It's something we have not done well enough, getting out the full scope of the president's message," Hadley said at a briefing before the president's address.

Since taking office, Bush has doubled U.S. foreign assistance to Latin America to about $1.6 billion a year. The money includes development assistance, military assistance and counter-narcotic assistance. Colombia is the largest recipient of U.S. aide outside the Middle East and Afghanistan, with most of the money earmarked for anti-drug efforts.

Bush announced a series of steps to help the region:

_A Navy medical ship, the Comfort, will make port calls in Belize, Guatemala, Panama, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Peru, Ecuador, Colombia, Haiti, Trinidad and Tobago, Guyana and Suriname. Its staff will treat 85,000 patients and conduct up to 1,500 surgeries. Other military medical teams will provide medical care through 62 medical readiness training exercises in 14 countries.

_A health care professional training center will be established in Panama to serve all of Central America, training students to be nurses, technicians and health care workers.

_The United States will commit $75 million over three years to help thousands of young people improve their English and study in the United States. Over the past three years, the United States has provided $150 million on education programs throughout the region.

_A program to make housing more affordable will be expanded with an additional $385 million. The United States already has provided more than $100 million through the Overseas Private Investment Corp. to help underwrite mortgages to working families in Mexico, Brazil, Chile and the countries of Central America.

Later this year, the administration will convene a White House conference on the Western Hemisphere, bringing together representatives from the private sector, non-governmental organizations, faith-based groups and volunteer associations, to explore more effective ways to deliver aid.

Peter DeShazo, who oversaw Western Hemisphere affairs for the State Department until last year, said Bush's trip is intended to offset "the widespread perception that the U.S. has shown little attention" to the region.

DeShazo, speaking at a briefing of the Center for International and Strategic Studies, said Bush's visit "underscores that the administration is willing to work with democratic governments" whether they are on the left, like Brazil's Lula da Silva or on the right, like Mexico's Felipe Calderon.

Bush To Set Out Shift In Agenda On Latin Trip (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

SÃO PAULO, Brazil, March 5 — President Bush arrives here on Thursday with an energy partnership plan to create jobs and decrease poverty and inequality, a marked shift in Washington's priorities for Latin America aimed at countering the challenge posed by President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela.

Since 1990, when Mr. Bush's father was in the White House, United States policy toward the region has focused on free-trade agreements and related economic measures, with a secondary emphasis on drug interdiction.

But the growing leftward and anti-American trend in regional politics, led by Mr. Chávez — who plans a countertour to coincide with Mr. Bush's trip — has led to a modified agenda and a renewed effort to rebut complaints by Latin Americans that the president has ignored their concerns in favor of the campaign against terrorism.

"When something isn't working after 15 years, that's a sign there are insurmountable obstacles and it's time to change direction," said Rubens Ricupero, a Brazilian diplomat and former secretary general of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in an interview here. "This is a very intelligent initiative on the part of the U.S., because there's no point in tying the whole relationship to something that has only produced frustration and stagnation."

The Bush administration has also signaled a new willingness to consider including workers' rights guarantees in trade accords. [Page C1.]

Mr. Bush's trip will be his longest to the region. But his promises of American support and assistance are likely to fall short of what Mr. Chávez, with his oil wealth, has been delivering recently.

On Monday, in a speech in Washington to the United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Bush said ties between the United States and Latin America had helped advance peace and prosperity in the Western Hemisphere. But he also appeared to acknowledge the need to reach out more to America's southern neighbors. "The fact is that tens of millions of our brothers and sisters to the south have seen little improvement in their daily lives," Mr. Bush said, "and this has led some to question the value of democracy."

Mr. Bush's first stop will be here in Brazil's industrial capital. He and the president of Brazil, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, are expected to sign a memorandum of understanding for a recently negotiated program that calls for the countries to promote the production and use of ethanol, a renewable fuel that Brazil manufactures from sugar cane. Mr. da Silva, a former labor leader who controls the leftist Workers Party, is also scheduled to visit Mr. Bush at Camp David at the end of the month.

But the convergence of strategic interests of the Western Hemisphere's two most populous countries clearly goes beyond energy. Brazil fancies itself, not Venezuela, as South America's natural leader. It has also recently shown signs of alarm at Mr. Chávez's substantial arms purchases and irritation with his involvement in neighboring Bolivia, including providing military assistance and support for the nationalization of Brazilian-held energy assets there.

"I don't think Brazil will accept the idea of being any type of American surrogate in the region, or to moderate or contain Chávez," said Felipe Lampreia, Brazil's foreign minister from 1995 to 2001. "But the United States wants to bolster Lula as a counterweight, to show that you can have a leftist government with a strong focus on social issues, income distribution and poverty reduction, without being radical."

Mr. Bush will be sending much the same message at his second stop, Uruguay, which signed a trade and investment framework agreement with the United States in January. There, he and President Tabaré Vázquez, a physician who leads a leftist coalition called the Broad Front, plan to meet at the presidential ranch to commemorate Uruguay's emergence, with American help, from a fiscal crisis in 2002 and to discuss how to expand commercial ties.

Dr. Vázquez's government includes former Tupamaro guerrillas; the guerrilla group kidnapped and killed an American official in Montevideo in 1970. But Dr. Vázquez, like Mr. da Silva, has migrated toward the center and largely abandoned the kind of fiery rhetoric that is Mr. Chávez's specialty.

"One must be pragmatic," Dr. Vázquez said in an interview last year. "Uruguayans want jobs that provide dignity, an adequate salary, and security. To have that, you must have economic growth, which is achieved only through production and investment."

Mr. Bush's itinerary also includes stops in Colombia and Guatemala, two countries where political scandals have recently erupted, weakening the pro-American governments there. He will end his trip next week in Mexico, where the agenda is sure to include immigration, a constant source of tension in relations between the two neighbors.

As a candidate in 2000, Mr. Bush vowed that "should I become president, I will look south, not as an afterthought but as a fundamental commitment." But after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the United States quickly relegated Latin America to the ancillary role it played during most of the cold war, creating openings that Mr. Chávez, China and even, more recently, Iran have moved to exploit.

Now, however, "there is a sense that things are not going well for the U.S. in the region," said Peter Hakim, president of Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington-based policy research and advocacy group. "There has probably never been so much anti-Americanism and so little confidence in U.S. leadership since the cold war."

That trend has been aggravated, he said, by the emergence of "such a vehement and reasonably effective adversary" in the form of Mr. Chávez.

An overwhelming majority of government officials and academic analysts in Latin America take it as a given that the United States has been jolted into action by the inroads Mr. Chávez has made. But American officials dispute that notion.

"We are aware of the shortcomings of the Venezuelan government and the kind of unhelpful role it has played in certain countries in the region," Deputy Secretary of State John D. Negroponte said in a recent interview. "I think the president's intent is to accent the positive, and talk about the positive, things we want to get done in the relationships with the countries that he is visiting rather than to call undue attention to this issue, which is Venezuela."

And when asked at a press briefing Monday if Mr. Bush's trip was "an anti-Chávez tour," Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said, "It's really not."

But Mr. Chávez is acting as if the trip, which he mocks as doomed to failure, is aimed solely at combating his influence, and has responded with a maneuver of his own. While Mr. Bush is in Uruguay on Friday and Saturday, Mr. Chávez plans to be leading anti-Bush demonstrations just across the River Plate in Buenos Aires, Argentina, where he has cultivated an increasingly friendly relationship with that country's Peronist president, Néstor Kirchner.

There, as elsewhere in the hemisphere, Mr. Chávez has used Venezuela's oil riches to win friends and influence. He has bought more than $1.5 billion in Argentine bonds, flown poor slum residents to receive medical care abroad and proposed a new regional development bank to make low-interest loans.

In contrast, American assistance for the region has lagged far behind. Mr. Hadley said that the United States has nearly doubled aid to the region since President Bush took office to $1.6 billion annually, although he acknowledged that figure was slated to drop next fiscal year. But recent research by the Washington Office on Latin America, a group that is often critical of American policy in the region, found that the largest portion of money has gone to Colombia for military and counterdrug assistance, that Congress has consistently trimmed aid requests, and that not all funds authorized have been disbursed.

On Monday, Mr. Bush announced several relatively small new initiatives that he would ask Congress to finance. They included $75 million for a new education program promoting study in the United States, $385 million for programs promoting home ownership for low income families, and the development of a health care training facility in Panama to serve all of Central America.

"In the short term, Chávez has more to offer because our aid is peanuts," said Riordan Roett, director of the Latin American studies program at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies in Washington. "We're talking hundreds of thousands of dollars, and he's tossing around a billion here and a billion there."

Mr. Bush's shift away from an almost exclusive focus on free trade, with its calls for austerity and sacrifice in return for access to the American market, also reflects domestic political realities. His trade promotion authority expires in July, and there are doubts about Congress's willingness to approve free trade agreements that have been signed with Colombia, Peru and Panama.

"It would not be realistic to expect much" from Mr. Bush's visit, said Mr. Lampreia, the former Brazilian foreign minister. "But there is a fresh look at Latin America, very much derived from the fact Chávez is there, and a new approach that is positive, which is a good thing."

Bush Prepares For Trip To Latin America (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

He talked of grinding poverty and called it "a scandal" that democracy and capitalism have not delivered more to Latin Americans. The working poor need change, he declared. He invoked Simon Bolivar, the "great liberator," and vowed to "complete the revolution" and bring true "social justice" to the region

Hugo Chavez? No, George W. Bush.

As he prepares to embark on a six-day trip to Latin America this week, the president is launching a new campaign to compete with Chavez for the region's hearts and minds, employing language mirroring the Venezuelan leader's leftist populism but rooted in traditional American conservatism. After six years of focusing elsewhere in the world, Bush in his final two years wants to convince the nation's neighbors that, as he put it yesterday, "we care."

DOJ_NMG_0140931

But he faces an enormous gulf between ambition and reality, analysts say. While Bush cited John F. Kennedy's effort to help lift up the region through the Alliance for Progress, the president has limited tools at this point. He offered some modest initiatives on education, housing and health care yesterday; but the new Democratic Congress has shown no eagerness to ratify three new free-trade pacts he has brokered with the region. And many in Latin America have already rendered their judgments about Bush and are awaiting his successor.

"It's a visit after six-plus years of neglect," Sidney Weintraub, a longtime U.S. diplomat and specialist in the region, said at a forum sponsored by the Inter-American Dialogue center yesterday. "There's little that the Latin Americans expect from him anymore."

Bush wants to counter that perception with a message of empathy for Latin Americans who have not seen much benefit from free markets and elections -- the core constituency that has fueled the rise of Chavez and other leftists in the region, such as Evo Morales in Bolivia and Daniel Ortega in Nicaragua. One in four Latin Americans lives on $2 a day or less.

"In an age of growing prosperity and abundance, this is a scandal -- and it's a challenge," Bush said yesterday in a speech previewing his trip to the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. "The fact is that tens of millions of our brothers and sisters to the south have seen little improvement in their daily lives. And this has led some to question the value of democracy."

Bush never used Cha¡vez's name but cited his hero, Bolivar, and implicitly seemed to offer an alternative in an address spiced with Spanish phrases. "The millions across our hemisphere who every day suffer the degradations of poverty and hunger have a right to be impatient," he said. "And I'm going to make them this pledge: The goal of this great country, the goal of a country full of generous people, is an Americas where the dignity of every person is respected, where all find room at the table and where opportunity reaches into every village and every home."

Bush announced an additional $75 million over three years to teach more Latin Americans to speak English and help them study in the United States, and an additional $385 million to help underwrite mortgages for working families in Mexico, Brazil, Chile and Central America. He also said he will order the USNS Comfort, a U.S. Navy hospital ship, to make port calls in 12 Caribbean and Latin American countries to treat 85,000 patients and perform 1,500 operations.

"The president wants to show a rededication to Latin America," said Peter DeShazo, who was deputy assistant secretary of state for the Western Hemisphere in Bush's first term and is now a scholar at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "This comes at a time when there's a widespread sense that the administration hasn't paid a lot of attention to Latin America, which is understandable because of Iraq. . . . This is a signal. They're trying to show they're committed to the region."

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley disputed the premise that the administration has neglected Latin America, but he agreed that the government's efforts have been overshadowed by the Middle East and other issues. "It's not gotten the attention it deserves," he said. "That's one of the reasons we're doing this trip."

Hadley and other White House officials said it is not an anti-Chavez tour, but the Venezuelan leader may yet haunt the president along the way. Chavez, who called Bush "the devil" during a U.N. speech last year, has suggested that he would send sulfur to Brazil and plans to lead a protest in Argentina when the president arrives in neighboring Uruguay.

Bush will leave for Brazil on Thursday and will then travel to Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico before returning March 14. In Sao Paulo, he will seal a deal with Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva to help Central American and Caribbean nations develop ethanol, an alternative to oil that has become a big focus of Bush's energy plan. Although Bush has been to Colombia before, he will be the first U.S. president since Ronald Reagan in 1982 to visit Bogota, a decision intended to showcase improvements in security in a country torn by civil war and cocaine trafficking -- although he will not spend the night.

When he visits Mexico, he will bypass Mexico City, where his presence would surely generate large protests, and instead meet with President Felipe Calderon in the Yucatan city of Merida. It will be the first meeting between the two since Calderon was inaugurated, and the session is bound to be marked by tension over the U.S. political debate on immigration. Bush has pushed for easing rules for illegal immigrants but has also signed legislation calling for more barriers along the border.

The itinerary will put Bush in the same room with both leftist and rightist leaders, a schedule intended to show that he can work with any "right-thinking governments," as Hadley put it, that support democracy and reasonable economic policies. To further make that point, Bush plans to host Lula at Camp David at the end of the month, making him the first Latin American leader at the presidential retreat in 16 years.

In some ways, the trip will bring Bush full circle from his days as a candidate in 2000, when he cited his experience as governor of Texas and vowed a robust engagement with the region. "Latin America was going to be more than just an afterthought -- remember those days?" said Michael Shifter, a vice president of Inter-American Dialogue. "I think he's going to try to repair some of the damage. . . . There has been a lot of damage in terms of distrust with the region over the last couple years, and I think he wants to keep that in check."

Bush To Visit Latin America, Chavez's Backyard (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush, eager to counter the growing influence of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, declared Monday that he was heading to Latin America this week as a social reformer committed to alleviating poverty and social injustice.

The emphasis on addressing inequality marks a shift for the president, who has been assailed for stressing free trade and democracy south of the border and ignoring the social ills that continue to stymie the region.

"For too long and in too many places, opportunity in Latin America has been determined by the accident of birth rather than by the application of talents and initiative," Bush said in a speech to the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce.

Bush is set to leave Thursday on a weeklong hemispheric trek that is to include stops in Brazil, Colombia, Uruguay, Guatemala and Mexico.

Bush's itinerary doesn't include Venezuela, but the pugnacious Chavez, who has used his oil riches to take up the mantle of Fidel Castro and generations of Yanqui-bashers, looms large in a region Washington has historically considered its "backyard."

With no major trade deal or political breakthrough imminent, Bush in effect has signaled his intention to present a counter-version of Chavez's well-crafted image of a social crusader standing up to U.S. "imperialism" at every opportunity.

However, Bush, whose poll numbers are at least as bad in Latin America as at home, is likely to meet skepticism and protests as he tries to portray a kinder, gentler face of U.S. policy.

"Evidently the principal reason for Bush's trip to the region is to try and put back together the United States' network of alliances in Latin America, where Chavez's influence is stronger each day," said Atilio Boron, an Argentine political analyst.

A top Bush administration official rejected the widely held notion in Latin America that the president's longest trip to the region is aimed at checking the influence of Chavez.

"We want to remind people that there is another side to U.S. policy," said the senior U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

While the Bush administration has been tied down in the Middle East, Chavez has helped redraw Latin America's political map, in large part by doling out billions of dollars' worth of oil subsidies for allied nations and re-energizing socialist strategies consigned to the scrap heap a decade ago. Critics call his influence overblown, but Chavez has befriended a new generation of populist and leftist leaders and inspired political allies from Panama City to Santiago, Chile.

Chavez has also reached out to U.S. archenemy Iran, embarked on a buying spree of Russian arms and cemented an oil deal with China, at a time when Chinese trade in the region is surging and Asia is seen as an alternative to U.S. markets.

Chavez's voluble followers have vowed to take to the streets during Bush's trip, just as tens of thousands applauded Chavez's tirades against "Mr. Danger" during the U.S. president's 2005 trip, in which a disappointed Bush failed to persuade South America's major economic powers to join a hemispheric trade zone.

Unlike most of the president's previous trips to the region, this one is not built around a large multinational conference. Instead, Bush will meet one-on-one with the leader of each nation and take time to visit cultural sites and engage long-marginalized minority and indigenous populations.

Bush's first stop, Brazil, holds significance on several fronts, beyond that nation's position as Latin America's largest and most populous nation, and the world's ninth-largest economy.

Washington and Brasilia are launching a biofuels partnership that could lessen the sway of Venezuela and its vast oil and gas reserves and heighten the regional standing of President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva. Despite his left-wing roots as a labor leader, the Brazilian leader has embraced free-market policies and is viewed in the White House as a Bush ally who is a moderate alternative to Chavez.

The prospective U.S.-Brazilian biofuels pact, with possible accords on future markets and technology sharing, constitutes the White House's first major foray into the raging Latin American energy debate. It also signals a shift, or at least a detour, from Washington's dominant post-Cold War concerns: drug interdiction, free trade and immigration.

But despite the buzz about an "ethanol OPEC" composed of the two countries that produce about 70% of the world's ethanol, the administration faces a daunting task in countering Chavez's standing as a major supplier of crude oil in a world that still runs on petroleum.

Even temperate leftist regimes, such as those in Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Chile, have maintained cordial relations with Chavez while pursuing a more measured path.

Paying lip service to Chavez's anti-globalization rhetoric also provides regional leaders with "ideological cover" to appease their own leftist blocs, said Bruce Bagley, a political scientist at the University of Miami. Thus, Argentine President Nestor Kirchner's broadsides against the "dictatorship" of the International Monetary Fund draw no public rebuke from Washington.

State Department officials have boasted of a Kennedy-esque "Pan-Americanism" for the 21st century, and Bush on Monday outlined a program offering tens of millions of dollars in scholarship aid and mortgage assistance, and a regional health initiative.

But that promise is no match for Chavez's tangible largesse, be it cheap oil for Cubans, doctors and teachers for Bolivians or a $3-billion bond purchase to help prop up Argentina. Chavez also has promised subsidies to newly elected leftist governments in Ecuador and Nicaragua.

In return, he has gained some measure of the international legitimacy he craves.

He has embraced Iran and championed a political and economic bloc aligned against U.S. supremacy, and even his failed effort last year to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council provided him with a bully pulpit. In the meantime, the State Department denounced Venezuela last week as soft on drug trafficking.

The Chavez-sponsored trip of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to Latin America in January stunned many U.S. officials, whose view of Chavez's global evangelization quickly shifted from disparaging bemusement to alarm about a potential security threat.

(INFOBOX BELOW)

The diplomacy of largesse

Venezuela's Hugo Chavez has helped redraw Latin America's political map, in large part by doling out billions of dollars in oil subsidies for allied nations and re-energizing socialist strategies.

Refineries

Chavez has promised to build or finance refineries in more than half a dozen countries, including Panama, India, Brazil and Jamaica. None is under construction.

Gas pipeline of the south

Chavez has promised to invest in a $25-billion, 6,000-mile pipeline to send Venezuelan natural gas to Argentina. Venezuela does not have the proven gas reserves to keep the pipeline full.

Cut-rate petroleum

Chavez is sending or has promised to send discounted oil or refined products to Ecuador, as well as Cuba and more than a dozen other Caribbean nations. He also is sending subsidized fuel oil to the poor in New York and Massachusetts.

Bonds

Chavez has purchased more than $3 billion in Argentine bonds.

Medical care

Chavez is underwriting the cost of sending Cuban doctors to Venezuela and Bolivia, and is paying for eye operations in Cuba for hundreds of poor patients from countries including Panama and Bolivia.

Bush Says Aid Boost To Go With Latin America Trip (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

President Bush yesterday announced that his five-country trip to Latin America will be accompanied by an increase in U.S. aid to the region, to promote "social justice," democracy and increased economic opportunity.

"Tens of millions of our brothers and sisters to the South have seen little improvement in their daily lives. This has led some to question the value of democracy," Mr. Bush said. "It is in our national interests ... to help the people in democracies in our neighborhood succeed."

"In too many places ... a government official is seen as somebody who serves himself, or serves only the rich and the well-connected," Mr. Bush said. "We're working with our partners to change old patterns and ensure that government serves all its citizens."

Mr. Bush, who leaves for Brazil Thursday and returns March 14, announced he is sending a U.S. Navy hospital ship -- the USNS Comfort -- to 13 South and Central American countries, to treat an expected 85,000 patients and perform an estimated 1,500 surgeries. Mr. Bush also will visit Colombia, Guatemala, Mexico and Uruguay.

In addition, the United States will spend $75 million over three years to teach English to young Latin Americans, and bring students to the United States on scholarships. The United States will also spend $385 million to increase homeownership and is working with Latin American banks to increase loans to small businesses.

Bush administration officials denied that the president's weeklong trip has been prompted by concerns about anti-American leaders such as Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, or by resentment that the United States has not paid enough attention to the region.

"[The president] has been involved and committed to Latin America throughout his presidency," said National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley, who said Mr. Bush's focus on the region "has not gotten the attention it deserves."

But regional analysts said both Mr. Chavez and weak U.S. relations with the region are driving the president's trip.

Eric Farnsworth, vice president of the Council of Americas, an advocacy group for businesses with interests in Latin America, said "the specter of Chavez [is] overhanging the region right now," and that "the standing of the United States in the region has decreased."

Mr. Farnsworth, however, applauded Mr. Bush's speech, which he said pushes back against Mr. Chavez's populism in the right way.

"You can't have a year of engagement every six or seven years and think it's going to answer the mail," Mr. Restrepo said.

Mr. Bush's policies, Mr. Restrepo said, "aren't particularly bold given the holes that we've dug over the last few years."

Mr. Bush made no mention of his plans to encourage Brazil to increase ethanol production for alternative fuels, and made only passing mention of the need for immigration reform.

"I think that was a very important statement, because it shows that at least for this trip there really does seem to be an emphasis on social development in the hemisphere, and that's something that is new and positive," Mr. Farnsworth said.

G.O.P. Shift Is Seen On Trade (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 5 — When the Democrats swept to victory last fall, after a campaign fueled partly by attacks on President Bush's trade policies, trade deals promoted by the administration seemed doomed in the new Congress. But that was then.

In the last week, the administration and its Republican allies on Capitol Hill have signaled a new willingness to work with Democrats to try to secure their support for three pending trade deals — with Panama, Peru and Colombia. The focus of their talks has been guarantees for the rights of workers in countries with which the United States has negotiated trade accords, including a ban on child labor and forced labor.

"There's no question that there's been a change on the Republican side," Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said Monday. "They refused to talk about these things before, and now they're talking."

But it is still not clear how Democrats will respond. Mr. Rangel said that they remained highly skeptical about signs of Republican flexibility on trade and that he had not seen anything "acceptable to a broad number of members" on his side.

"The question will be whether, at the end of the day, things really have changed," he added. "So far the answer would be no."

Mr. Rangel's Republican counterpart on the Ways and Means panel, Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana, was more hopeful.

"We've made a lot of progress, but we certainly have not concluded our efforts," he said Monday. "I'm very encouraged by what's happened so far."

The talks over labor standards were due to accelerate this week, with Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative, on one side, and Mr. Rangel and Mr. McCrery on the other. Another crucial negotiator is Representative Sander M. Levin, a Michigan Democrat who is chairman of the trade subcommittee of Ways and Means.

DOJ_NMG_0140935

The negotiators are trying to complete a broad agreement leading to passage of the Panama, Peru and Colombia deals before the end of March.

They are striving for language that would guarantee the right to organize and would ban child labor and forced labor for American trading partners. Such rights were incorporated into trade deals negotiated by President Bill Clinton in the 1990s, and upward of 90 Democrats in the House voted to approve them.

But for the last six years, the Bush administration and the Republican Congressional leadership refused to include any such guarantees in trade deals, and few Democrats voted for them. An accord lowering tariff barriers between the United States and Caribbean countries passed by only two votes in the Republican-led House in 2005.

Administration officials say they recognize that without flexibility on labor, trade deals are dead. But if language on labor rights is negotiated that is acceptable to Democrats and the administration, it could become a "template" for future deals, including a possible global trade accord that is still being negotiated.

There would even be a chance, administration officials say, for incorporating such language into approval of Mr. Bush's request to renew his authority to negotiate trade deals and get an expedited vote for them. That authority expires June 30, and Democrats say they would not support it right now.

An administration official, asking not to be identified while discussing the talks, also insisted that some progress had been made. "They're not there yet, but both sides are trying to look at the options available to make it happen," he said.

But Democrats assert that there has not been as much progress as Republicans are saying, and that they do not want to be stampeded.

Both sides say that there is a fundamental impasse over insistence by Democrats that the trade deals be amended to incorporate a requirement that a trading-partner country adhere to International Labor Organization standards, including the right to organize, and the ban on slave labor, child labor and employment discrimination.

The administration responded first by offering language requiring a country to adhere to its own labor laws, a concession rejected by Democrats. The administration now is offering to require that countries adhere to the "equivalent" of American laws.

Representative Levin, the Democratic chairman of the trade subcommittee, said Monday that the equivalency requirement would open a huge loophole. "They continue to resist addressing the basic issue," he said of the administration.

But the administration, backed by industry groups, charges that organized labor is working with Democrats to adopt standards that are really aimed at loosening American restrictions on labor at home. A generous labor amendment could lead to challenges against American laws that bar strikes by American government employees, they say.

"They don't want this to be a boomerang that rewrites U.S. labor laws," the administration official said.

Another issue is whether any guarantees on labor rights would be incorporated in the body of the three pending trade agreements, requiring them to be renegotiated, or adopted as a side letter as Republicans want. Democrats say only embodying them in the negotiated accords would make them enforceable.

Democrats caution. meanwhile, that even if a breakthrough occurs on labor issues, the Colombia, Panama and Peru deals must also be amended in other ways, particularly by adding a requirement respecting environmental regulations in the trading-partner countries.

Other concerns of the Democrats and of organized labor include clauses in the trade deals that critics say would permit lawsuits in the United States that could undermine American laws, like those requiring prevailing wages for contracts on which foreign countries might bid.

"If the Democrats fix the labor piece, they have to start talking about the other things that are also extremely important to us," said Thea M. Lee, chief international economist for the A.F.L.-C.I.O.

That organization, which has long charged that labor deals have led to a loss of American jobs, is scheduled to reiterate its criticism of the administration's approach on trade at a convention on Tuesday, and to warn Democrats not to take its support for granted, especially with a presidential election heating up.

Democrats say they doubt that the administration would be prepared to let Ms. Schwab, who has been in the job for only eight months, negotiate a deal that would be so politically sensitive.

The administration has been adamantly opposed to Democratic attempts to push for the agenda of organized labor. Vice President Dick Cheney, for example, has asserted that President Bush will veto a bill recently approved in the House that would make it easier for workers to form unions without holding a secret ballot.

In addition, the administration has opposed Democratic attempts to expand the rights of workers to organize and keep control over their work rules in the new Homeland Security Department. The White House political strategy has long seen organized labor as the Democrats' most loyal constituency.

Some Democrats say they do not think the White House will agree to any of the changes they are pushing until there is involvement in the negotiations by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., a leading advocate of trade deals in many speeches, or by the advisers around President Bush like Karl Rove.

Administration officials, on the other hand, say they do not trust the Democrats and worry that if they give in on organized labor, the leadership under Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, and Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, will find other reasons to oppose trade deals for fear of antagonizing organized labor.

Freshmen To Meet With Rangel, Who Is Pressured To Win Concessions From Bush Administration (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, March 6, 2007

Freshman Democrats seeking a direct role in congressional trade policy have won a meeting this week with Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.).

No freshmen sit on the prestigious Ways and Means Committee, which oversees trade policy, but class members pressed for a role in trade in a Jan. 17 letter to Rangel that said opposition to the Bush administration's trade policies had been "vital to our electoral successes."

A spokesman for freshman Rep. Betty Sutton (D-Ohio), a former labor lawyer who has led the freshman efforts, said the meeting was scheduled with the hope that all 39 Democrats who signed the Jan. 17 letter would be able to attend. Spokesman Linden Zakula described the meeting as a positive step and said Sutton was optimistic it would be constructive.

The meeting with the freshmen is the latest sign of the pressure Rangel is under from members of his own caucus to win concessions from the Bush administration on trade that go beyond talks on the labor provisions of pending trade deals, which have dominated the debate.

For example, House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) is preparing a letter to U.S. Trade Representative (USTR) Susan Schwab demanding changes to provisions affecting generic drugs in the pending Colombia and Peru free-trade deals. He sees the pending free-trade agreements (FTAs) as setting up hurdles to poor countries accessing generic drugs.

Several House aides described the labor talks as only a starting point if the administration wants to move any free-trade deals through Congress. "If they want to be able to pass FTAs in this Congress, USTR will have to open their eyes to other issues," one House aide said.

Reps. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.), Mike Michaud (D-Maine) and Tom Allen (D-Maine) are also circulating a letter to Rangel and trade subcommittee Chairman Sandy Levin (D-Mich.) asking for changes to the environmental chapter of the Peru deal. They say safeguards must be included in the agreement to prevent oil exploration, logging and other activities from threatening endangered plant and animal species in Peru.

Separately, Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a leading Democratic voice on Iraq and a close ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), has called for changes to the Peru FTA intended to prevent enterprises there from investing in U.S. landside port activities.

Privately, representatives of organized labor, environmental organizations and advocacy groups have been wary that Rangel may be cornering himself by emphasizing the labor talks with the administration. If a deal on labor is reached, the administration could charge that Democrats are moving the goalposts if they demand other changes.

Partly because of the activity from other members, some activists are feeling confident that trade deals will have to include more than changes to labor to pass muster with Rangel.

"I would say we're cautiously optimistic that he's ready to take on the environmental issues," David Waskow of Friends of the Earth said of Rangel. At the same time, Waskow added, "It would be helpful for those issues to be addressed in a more public way by Rangel."

The pressure comes at a critical time for the Bush administration, which has been negotiating with Rangel over the labor standards that should be included in pending FTAs with Peru and Colombia. The administration, with some input from Ways and Means ranking member Jim McCrery (R-La.), came forward with a proposal last week, but Democrats initially indicated it was insufficient.

If the administration cannot reach an agreement with Rangel by the end of this month, it also could make it more difficult for USTR to conclude negotiations with Korea on a deal that could be submitted to Congress under fast track. The Korean FTA talks must be concluded by the end of the month to be submitted under fast track.

U.N. Official Discusses Brazil Biofuel (AP)

By Michael Astor
AP, March 6, 2007

A proposed ethanol alliance that President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva is expected to forge with President Bush later this week poses both opportunities and risks for the environment, a top U.N. environmental official said Monday.

Achim Steiner, executive director of the U.N. Environment Program, said growing international demands for ethanol and other biofuels can threaten the Amazon rain forest if safeguards are not put in place because the world's largest remaining tropical wilderness is a target area for agriculture.

Brazil's main biofuel is ethanol made from sugarcane. While sugarcane cultivation is minimal now in the Amazon, some environmentalists fear that growing demands for the fuel could push cane growers into the rainforest.

"I think at the end of the day ... it's a question of whether the Amazon is sufficiently protected and whether the expansion of the ethanol production happens in the context of government policies that try and direct that growth potential in a sustainable base," Steiner told The Associated Press after meeting with Brazil's ministers of environment, energy and foreign relations in the capital of Brasilia.

Bush and Silva are expected to forge an "ethanol alliance" Friday aimed at creating quality standards for the alternative fuel, while joining forces to promote production of ethanol in nations lying between Brazil and the United States.

Brazil is the world's second-biggest producer of ethanol after the United States, and is the biggest exporter. The country has also taken the lead in producing soybean-based biodiesel.

Steiner praised Brazil for reducing Amazon deforestation by 11 percent last year. But many environmentalists say much of the reduction in deforestation was due to an overvalued currency and stagnant prices for soybeans on the international market, which made it far less lucrative to cut down remote forest plots to grow soy beans.

In the near term, soybean growers likely will continue to expand into the Amazon as farmland in Brazil's south and central regions move to sugarcane, which requires greater infrastructure.

"While the whole process of alcohol fuel is less damaging to the climate than fuel from gasoline or oil, what can be positive for the environment can turn negative depending on the extension of the plantations," said Paulo Adario, director of the Greenpeace's Amazon Campaign.

The Amazon region, which covers nearly 60 percent of Brazil, has lost 20 percent of its forest — 1.6 million square miles — to development, logging and farming.

Guatemala To Ask Bush For Drug Fight Aid (AP)

By Juan Carlos Llorca
AP, March 6, 2007

Guatemala knows it is losing the battle against drug trafficking — its police, military and justice system are beholden to traffickers who use the country as a way station for Colombian drug shipments to the U.S.

In a case that has laid bare the extent of corruption in the Central American nation, FBI agents are trying to help discover who ordered the murders of three Salvadoran politicians and the Guatemalan police officers who said they were told to kill them.

The killings and apparent cover-up has exposed the seemingly insurmountable challenges President Oscar Berger faces as he tries to regain control of a defiant and even criminal police force.

"We were shocked by the brutality of the killings, but it was really no surprise to us that organized crime has infiltrated the government," Vice President Eduardo Stein said.

FBI officials met with Guatemalan and Salvadoran authorities last week to discuss the case of the three slain politicians and to offer the help of six forensic scientists, who are to arrive this week. They "will help us in every aspect of the investigation, from crime scene evidence collection to the tests that we need to run," lead prosecutor Alvaro Matus said.

Many suspect the nation's powerful drug gangs are behind the Feb. 19 killings of three Salvadoran members of the Central American Parliament and their driver, whose charred bodies were dumped just outside the capital.

Four police officers, including the head of the Guatemalan National Police, confessed to the killings after a satellite transponder in their unmarked squad car put them at the scene of the crime. But before they could testify against anyone else, they were killed inside their cells.

Witnesses said masked gunmen from outside the prison stormed the high-security facility; another theory is that imprisoned gang members carried out the slayings using weapons hidden inside their cells.

Guatemalan officials have detained two dozen guards and the prison's director for questioning, fired the head of the criminal investigations unit and forced the country's second-highest police official to resign. But they appear no closer to identifying who ordered the string of killings.

Berger says he needs more help in fighting organized crime and will ask President Bush when he visits March 12 to provide U.S. helicopters, planes and radar equipment.

The U.S. government complains that three-quarters of the cocaine reaching U.S. consumers moves through Guatemala. Traffickers use speed boats and planes to carry tons of drugs along the narrow Central American isthmus, dropping off shipments in the Guatemalan jungle before sneaking them into Mexico and up across the U.S. border.

Guatemala relies on a U.S. system of radar-equipped planes to track these drug shipments, but much of those resources have been redirected to support the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. And even when radar does detect traffickers, Guatemala lacks planes and helicopters to intercept the drugs.

Berger took office three years ago promising to reverse the drug policies of his predecessor, Alfonso Portillo, whose lack of action against smuggling prompted Washington to drop Guatemala from its list of anti-narcotics allies. But interdictions fell sharply last year to 620 pounds of cocaine, compared with more than nine tons in 2003 and four tons in 2004.

Guatemalan authorities argue that seizures are not a good measure of their anti-drug efforts because in the past, traffickers have offered corrupt authorities huge amounts of cocaine to stage busts.

Guatemala has tried to change that by purging police forces — including its elite anti-narcotics unit. In 2005, the group's director, Adan Castillo, was arrested in Virginia for conspiring to import cocaine to the U.S. and his 401 agents were given drug and lie detectors tests. Only 50 passed.

Part of the problem is a culture of violence, fueled in part by youth gangs that flourished here after their members were deported from Los Angeles, and a brutal civil war that ended 10 years ago and claimed more than 200,000 lives, mostly civilian. Many allege the death squads during the nearly four-decade conflict live on, inside the nation's police forces.

National Police director Erwin Sperissen says anti-corruption efforts are further complicated because judges often reinstate police officers who have been fired, creating a revolving door of impunity.

In an attempt to counteract that, Guatemala and the United Nations are working to create an International Commission Against Impunity in Guatemala, an independent office that would use foreign investigators to investigate organized crime and police agencies corrupted by criminal organizations. Guatamala's Congress must still approve the U.S.-backed proposal.

At the U.S. government's request, the Guatemalan Congress has passed laws to strengthen law enforcement's investigative abilities, such as allowing undercover agents and phone taps. Guatemala's Interior Ministry has yet to implement the measures, however.

The Short Road From Hostage To Envoy (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, March 5 -- Just weeks ago, Fernando Araújo's only connection to the outside world was his shortwave radio. In six years as a hostage of Marxist rebels, his life had been reduced to a grim routine of forced marches, a diet of soggy beans and rice and the realization that freedom might never come.

Now, after a confused and miraculous dash to freedom that has captivated Colombians, Araújo has become foreign minister, a critical post in a country highly dependent on foreign aid, especially from Washington. When President Bush arrives here on Sunday to meet with President Ãlvaro Uribe, he will also meet a man who is a potent symbol for the hundreds of hostages, including three Americans, still in rebel hands.

In the two months since his escape, Araújo has scrambled to catch up with a world of new technology and shifting geopolitics. He has learned about iPods, and that cellphones take pictures. He has marveled that Google Earth displays the mountains where he was held. He has also gone through emotional lows.

"There are things that hurt, and things that surprise," said Araújo, who was sworn in last week. "What's hurt me? The people who died, the friends and acquaintances I had. For me, they all died in one month because I learned about them all in a short period of time."

He also had to face what he long feared -- that his wife had left him, a revelation he called his first painful blow since emerging from the bush haggard and dehydrated on Jan. 5.

In a relaxed meeting last week with a group of foreign correspondents, Araújo, 51, bespectacled and trim in a blue pinstripe suit, was affable and frank, often answering questions with panache. When an attractive female reporter asked him if he expected to fall in love again, a reference to the loss of his wife, he quipped: "Of course. Are you single?"

But Araújo also talked of having to undergo physical and psychological exams while adjusting to his newfound freedom. "Sometimes I dream about my kidnappers, and I have nightmares," he acknowledged.

Araújo was 45, a successful businessman and former minister of development in President Andres Pastrana's administration when two men forced him into a car on a street in Cartagena on Dec. 4, 2000. For most of the next six years, he was transported from one camp to another in the Maria Mountains, a heavily forested coastal range laden with land mines.

His only contact with those he left behind were the radio programs in which the families of kidnapping victims talk to their loved ones, filling them with hope. He exercised religiously. He also listened to the news programs of Caracol Radio, Colombia's main network, the BBC, Radio Netherlands and others.

"It was a way to stay busy, to carry out mental exercises, to follow those themes," he said. "For me, it was very important."

In December, Uribe contacted Araújo's family to inform them that military intelligence had located the camp where he was being held. Army commanders wanted to attempt a rescue but needed the family's permission, because rebels have killed captives in the past when the military has approached. The family approved, and on Dec. 31, helicopters carrying troops descended on the camp.

"When the helicopters attacked, I felt it was the chance I had been waiting for," Araújo said.

With the guerrillas momentarily distracted, Araújo dashed into the bush, where he spent the next five days wandering, eventually reaching the hamlet of San Agustin. He approached a farmer, who led him to the outside world. None of his captors was ever arrested.

As foreign minister, Araújo is expected to speak passionately about a crime that the largest rebel group here, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, has long used to generate ransom money and wield leverage to win the release of jailed guerrillas.

Two rebel groups and assorted criminal organizations hold hundreds of people against their will, most for ransom. But the FARC, as the main rebel group is known, is also holding about 60 big-name captives as bargaining chips.

Araújo was among them. The rebels' most valuable hostage is Ingrid Betancourt, a senator with Colombian and French citizenship, who has been held for five years; at time of her abduction, she was a presidential candidate. Also in FARC hands are three Americans -- Marc Gonsalves, Keith Stansell and Thomas Howes -- who were working for the Pentagon when their plane went down in rebel territory in 2003.

Yolanda Pulecio, Betancourt's mother, said she does not know Araújo personally and is unclear whether his appointment will benefit the families of kidnapping victims, who have clashed with Uribe over the government's inability to reach a deal with rebels.

"He knows what kidnapping is, what families suffer, what this signifies, and also the great danger that a rescue can mean for the victims," said Pulecio. "I can't say if he'll help us or not help us. For the government, his appointment helps its image."

Araújo said one of his most important tasks will be to explain the difficult challenges the Uribe government faces in reaching a deal with the rebels. "The important thing is to change the perception and show the world that those who are responsible for these people not being freed are the kidnappers themselves," said Araújo.

Araújo will also be the international face of a government that has been whipsawed by a widening scandal that has linked several members of Congress, the head of the intelligence service and other officials with right-wing paramilitary groups. Indeed, Araújo was named foreign minister because the brother of the former foreign minister, MarÃ-a Consuelo Araújo, who is not related, has been charged with collaborating with paramilitary groups.

Araújo might seem an odd choice for the post. He's missed key events in recent world history, from the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon to the invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq. He was in guerrilla hands as President Hugo Chavez consolidated power in neighboring Venezuela and when Uribe rose to power. Araújo also does not speak English fluently, usually imperative for an official who will make frequent trips to Washington.

He did not play down the shortcomings but said he is scrambling to prepare by reading books on diplomacy and talking to former foreign ministers. And he noted that, over the past few years, the radio programs he listened to helped him keep up with at least some current events.

"Maybe the six years as a captive prepared me to be foreign minister," Araújo said.

Bolivia's Rural Women Are Remaking Cities, Lives (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, March 6, 2007

EL ALTO, Bolivia -- The women attending Esperanza Mitta's community meetings moved here from tiny mountain villages and worn-out mining towns, and now they are fashioning a modern metropolis out of whatever they have in hand.

Toilet paper serves as decorative bunting on the walls of their meeting hall. A rocky vacant lot, surrounded by several leafless trees, serves as their "central plaza." A nearby soccer goal, recently used by neighborhood vigilantes to hang a thief, is considered a local law enforcement tool.

For all the ways they have changed this city, though, the women have altered their own lives even more.

"We don't have educations, so we get together and talk about how we can teach ourselves skills," said Mitta, 51. "A lot of the women just need to work out some of the fears that they have about living in a city, and they all do it, little by little."

For the first time in the world's history, more people next year will live in cities than in rural areas, according to U.N. population experts. Women are leading the urban push, leaving the countryside at higher rates than men, lured in large part by domestic service jobs. They tend to gravitate to places like this: a sprawling expanse in a developing nation struggling to provide basic infrastructure.

Because of people like Mitta, this former hamlet is now larger than the neighboring city of La Paz. El Alto had a population of about 11,000 in 1950, exploded to about 400,000 people by the 1990s and could surpass the 1 million mark next year, according to city officials. The majority of houses lack indoor plumbing and sewer service. Collecting local taxes to pay for services is difficult because about 70 percent of the economy is off-the-books.

It was in those conditions that Mitta started organizing women's meetings several years ago. About 30 of her neighbors get together to talk, many of them dressed in the same shawls and pleated skirts they wore in the indigenous communities where they were born. Newcomers are often shy; the lifestyle changes they are going through can be so overwhelming that they don't know where to start. Unlike some of the men, who had held jobs that exposed them to broader social systems, many of the women had rarely strayed from immediate family and neighbors before moving here.

"The women have to make a lot more changes than the men when they move to a city like this," acknowledged David Apaza, whose family is part of the migration wave to El Alto. "In the countryside, they've lived the same way for hundreds of years, but everything is different here."

The process of change can send women's personal relationships into dizzying spins, but it also can give them collective opportunities previously unknown. One of the most important things they have found in these unpaved streets, many said, is something unimaginable in the countryside: a voice.Social Transformation

El Alto stretches across a plateau more than 13,000 feet above sea level. In the early evening, one's gaze is drawn to the distance -- snow-covered peaks, the lights of La Paz flickering in a bowl-shaped valley below. The immediate surroundings are less inviting: an imprecise grid of dirt streets, block after block of low-slung adobe and brick houses, abandoned tires, stray dogs nosing through trash piles.

Mitta's neighborhood is known as Villa Mercedes G, and she lives there with about 10,000 other people. She commutes each day in a series of minibuses to a housekeeping job in La Paz. The trip -- an hour and a half each way -- consumes nearly a third of her monthly salary of about $50.

One recent evening, she arrived at her simple two-bedroom brick home as the sun disappeared behind the mountains. In the electric light of the kitchen, her husband, Celadonio, stood before a stove spreading dough to make fritters for their dinner. His sun-browned hands were gloved in white flour. His left hand was missing a finger, the result of an accident when he worked in a copper mine.

"He cooks," Mitta said, and behind the frame of her glasses her eyebrow arched playfully. "He also washes clothes. We do things together because we both have to work so much."

Times have changed since Mitta became one of El Alto's urban pioneers, seeking opportunity after the mine where Celadonio worked closed in the mid-1980s. Her evolution -- replicated thousands of times over by the multitudes who follow the same route -- started as soon as she reached El Alto's point of entry and main commercial drag, La Ceja.

Then, as now, it was a sensory riot: Minibuses loaded beyond capacity nudge bumpers while jockeying for space. Street vendors hawk tea, watches, T-shirts, chickens and just about everything else. At night, men and women spill out of dance halls, the dark mud underfoot sucking at their heels. Witnessing a spontaneous street fight is the norm, not the exception.

It's a heady gateway for newcomers from mines or subsistence farms who never carried a coin in their pocket. The transition into a monetary society -- which usually occurred over generations in most developed nations -- happens immediately here.

"When a woman moves here, she can't be a housewife and take care of her family like she used to -- she has to work to survive," Mitta said.

Celadonio couldn't find a job at first after they arrived. But Mitta agreed to clean the offices of a nongovernmental organization, in exchange for a room where the couple and their four children could sleep and a little bit of food. She worked from 5 a.m. to 10 p.m. seven days a week for three years. Eventually, Celadonio found work at a minibus station, and Mitta landed her housecleaning job in La Paz.

"The men at first don't want the women to work," Mitta said. "There's a lot of chauvinism, and they often treat the women badly. I have seen so many separations. I almost split with my husband -- twice. The kids always suffer, because they are alone so much. This isn't just my family that I'm talking about -- the majority of families go through this."

Her women's group meets about once a week. The variety of topics is wide: nutrition, cooking with the different types of foods available in the city, the challenges of raising children in an urban environment. Delinquency is a problem, they say. Some blame it on the hours they have to work away from home.

Conversations like theirs could probably be overheard in any city, because the women here increasingly conform to universal urban prototypes. Their personal transformations -- particularly the shift in emphasis away from complete dedication to family -- have become visible in national statistics. The Bolivian fertility rate, for example, has dropped from about 6.5 children for each woman to about 3.9 over the past 30 years. In the same period, the country's population has gone from mostly rural to about 65 percent urban.

Mitta said one of the most visible barometers of change in her neighborhood is the appearance of day-care centers.

About six blocks from her house, two men struggled with a heavy wooden pole at the side of a dirt road. They were helping a woman install electricity in a day-care center -- all on their own, with no help from city or utility officials.A Growing Influence

The dean of Mitta's group is Bertha Vargas, who has lived in the neighborhood for nearly 30 years and claims to know everyone in it. Ask her, and she'll guess that the ratio of women to men in El Alto is 5 to 1. Ask Mitta, and she'll guess 3 to 1. Ask Mitta's husband, and he'll guess 6 to 1.

Census figures say the ratio is almost even, which is one reason many here don't put much faith in census figures.

"It seems like if there's any kind of public gathering or meeting here -- it doesn't matter what kind -- there are always more women than men," Mitta said. "I'm not sure why, but there are."

The members of the women's group say they came together out of a simple desire to share one another's burdens. When faced with such elemental changes in their personal lives, people naturally seek comfort in the community, Vargas said.

"If you have a group of women in one place, they'll always get together and make plans," she said.

Those plans are getting more political as the women expand their connections. The day before a recent group meeting, Mitta and several other women spent the morning sitting at a roadblock outside their neighborhood in a protest against the local governor.

Although La Paz is Bolivia's seat of government, El Alto is its capital of political activism. Unrest among El Alto's residents -- more than 80 percent of whom describe themselves as indigenous -- has led to massive protests and strikes that forced the resignations of successive presidents in 2003 and 2005.

The migration of rural families to El Alto has sparked the unrest, said Mayor Fanor Nava Santiesteban. Thousands come here from the countryside each year carrying little but high expectations.

"They come directly from rural areas, and when they get here, they have a lot of needs and demands," said Santiesteban, who moved to the city 23 years ago from the mining community of Llallagua. "They arrive, get together, form groups and make their demands known."

The women have been part of that, in many cases becoming far more active in civic life than they had been in the countryside. Over the past several years, the number of women helping to lead the neighborhood federations, which serve as entryways to civic activism, has increased to about 20 percent of the total.

It might not sound like much, but Mitta and the other women have definitely noticed the change.

"It feels like we are starting to get some power," she said. "That's new."

US, N. Korea Discuss Relations In N.Y. (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, March 6, 2007

More than 50 years after the end of the Korean War, the United States and North Korea opened historic talks Monday on steps to establish diplomatic relations following Pyongyang's agreement to dismantle its nuclear program.

Kim and Hill are to meet again Tuesday amid rising expectations of improved U.S. relations with a country President Bush called part of an "axis of evil" five years ago, along with Iran and prewar Iraq.

This is the first U.S. visit by Kim, North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, since the international standoff over the North's nuclear ambitions flared in late 2002.

Under an agreement reached at six-nation talks in Beijing last month on the North's nuclear program, the U.S. and North Korea are supposed to open bilateral talks on establishing diplomatic ties. The North, which tested a nuclear weapon last October, agreed to shut down its main nuclear reactor by mid-April as a step toward abandoning its nuclear program in exchange for aid.

DOJ_NMG_0140942

U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack cautioned that this week's initial meetings would focus on setting the agenda for the U.S.-North Korea working group led by Kim and Hill, the top American nuclear negotiator.

"I think that he (Hill) will talk to them about how the process might proceed regarding normalization," McCormack said, including taking North Korea off the U.S. list of state sponsors of terrorism and opening the way for a normal trading relationship with the U.S. for the first time.

Kim's first stop Monday was the Korea Society, a nonprofit organization that promotes greater understanding and cooperation between Americans and Koreans. He spent 4 1/2 hours with an array of academics and VIPs including former secretaries of state Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright.

"We had a very good and fruitful and friendly meeting," Albright told reporters.

A statement issued afterward said participants at the meeting, sponsored by the Korea Society and the National Committee on American Foreign Policy, discussed a range of U.S.-North Korean issues including normalization of relations "in a friendly and forthcoming atmosphere."

Kim arrived in New York late Friday and met over the weekend with South Korea's chief nuclear negotiator Chun Yung-woo. Chun told reporters afterward that "without a doubt, the North is committed to taking initial steps" to implementing its recent agreement to start dismantling its nuclear weapons program, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported Sunday.

A senior aide to South Korea's president will visit North Korea this week, an official said Tuesday, amid media speculation the trip may be aimed at setting up a summit with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

Lee Hae-chan, a former prime minister and current member of parliament, will travel to Pyongyang on Wednesday, said Seo Hye-seok, a Uri Party spokeswoman.

"The trip is aimed at discussing establishing a peace regime on the Korean peninsula with regard to implementing the Feb. 13 agreement," Seo said, referring to the six-nation deal that was reached last month on North Korea's nuclear program.

The announcement spurred speculation that Lee, one of South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun's closest confidants, may discuss setting up a meeting between Roh and Kim Jong Il. Yonhap said the trip is apparently aimed at arranging a summit but Seo denied the media speculation.

In Vietnam, meanwhile, envoys from Japan and North Korea met Tuesday ahead of two-day talks aimed at establishing relations and fulfilling pledges made in Beijing.

Japan has refused to give energy aid to North Korea until Pyongyang clears up its abduction of Japanese citizens, an emotional dispute that has served a major stumbling block between the two nations.

Japan's chief envoy Koichi Haraguchi said Japan wants to spend ample time discussing the abduction issue. North Korea wants Japan to atone for the 1910-1945 colonization of the Korean Peninsula and wartime atrocities, including sex slavery of tens of thousands of Korean women.

Japan and North Korea have never had formal diplomatic ties.

The first phase of North Korea's disarmament process under the Feb. 13 six-party deal calls on North Korea to shut down its main nuclear reactor and allow U.N. inspectors back into the country within 60 days.

In return, it would receive aid equal to 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil from the other countries participating in the nuclear talks — the United States, South Korea, Russia, China and Japan.

McCormack stressed that the process of normalization must proceed "step by step."

"It is going to have to be a process by which good faith actions are met in turn by good faith actions," he said. "We, of course, intend to abide by our commitments under the agreement. We'll see how the North Korean side lives up to its responsibilities."

The United States has had no diplomatic relations with North Korea since the country was created after World War II, when Korea was split into a communist-dominated North and a U.S.-backed capitalist South.

U.S. Discusses New Relations With N. Korea (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, March 6, 2007

The United States and North Korea, enemies for more than half a century, began talks Monday on establishing formal diplomatic relations.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack downplayed expectations for quick progress. He called the meeting in New York between North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan and Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "just an initial discussion."

DOJ_NMG_0140943

McCormack said it will take "some time" to build trust and for North Korea to prove that it is scrapping its nuclear program.

The talks were made possible by a deal last month in which North Korea agreed to freeze nuclear development and allow international inspections in return for fuel and economic aid.

Before meeting Hill on Monday, Kim met with a group of former U.S. diplomats and foreign policy experts. Some of them said they were optimistic the United States and North Korea would agree to formal relations before President Bush leaves office in January 2009.

"Both sides see an opportunity," said Donald Zagoria, president of the National Committee on American Foreign Policy, which seeks to resolve conflicts that threaten U.S. interests. "They understand that time is important and a new administration is chancy."

Zagoria's group co-hosted the meeting along with the Korea Society, a group that promotes U.S.-Korean cooperation.

Other participants were Victor Cha, an official on the National Security Council, and former secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright.

"There have been a lot of lost opportunities on both sides," said Evans Revere, head of the Korea Society and a former U.S. negotiator on Korea. "The stars may never be aligned as well as they are now to put the whole process back on track."

The United States and North Korea fought each other in the 1950-53 Korean War and have never had formal diplomatic relations. They came close to establishing such ties toward the end of the Clinton administration. The United States reversed course when Bush took office and began a lengthy review of a 1994 nuclear agreement between North Korea and the United States.

That deal collapsed in 2002 over U.S. accusations that North Korea had started a secret program to enrich uranium. North Korea then resumed production of plutonium, another bomb fuel. It tested a nuclear weapon in October.

Bush dubbed North Korea, Iran and Iraq the "axis of evil" in 2002. Last month, though, he endorsed a deal with North Korea that resembles the 1994 accord. China, Russia, Japan and South Korea also are part of the new agreement, which calls for economic and diplomatic benefits for North Korea.

"The tone and language today was light-years away from where we were a year ago," said Jim Walsh, a Korea expert from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who also took part in Monday's meeting. "Both sides were talking about momentum and wanting to move faster."

The meetings took place on the same day the United Nations Development Program said it had suspended operations in North Korea. Spokesman David Morrison said the suspension affects $4.4 million in projects. He said the decision was made because of U.S. allegations that aid money has been diverted to the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

Nuclear Dialogue Opens On U.S. Soil (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

U.S. and North Korean negotiators began two days of groundbreaking talks yesterday in New York as part of a deal to end the North's nuclear-weapons programs in exchange for aid and normalization of relations.

Bush administration officials were trying to tamp down expectations of a major breakthrough, saying difficult issues such as U.S. financial sanctions and designation of Pyongyang as an official sponsor of terrorism will require many negotiating sessions.

"I would caution that this is a first meeting and that it is more about setting the norms on how this working group will proceed," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack yesterday.

Still, the meeting of North Korea's top nuclear envoy, Kim Kye-gwan, with U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill represents the highest-level negotiation between the two countries on U.S. soil since 2000, and a sharp change in relations with a country President Bush once included in his "axis of evil."

The meeting occurs three weeks after a breakthrough in the "six-party talks" in Beijing, which established a schedule for the North to scrap its nuclear programs in exchange for economic and diplomatic concessions from the United States and its allies. Also taking part in the talks were South Korea, China, Russia and Japan.

The North enters the U.S. talks under fresh economic pressure as the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) announced yesterday it was suspending all work in the country because of concerns Pyongyang was diverting aid money to other purposes.

The highly unusual suspension affects some 20 projects with a budget of more than $4 million dealing with food security, biodiversity and economic management, UNDP officials said. Eight UNDP staff members in the country may be withdrawn if the North fails to answer the charges of misuse, the agency said.

Mr. Kim and Mr. Hill had a working dinner last night, and the two delegations will have a full day of talks today, U.S. officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0140944

The U.S. and North Korean delegations make up one of five "working groups" created by last month's deal. Under a timeline of step-by-step concessions, the talks are supposed to lead in the end to full diplomatic ties between Pyongyang and Washington.

The first deadline in the deal, set for April 13, calls for the North to shut down its nuclear-reactor plant at Yongbyon and allow U.N. inspectors expelled from the country four years ago to return. Mohamed ElBaradei, the top U.N. nuclear-nonproliferation official, plans to visit Pyongyang next week.

In exchange, the United States and its allies will provide the strapped North Korean economy with 50,000 tons of fuel oil, with pledges of up to 1 million tons on tap if the North follows through on all its disarmament promises.

Mr. Kim met with U.S. specialists on Korea in San Francisco and again in New York in private sessions before his meetings with Mr. Hill. He also met with South Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Chun Yung-woo, in New York over the weekend.

A second working group involving North Korea and Japan begins two days of talks tomorrow in Hanoi, [a wire service] news agency reported. Japanese officials said they will press the North to resolve the emotional issue of Japanese nationals abducted by Pyongyang in the 1970s and 1980s, saying there can be no full normalization of ties until the question is resolved.

Japan has urged the United States to hold off on removing North Korea from its list of terrorism-sponsoring countries until the abduction issue is resolved.

Mr. McCormack said there have been "initial bureaucratic discussions" within the U.S. government on removing North Korea from that list, a necessary step before normalization can occur. The Bush administration has also promised to resolve financial sanctions imposed on the North.

Former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, who has emerged as a leading critic of the six-party deal, said in a Wall Street Journal opinion piece yesterday that the North's "aggressive mendacity" in violating past arms deals made it vital that any deal struck now be closely monitored and verified.

Without strong oversight, "what is already a bad deal will become a dangerous deal," he warned.

U.N. Development Agency Suspends Its Work In North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, March 5 — The United Nations Development Program announced Monday that it was suspending work in North Korea because the country had failed to meet conditions set up in response to American complaints that United Nations money was being diverted to the government of Kim Jong-il.

“We have decided to suspend our operations, and the ball is really now in the court of the D.P.R. Korean authorities,” said David Morrison, director of communications for the agency, referring to the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea, the country’s official name.

The decision, which curtails 20 programs with a budget of $4.4 million, was made Friday, a day after Pak Gil-yon, the North Korean ambassador to the United Nations, met with Ad Melkert, the development program’s associate director, to say that his country would not agree to new conditions for assistance.

Those conditions were that the United Nations would stop furnishing payments in hard currency to the government, local vendors and individuals, and stop making in-country hirings subject to government approval.

The demands, with a March 1 deadline, were imposed by the development program’s executive board on Jan. 25 after the United States mission charged that the United Nations program had been “systematically perverted for the benefit of the Kim Jong-il regime rather than the people of North Korea.”

Mr. Morrison said there was no connection between the announcement and the beginning on Monday, at the Waldorf-Astoria hotel in New York, of two days of talks between North Korea, represented by Kim Kye-gwan, and the United States, represented by Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, on the North Korean nuclear program.

“The timing was driven by our undertaking as made explicit in the board decision of the 25th of January to only continue our operations in the D.P.R.K. if certain conditions were met by March 1, which was Thursday,” he said.

The development program also said in January that it was narrowing its program to what Mr. Morrison said were “activities designed more directly to benefit the North Korean people rather than to build capacity of the North Korean government.”

Mr. Morrison said the North Koreans responded that this action “represented a politicization of the foreign assistance process.”

He added that a decision on whether to end the work of the eight international staff members and 15 Koreans involved would be made within two or three days.

DOJ_NMG_0140945

In a letter to Ambassador Pak on Friday, the program's administrator, Kemal Dervis, said, "Should circumstances change at a later date, we would be willing to reconsider this position."

The program's Web site lists agricultural recovery, productivity and rural energy as developmental activities in North Korea.

Mr. Morrison said aid would continue under two other United Nations organs, the World Food Program and Unicef, the children's agency.

In the aftermath of the American charges in January, Secretary General Ban Ki-moon ordered a full external audit of United Nations operations in North Korea, beginning with the development program.

"As far as I know, this will not affect the investigation," Michelle Montas, Mr. Ban's spokeswoman, said Monday.

Kim The Kidnapper (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, March 6, 2007

Megumi Yokota is among the Japanese citizens kidnapped by North Korea in the 1970s and '80s and still missing today. "There will be no normalization of ties if the abductee issue is not resolved," Japan's lead negotiator, Koichi Haraguchi, told reporters in Hanoi yesterday. Japanese diplomats aren't known for their bluntness, yet Mr. Haraguchi's direct statement echoes the words of virtually every other senior Japanese official on this subject. North Korea says the matter is closed.

This week's meetings are part of the elaborate six-party agreement reached in Beijing last month under which North Korea promises to give up its nuclear program in return for aid. Tokyo signed on to the accord, reportedly under U.S. pressure, but refuses to participate in the energy assistance that is part of the deal unless progress is made on the abduction issue.

Japan's firmness comes directly from Prime Minister Shinzo Abe. He became aware of the abductees' plight in the 1980s, when he was private secretary to his father, Shintaro, then Secretary-General of the Liberal Democratic Party, and family members went through the younger Mr. Abe to request a meeting. When he won his own election to the Diet, in 1993, he became the first politician to fight for return of the abductees. He feels their suffering and the pain of their families "in his heart," says a politician who is close to him.

Megumi, who was abducted in 1977, has become the symbol of the movement to free the abductees. She was 13 years old and on her way home from school when she was snatched off the streets of the western Japanese city of Niigata by North Korean agents. Imprisoned in the hold of a ship and taken to Pyongyang, she was forced to teach spies how to pass as Japanese. In 2002, North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il admitted to kidnapping Megumi and 11 other Japanese citizens.

Their stories are equally heart-rending: A young couple disappear in Kagoshima Prefecture while on a date at a beach, where they had gone to watch the sunset. A 23-year-old woman vanishes in Europe; the last her parents hear from her is a postcard from Copenhagen. A mother and daughter go missing during a shopping trip in Niigata Prefecture. At the time, police who investigated these and other disappearances had no notion of North Korean involvement. In recent years, Japan has reopened many of the missing-persons files from the era but the scent has grown cold. There are only 17 people on the official list of abductees -- the most recent was added in November -- but officials say privately that the victims may number in the "hundreds." South Korea, whose appeasement-minded government prefers not to talk about the kidnappings of its citizens, has 485 people on its list of abductees.

Pyongyang allowed five of the Japanese abductees to return home in 2002. (They were required to leave behind their Korean spouses and children as guarantees that they wouldn't badmouth their captors.) It claimed the rest of the abductees had all died, but the causes of death they cited were so absurd as to be unbelievable -- a 20-something young woman who dropped dead of a heart attack; a man who drowned while swimming in the ocean during a typhoon; and so forth. Megumi was reported to have hanged herself. But the DNA evidence provided by Pyongyang in her case and others proved to be fraudulent.

"Megumi" is a household name in Japan, thanks largely to the efforts of her parents to keep her story alive. Her mother, Sakie, met with President Bush in the White House last year. At the World Economic Forum meeting in Davos in January, the Japanese government hosted a sushi reception and screening of "Abduction," a documentary about her disappearance. Last month, in Tokyo, Mr. Abe attended a press conference at which American folk singer Noel Paul Stookey, of Peter, Paul and Mary fame, debuted his plaintive "Song for Megumi." Meanwhile, a Japanese advocacy group last week announced it would use balloons to scatter 100,000 waterproof leaflets over North Korea offering a $10,000 reward for information on the abductees.

Among the promises the U.S. made to North Korea as part of the Feb. 13 nuclear disarmament deal is a pledge to begin the process of removing it from the list of terror-sponsoring states. When Vice President Dick Cheney visited Tokyo last month, Mr. Abe urged the U.S. not to do so until the abduction issue is resolved. While President Bush has spoken eloquently in the past about human-rights violations in North Korea, that issue appears not to be high on the U.S. agenda these days. Chief U.S.

Israeli Says Iran Is Training Hamas Men (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 6, 2007

TEL AVIV, March 5 — The chief of Shin Bet, the Israeli internal security service, said Monday that the Islamic movement Hamas had sent dozens of men from Gaza to Iran for military training.

"We know that Hamas has started to dispatch people to Iran, tens, and a promise of hundreds," the intelligence chief, Yuval Diskin, told a small group of correspondents here in a rare on-the-record briefing.

The training would last months, perhaps years, he said, adding, "I see this as the strategic danger, more than any weapons smuggled into Gaza."

Ahmed Youssef, an adviser to Ismail Haniya, the Hamas-backed Palestinian prime minister, responded from Gaza by telephone that Hamas "has not sent anyone to Iran," and that Mr. Diskin's comment was "propaganda, to hurt a new government."

Mr. Youssef said there "are attempts to send some men from the Executive Force," a Hamas-led parallel paramilitary police force, "to Arab countries for police training."

Mr. Diskin said that his comments were based on hard intelligence, but Mr. Youssef insisted that Egypt, which shares a border with Gaza, is very strict about Gazans traveling to Iran.

Mr. Diskin's agency is charged in part with understanding Palestinian views. In his assessment, the main Palestinian secular party, Fatah, is continuing to fragment under weak leadership from the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, and would lose another election, if it were held now, to the radical Hamas movement.

Hamas, which rejects Israel's right to exist, won legislative elections more than a year ago and formed a government. "I'm not optimistic about Fatah," Mr. Diskin said. "Fatah is disintegrated and nearly destroyed, with no strong leadership."

He had harsh words for Mr. Abbas, known as Abu Mazen. "Abu Mazen is a good negotiator but doesn't know how to deal with internal party affairs," he said. "He has done nothing to revive Fatah, either its institutions or its military power. He wanted to become the national leader of the Palestinian people, but he forgot that he needs a strong Fatah to do it."

The international isolation of Hamas and an embargo on direct financial aid to the Palestinian Authority it runs has convinced Hamas that it cannot rule alone without any international legitimacy, Mr. Diskin said. "But it also drove Hamas toward Iran," he said, adding, "One of the bad fruits of the isolation of Hamas is the influence of Iran and its money."

He predicted that despite their current difficulties, Fatah and Hamas would agree on a unity government as laid out in principle on Feb. 8 in an agreement in Mecca, Saudi Arabia. But he noted that they were rivals for power and wanted different things from such a government, which might not last.

"This is the ticking bomb inside the unity government," said Mr. Diskin, 50, a former army commando and Shin Bet field operative. But he also predicted that the unity of Western and other nations in boycotting a Hamas-led government would crack.

Hamas, part of the larger Muslim Brotherhood, would never change its fundamental beliefs, he said, and he contended that Hamas's offer of a long-term truce with Israel had been intended to allow the movement to consolidate its control over the Palestinians and to mask a buildup of military armaments and power that would eventually be aimed at Israel.

He predicted a long struggle, arguing that Israel and Hamas would not reach "even a temporary political agreement," but "maybe temporary cooling-down periods."

The Palestinians say Israel, and Shin Bet, have aided the chaos by waging war against the Palestinian security forces in 2002, after a spate of suicide bombings, and by the continuing Israeli occupation of the West Bank. Hamas officials have said they will never recognize Israel's right to exist.

But Hamas says that if Israel returns to 1967 boundaries, allows Palestinian refugees and their families to return to their pre-1948 homes and recognizes Palestine, it will offer a 15-to-20-year truce.

Some suggest that Hamas has shifted position enough that the West should begin to talk to the movement or to finance the government again.

Mr. Abbas has said that he wants to bring Hamas into Palestinian politics and the Palestine Liberation Organization, and that as head of the P.L.O., he would negotiate a settlement with Israel then bring it to the judgment of the Palestinian people.

Mr. Diskin said Hamas and Islamic Jihad were building an "internal military industry" in Gaza to manufacture rockets and antitank weapons, sending men to Lebanon and Iran for training and strengthening their forces.

They are also smuggling in weapons and explosives from Egypt, Mr. Diskin said, and the Egyptians, themselves now worried about terrorist cells in the Sinai, are only now beginning to work hard to stop it.

Elements of what he called “global jihad” are creating “ties” and “connections” to local Gaza groups, especially to Mumtaz Dagmush of the powerful Dagmush clan, Mr. Diskin said, refusing to elaborate. “We don’t say Al Qaeda in Shin Bet,” he said.

But he said Shin Bet had no evidence that Al Qaeda or its followers were present and active in Gaza.

Asked if, given his analysis of Hamas and Gaza, a large Israeli military operation was inevitable in Gaza, he said a lot depended on what action Egypt took to stop smuggling. “I don’t want to say inevitable,” Mr. Diskin said. “But if the buildup continues, and if rockets and tunnels continue, at the end of the day we will have to do something about it.”

There are others in Israel’s security services with more extreme views than Mr. Diskin’s, and he has been among those to caution against a large Israeli operation in Gaza now.

Even Amir Peretz, the Labor Party leader and defense minister, says that he would prefer to negotiate peace with Palestinians, but that Hamas’s strong position in the Palestinian leadership makes negotiations highly unlikely. Mr. Peretz has pushed for easing travel and access restrictions on Palestinians.

Shin Bet can deal only with the abilities of Israel’s adversaries, Mr. Diskin said, pointing to a decrease in Israeli deaths from suicide bombings and terrorism. “Dealing with their motivations,” he said, “is up to the politicians.”

Spy Chief Sees Hamas Driven To Tehran (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 6, 2007

TEL AVIV -- The international community's decision to cut off financial aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian government has helped drive Hamas into the embrace of Iran, the chief of Israel's domestic spy agency said yesterday.

"One of the bad fruits of the international siege on Hamas is that once all the doors were closed, the only window open was to Iran," said Yuval Diskin, head of the Shin Bet security agency.

Mr. Diskin's analysis of the Palestinian political and military scene painted a bleak prognosis for peace negotiations with Israel and included a warning about a possible Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip.

Yesterday's press briefing came amid renewed fighting between Palestinian factions on the streets of Gaza City and another day of failed negotiations between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh on the makeup of a unity government.

In the eyes of the Shin Bet, Hamas emerged as "the great winner" from a power-sharing deal with the rival Fatah party, Mr. Diskin said. He was referring to a unity agreement signed in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, last month.

The Mecca agreement on a Palestinian unity government could help the Islamic militants break the international aid boycott without requiring it to concede its ideological rejection of the Jewish state, Mr. Diskin said.

At the same time, Hamas would retain control over key ministries to deepen the hold of militant Islam in Palestinian society.

Mr. Diskin said that the bad blood between Hamas and Fatah after weeks of gunbattles in Gaza leaves the probability at 1 in 3 that the Mecca agreement will collapse before a unity government is formed.

He said Mr. Abbas has failed to rebuild his Fatah party into a cohesive political or military force capable of challenging Hamas or providing the backing Mr. Abbas needs for peace negotiations with Israel.

Fatah has become a political party without a clear leader, divided between ex-security chief Mohammed Dahlan in Gaza and Marwan Barghouti, the legislator serving five life sentences in Israeli prison.

"I don't think Abbas knows where he is headed," Mr. Diskin said. "Abbas is a good negotiator, but he doesn't know how to deal with the internal affairs of his political party."

Mr. Diskin, who dressed in a knit black pullover shirt with jeans, heads the security branch responsible for locating and interrogating Palestinian as well as Jewish militants.

When questioned by reporters about the impact of the international aid boycott on the Hamas government's ties to Iran, Mr. Diskin declined to criticize the aid embargo. Hamas' ties to Iran existed independently of the boycott, he said.

At the same time, it was the economic pressure and instability from the boycott that convinced Hamas leaders that the party was incapable of ruling alone.

Strengthened ties with Iran have reportedly produced tens of millions of dollars in financial aid for the Palestinian Authority.

Mr. Diskin also said that Hamas militants have left Gaza for training in Iran. Though Israeli officials have consistently sounded alarm bells that Hamas is exploiting the Gaza Sinai border to smuggle in weapons, Mr. Diskin said the training activity worries him more.

The intelligence chief said the Sinai Peninsula has moved from being a haven for tourists to a terrorist haven for global jihadists, who are likely in the future to link up with Palestinian militants inside of Gaza.

"If the Egyptians stop the smuggling activity in the Sinai desert," Israel will not need another major operation in Gaza, he said.

Israeli Intelligence Chief: Iran Training Hamas (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, March 6, 2007

TEL AVIV — The head of Israel's domestic intelligence agency said Monday that Iran was giving advanced military training to members of Hamas, a move he called a "strategic danger" to the Jewish state.

Yuval Diskin, the director of Shin Bet, said that the militant movement had dispatched "tens" of fighters from the Gaza Strip to Iran for "months, maybe years" of instruction, and that Iran had promised to train hundreds more.

A Hamas spokesman denied the assertion. The training, if confirmed, would mean that Iran is expanding its alliance with Hamas, which Israel and the United States list as a terrorist organization and which has controlled the Palestinian Authority government for nearly a year.

Since Western nations cut off funding to the Palestinian government last spring because of Hamas' ascendance, Iran has given it at least $120 million in aid.

Reports of Iran training Hamas militants, previously attributed to unnamed Israeli and Palestinian officials, have been circulating for weeks. Diskin's remark at a rare briefing for foreign reporters was the first such official claim and echoed a drumbeat of charges by the Bush administration that Iran exports terrorism.

The intelligence chief, a burly man with a shaved head, said Hamas was continuing to stockpile weapons smuggled into the Gaza Strip through Egypt. But he said Hamas' development of arms factories in Gaza and its alleged training in Iran were greater long-term threats to Israel.

Mushir Masri, a Hamas member of the Palestinian parliament, said Diskin was spreading a false allegation about training to undermine Hamas and build a case for renewed attacks in Gaza.

Israel fought a five-month offensive in Gaza last year after Hamas-linked militants captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid. Diskin said Hamas was taking advantage of a cease-fire accord reached with Israel last November to prepare for a future military confrontation. The soldier is still being held.

Whether Israel continues to abide by the cease-fire depends on Egypt's ability to stop weapons smuggling into Gaza, Diskin said.

With support from the Bush administration, Israel has tried for months to isolate Hamas politically by strengthening Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of the rival Fatah movement and engaging him in peace talks.

That strategy hit a roadblock last month when Fatah, seeking to end months of armed clashes with Hamas, agreed at a meeting in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, to join the Palestinian government as a minority partner, despite having failed to persuade Hamas to recognize Israel and forswear violence against the Jewish state.

"Hamas is the big winner in the Mecca agreement," Diskin said in one of the starkest official Israeli assessments to date.

The accord, he noted, keeps the prime minister's job in the hands of Hamas, along with ministries involved in education and social welfare, which are crucial to spreading the movement's influence. Diskin predicted that Saudi Arabia's role in the accord and its pledge of financial support would not shake Iran's influence over Hamas, which he said would happily take aid from rival Middle East powers.

The intelligence chief offered an unusually blunt public assessment of Abbas. Israel's Palestinian ally "doesn't have a clear strategy … doesn't know how to run a political movement," he said, and has allowed Fatah to "disintegrate" rather than building its military prowess to gain the upper hand over Hamas.

Diskin said it was still possible that the power-sharing accord would collapse amid lingering factional bloodshed and disagreements over who will control Hamas' and Fatah's various security services and militias. He said the rival factions were amassing forces against each other — a "ticking time bomb inside this unity government."

On Monday, the two sides waged a gun battle for control of a police training compound in Gaza City. Meanwhile, Ismail Haniyeh, who has retained his job as prime minister, said negotiations on the makeup of a new Cabinet would take at least another two weeks.

U.S. Aid To Palestine Hinges On Hamas (AP)

The State Department said Monday full funding of a proposed $86 million in security assistance for the Palestinian Authority hinges on whether U.S. officials receive assurances that none of the funds can benefit Hamas.

Spokesman Sean McCormack commented after four House Foreign Affairs Committee members, including Chairman Tom Lantos, D-Calif., urged Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to reconsider the plan in light of the recent agreement between Fatah and Hamas to form a national unity government.

Hamas, which controls most of the Palestinian government, is considered a terrorist organization by the United States, European countries and Israel. Fatah is led by moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

The two groups agreed to form a government after weeks of street fighting left scores dead.

McCormack said the administration is asking the same questions as members of Congress about whether Hamas would benefit from the program.

"Our intention is to move forward with the program," McCormack said. "Whether or not that includes the full $86 million will depend upon the answers to the questions we have and obviously the answers to the questions that the Congress has," he said.

The intent is to assist with training in non-lethal equipment of forces under Abbas' control.

In calling for reconsideration of the plan, the House members said, "This agreement has immensely complicated the search for peace."

They said they were "deeply disappointed" Abbas had committed his Fatah party to forming a government with Hamas without insisting that the group recognize Israel, renounce violence, and accept all previous agreements with Israel.

France Calls For Closer EU-Palestinian Ties (FT)

Financial Times, March 6, 2007

France pushed on Monday for the European Union to step up preparations for deeper ties with a Palestinian government of national unity – despite misgivings from countries such as Germany and the Netherlands.

The move came as Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, called for a “more even-handed” approach from the EU and accused Israel of “provocative and illegal actions”.

The question of whether to resume contacts with and direct funding for the Palestinian Authority is set to race up the EU’s agenda as the rival Fatah and Hamas factions move closer to working together.

While France argues that the momentum of last month’s Mecca agreement to set up a unity government cannot be wasted, other countries give greater emphasis to making sure the administration fully meets international demands that it recognises Israel.

The US and Israel have much less patience for arguments that some sort of “implicit recognition” of Israel – by, for example abiding by past agreements – would be good enough for resuming ties.

“We have thought about what the EU’s attitude should be towards this new government once it is formed,” said Catherine Colonna, France’s Europe minister, at an EU foreign ministers meeting. “From the start we should take account of elements such as contacts and funding ... We should be prepared to fine-tune this position depending on the acts of the government.”

She added that she was not calling for the EU to hurry but to return to the issue in the future.

Diplomats at Monday’s meeting said that the Netherlands had given greater emphasis to the importance of the Palestinians meeting the demand to recognise Israel, while Germany is traditionally reluctant to upset its close relationship with Israel.

In unusually strong language for the PA president, a letter written on Mr Abbas’s behalf by Rafiq Husseini, his chief of staff, demanded that conditions placed on the PA be matched by reciprocal demands on Israel.

“Despite flagrant Israeli violations of previous agreements and commitments ... Israel continues to benefit from close political and trade relations with the EU, while the Palestinian people suffer the consequences of a crippling international boycott,” said the letter, to Frank-Walter Steinmeier, German foreign minister.

It said recent Israeli military incursions into the West Bank, the continuing expansion of illegal settlement in occupied territory and construction work near Jerusalem’s al-Aqsa mosque demonstrated the “sheer disregard with which the state of Israel views its commitments, both under previous agreements and toward the international community.”

The issue of funding is less pressing than that of contacts, since the EU was able to deliver €700m in aid to the Palestinians last year, despite the election of a Hamas government, largely through constructing other means of providing humanitarian assistance.

Monday also saw a delay in the announcement of the government of national unity itself. The parties had planned to reach agreement at the weekend. However, Ismail Haniya, Hamas prime minister, said Monday a deal was now not expected until the end of next week.

Although the two parties reached agreement in principle in Mecca on February 8, there are differences on the allocation of cabinet posts.

Yuval Diskin, head of Israel's Shin Bet domestic intelligence agency, said Monday he thought there was a 70 per cent chance a Palestinian unity government would be established.

"Hamas is the great winner [from the Mecca agreement]," he told foreign journalists. "Fatah accepted the agreement but I'm not sure Abu Mazen [Mr Abbas] knows exactly where he is headed ... Abu Mazen is not a real leader these days."
